Eight years ago, Mr. Chairman, we were the most happy and prosperous people on earth. To-day our deplorable condition causes us to take rank among the most wretched of the civilized nations. Eight years ago the Federal Government was free from debt. To-day our aggregate debt is greater than that of any other nation. Eight years ago our taxes were lighter than those of any other people—to-day they are more oppressive than those of any other country. Eight years ago our commerce covered every sea, and our manufactures competed with those of Europe in all the marts of the civilized world. While we are told by the Special Commissioner of Revenue in his report of December, 1866, that—

"The foreign commerce of the United States is being, as it were, swept from the ocean; and it is reported to the Commissioner, by experienced ship-owners of New York, that no voyage by an American vessel can be planned at the present time from the United States to any foreign port with a reasonable expectation of profit."

The Commissioner goes on to say—

"Reference to the official returns shows the amount of American registered tonnage engaged in foreign trade in 1855-56 to have been but one million and a half tons as compared with two and a half million tons in 1859-60, which, allowing for the difference for the old and new measurements, indicates a decrease in five years of over fifty per cent. In 1853 the tonnage of the United States was about fifteen per cent. in excess of that of Great Britain, while at the present time it is estimated at thirty-three per cent. less."

Mr. Chairman, less than eight years ago the great Democratic party surrendered the custody of the Federal Government into the hands of the same sectional organization which is now ruling and ruining our country. And within that period the angel of death and desolation has been abroad in the land, causing a feast of blood, a carnival of hell.

My honorable colleague, who has just taken his seat, [Mr. ASHLEY,] referred to the fact that for twenty-five years prior to the incoming of Mr. Lincoln's administration the Democratic party had been in power. That is true, sir; and what was the result? Peace within our borders, our nation respected abroad, the Federal Government free from debt, and the people free from the accursed burden of an odious and detestable system of taxation.

Mr. Chairman, in considering the history of the British nation, and in contemplating the growth of the English debt I have been forcibly struck with this startling fact, that the people of the United States, the citizens of this Republic, have in the short space of eight years made a greater debt than was created in Great Britain in a period of more than two hundred years. And, sir, who is responsible for this debt? By whom has the Government been administered? Who has had charge of its financial affairs? With an overwhelming majority, not only in the Federal Legislature, but in every State government, I charge that the Republican party is wholly and entirely responsible for all the evils which now curse and afflict our land.

But I may be told, "You forget that we have just emerged from a great war, and the war required a vast revenue to carry it on." No, sir, I remember that; I know it well. But is that the only war the country has ever gone through? Why, sir, during the period that the Democratic party was in power we had several great wars; we had the war of 1812; we had thirty years of Indian wars; we had two years' war with Mexico, when we had to send our Army two thousand miles away from their homes, battling in a foreign clime beneath a foreign sun, and against an enemy who outnumbered our forces more than ten to one. And while under a Republican administration in one year of war eight hundred million dollars were expended, during our war with Mexico the largest expenditure that was made in one year for the Army and Navy and civil list was only seventy-two million dollars.

Sir, it is a fact recognized by all intelligent men in this country, and which will not be here disputed or elsewhere doubted, that of the enormous debt that now afflicts the country at least one half has been the result of robbery and speculation. Now, if there is any gentleman upon the opposite side who doubts what I am about to say, I wish him to say so now. I charge that the aggregate debt of the United States to-day amounts to six thousand five hundred million dollars!

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. As the statement of the amount of the debt of the United States made by my colleague is vastly larger than that stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, I would be glad to know of him how he makes up his statement of the debt?

Mr. MORGAN. I thank my colleague for his question. The debt reported by the Secretary of the Treasury is the liquidated, the audited debt of the country. The liquidated debt of the country amounts to two thousand five hundred millions, while the floating debt, and the gentleman will not deny that, amounts to four thousand million dollars.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. That last remark of my colleague might be misunderstood. He says I will not deny that. I must say that I think he is entirely mistaken, unless he takes into the estimate as a part of the debt the value of the slaves emancipated in all the southern States, and unless he proceeds upon the idea that that is a valid debt which we are to pay.

Mr. MORGAN. I am glad that my colleague has again taken the floor; but he is mistaken. When I say the floating debt is four thousand million dollars I do not embrace in the estimate the former value of the freed slaves.

But I charge this, that the outstanding claims which constitute the floating debt of this Government amount to four thousand million dollars. And I regret that the honorable chairman of the Committee of Claims of this Congress [Mr. BINGHAM] is not present to confirm what I say. As the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] seems to doubt the correctness of my statement, and as the present chairman of the Committee of Claims is not here to confirm it, I call the attention of the honorable gentleman to the statement made by the chairman of the Committee of Claims of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, Hon. Columbus Delano, now of my district. I send it to the Clerk to be read, pages 2189 and 2190 of Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, I know very well that there are reasons why these considerations should be expressed. Our nation now groans with the weight of public debt and necessary taxation, and our credit must be maintained. I know that there are now floating claims against this nation not less in amount than $4,000,000,000, according to my estimate; and these claims, if admitted at all, will never be settled with less than $2,000,000,000. I do not believe they will be settled for that."

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. DELANO. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would ask the gentleman whether, when he refers to this floating debt which cannot be liquidated without an expenditure of $2,000,000,000, he refers to claims that may be brought by persons in the eleven States lately in rebellion?

Mr. DELANO. I refer only to claims of loyal persons.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would ask him whether he includes claims that may be brought by persons in the eleven States recently in rebellion?

Mr. DELANO. I refer to such claims as will be made by loyal people in all the States, and none others. When I say that it will take $2,000,000,000, I do it on the assumption that we shall compound these claims in some manner without settling up to the full amount.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is that to be one of the effects of reconstruction?

Mr. DELANO. I did not say so; but the nation will ultimately have to meet this question and settle it in some form, either by compounding or refusing to pay it. I do not know that it will necessarily follow reconstruction. I have not got that disease upon the brain.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Nor upon the heart either."

Mr. MORGAN. It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Delano, the chairman of the Committee of Claims of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, with a better opportunity, perhaps, than any other citizen of the Republic to know what really was the amount of the public debt, after due investigation in his official capacity states that that debt amounted to four thousand million dollars.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him at this point? Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I desire to state that the claims to which Mr. Delano referred in the extract which has just been read are claims for the destruction of and damage to the property of the loyal people of this country by the Union forces and the rebel forces during the war. Now, does not my colleague know that it never has been, and never can be, the practice of this nation to pay claims of that character? This nation has never done it; no other nation has ever done it. And, besides that, if these are claims which are to be paid, does not my colleague know that it is only another evidence of the huge proportions of the great Democratic rebellion which afflicted this country through more than four years of war, and in putting down which, I am proud to say, my colleague did his duty with fidelity and ability while in the service of the Union Army?

Mr. MORGAN. I find, Mr. Chairman, that the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] is in favor of compounding this floating debt of four thousand million dollars, which Mr. Delano declared to be a just debt, by repudiating one half of the amount. I am surprised, sir, to hear my honorable colleague [Mr. LAWRENCE] say "that neither this nor any other nation ever paid such claims." Why, sir, does not the honorable gentleman know that Congress made a very large appropriation to meet the losses sustained by the citizens of Ohio by the raid of John Morgan? Does not he know that similar appropriations have been made for the benefit of citizens of other States for similar claims, and that the Journals of Congress sustain me in what I say?

Sir, it can be truly said of the Republican party, as was once said by a learned historian of England, that it is a party of "false pretenses." The leaders of that party are at this moment attempting to raise the cry of repudiation against the Democratic party. And yet my colleague [Mr. LAWRENCE] here in his seat avows his anxiety, or willingness, to do that which is equivalent to the repudiation of the outstanding claims against this Government. This is Republican consistency. This, sir, is an illustration of the conduct of that party from the hour that its leaders inaugurated the war, in the spring of 1861, down to the present moment.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will my colleague assert, then, that if the Democratic party should get the power in these Halls they will pay for property damaged or destroyed in the rebel States during the progress of the war?

Mr. MORGAN. The Democratic party, Mr. Chairman, has never known but one rule of action—that of justice and right. And when we are restored to power, as we are about to be, by a patriotic but a betrayed and oppressed people, we will closely and cautiously examine these claims, which Mr. Delano declared to be just; and if his statement be found to be true—and if not true it should not have been made—that these claims are legal and just, we will not repudiate one dollar of any claim which ought to be paid. But let me tell the gentleman what we will do. We will get upon the track of the thieves and robbers who have, and who are now plundering this Government, and who are now urging their fraudulent claims against it, and we will reject all such claims as fraudulent, infamous, and corrupt. But when a claim is legal, just, and right, the Democratic party, adhering to the principles of truth and justice by which it has always been guided, will do full justice between the people and the Government.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I beg leave to request my colleague to answer directly the question I have put to him: will the Democratic party, if it should come into power, pay for property damaged or destroyed in rebel States during the progress of the war, property of rebels as well as the property of loyal men?

Mr. MORGAN. It affords me great pleasure to answer my colleague. In answer, I will give the gentleman the language of the chairman of the Committee of Claims of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, who stated that these claims were the claims of none but loyal citizens, and that they ought to be paid. And, sir, the Republican party being in power with a two-thirds vote in both branches of Congress, the responsibility of determining how these claims shall be treated rests with them, not with us.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I proceed to another phase in the history of the Republican party. While the great body of the people were honest and patriotic, yet, as has been the fact in the history of all free nations, demagogues abused the misplaced confidence of the people and deceived, robbed, and defrauded them. Sir, in the history of the last eight years, there are many things which deserve the careful consideration of every citizen. For example, during the three years which have elapsed since the overthrow of the rebellion the leaders of the Republican party have wrung from the sweat and toil of the people, by direct and indirect taxation, more than sixteen hundred million dollars. This is the fruit, the bitter fruit, of three years of Republican rule in time of peace.

And now, sir, let us compare this wanton and profligate extravagance of the Republican party during the period of three brief years with the administration of the Democratic party during a period of seventy-three years—dating from the incoming of the administration of George Washington down to the close of the last fiscal year of the administration of James Buchanan. I call that the Democratic period, sir, because even when we had an opposition party in control of one branch of the Government, the Democracy controlled another branch, so as always to be able to guard the national Treasury against robbery.

Well, Mr. Chairman, the expenditures of the Federal Government, during the seventy-three years preceding the first administration of Mr. Lincoln, exclusive of sums paid upon the public debt and trust fund, only amounted to thirteen hundred and ninety-seven million six hundred and eighty-five thousand one hundred and thirty-four dollars, being more than two hundred millions less than the Republicans have expended during the insignificant period of three years. And during that glorious, happy, and prosperous period of seventy-three years, it frequently became necessary to defend the honor of our flag on distant seas and in foreign lands. We had wars, but they were not wars among ourselves; for Democratic statesmen were always able to adjust all questions, sectional or otherwise, without resorting to the dire and most accursed of all calamities, a civil war, a war of brothers and of countrymen. But civil war came—it came with the incoming of the Republican party, and, like a thousand other monsters, it was the offspring of that party. For certain it is, that had it not been for the organization of a sectional party at Chicago in 1860, in contempt of the warning of Washington, there would not have been war. Sir, I must not be misunderstood. The organization of a sectional party was a defiance hurled by one section against another section, and had not that defiance been there would not have been war. However, the responsibility does not entirely rest upon the leaders of the Republican party—the great body of the people were not responsible—but it is divided by the southern leaders who accepted the gage of battle and appealed to the unreasoning god of war, instead of to the patriotism and intelligence of the American people at large; and the devastation of their States, the destruction of their towns and cities, and the loss of half a million of their children in battle and in the hospital, has been the dread penalty of their offense. But, sir, the war belongs to the dead past, and I do not propose to disturb the tombs of the dead. We have an actual, living, solemn present, and a coming future which demand our serious and candid attention.

In 1860 the true value of all the property of every description in the United States was sixteen thousand three hundred and twenty-nine million six hundred and sixteen thousand and sixty-eight dollars; and this sum included two thousand million dollars, the value of slave property which was destroyed by the war, and which amount must be deducted from the aggregate wealth of the nation as returned in the report of the eighth census, thus making the actual value of all the land, of all the cities, of all the towns, of all the houses, of all the ships, of all the steamers, of all the railroads and their material, of all the manufactured goods and raw material, of all the grain, and of all the cattle in the land, fourteen thousand one hundred and fifty-nine million six hundred and sixteen thousand and sixty-eight dollars; showing, according to Mr. Delano, that the aggregate Federal debt is nearly equal to one half of the actual wealth of the entire country.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will my colleague allow me?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. If the Democratic party should get into power would they regard the claim of southern slaveholders for compensation for emancipated slaves as a just and valid claim to be paid by the Government? [Cries of "No!" on the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. MORGAN. I renew the expression of my obligations to my colleague for again propounding questions to me; and in answer to his question I say undoubtedly not. I have already remarked, sir, that the policy of the Democratic party was at once wise, just, and patriotic. We have nothing to do with the dead carcass of slavery. The loss of slave property was the forfeit paid by the people of the South for allowing their leaders to join the bad men of the Republican party in the North in involving our country in civil war. The loss was theirs; let it remain theirs. That, sir, is my answer.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I will return to the question of the Federal debt; for although an unpleasant subject, yet it is one which we are compelled to consider. We have seen, according to the chairman of the Committee of Claims in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, that the aggregate audited and floating debt of the United States amounts to the fearful sum of six thousand five hundred million dollars! And how, sir, is that enormous debt—the handiwork and creation of the Republican party—to be paid?

Let us try, sir, and measure that monster debt by some standard which will convey to the mind some idea of its magnitude. By the returns in the report of the eighth census it appears that the actual wealth of the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana, including every dollar's worth of property owned by each citizen, amounted to the sum of five thousand eight hundred and fifty-four million four hundred and thirty-four thousand four hundred and ten dollars; so that if the leaders of the Republican party had the power to drive the citizens of those States from their homes, send them penniless among strangers, sell all the property they had left behind, and apply the proceeds of the sales upon the payment of the debt, the Federal Government would still owe the enormous sum of six hundred and forty-six million ninety-four thousand four hundred and seventeen dollars. And for all this are the people indebted to Republican domination.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it does appear to me that a stupendous fact like this is worthy of the calm and grave consideration without regard to party. The simple question is, do the people want reform? Do they desire a reduction of taxation? Do they wish the burdens of the Government lessened? For if they feel that great evils do exist, then, sir, are they not bound as good citizens to correct those evils, which can only be done by restoring the Democratic party to power, and thereby return to an economical system? Now, sir, a party is but an association of men, and liable, indeed more liable, to become corrupt than a single individual. Would you, to whom I am now speaking, trust a man as your agent to watch over your interests after you had detected him in the act of cheating or stealing from you? Certainly not. And if the rule be good as to the affairs of private life, is it not equally so as to public affairs?

The true difference, Mr. Chairman, between patriotism and what is called loyalty in America and patriotism is this: patriotism is devotion to country without regard to party; while loyalty is devotion to party without regard to country. Do not suppose that I am denouncing party organizations, for I only say that when a party has become corrupt that honest men should abandon it. A man may be in error, and yet be an honest man, and if you believe him to be honest you will concede to him your respect although you know him to be in error. But, sir, can you respect a man who knows that he is wrong, and yet adheres to the very policy which he declares to be so; and who tries to appease his own conscience by denouncing the leaders whose mandates he obeys, and whose lead he follows? Now, sir, I have much higher respect for the distinguished commoner from Pennsylvania, who is the recognized leader, if not master, on the Republican side in this honorable body, than for those persons who in private denounce his policy and in public follow in his footsteps. This much at least can be said in his favor, he never speaks against a measure, and then votes for it. He is no jack-o'-lantern, but a man of bronze, who although always wrong, from the constitution of his nature he believes that he is right, and we always know where to find him. He is not one of those political eels who profess to agree with you, but who slip through your fingers at the very moment they are most needed. I repeat, sir, that the man is not a bad man who does what he believes to be right, although he may be in error. But he is a dangerous citizen who deliberately does wrong, knowing that it is wrong, from want of sufficient manhood to do right.

Mr. Chairman, the only hope for the restoration of our free institutions is by the uprising of the people in their majesty. They must act like freemen, and defy the behests of those who dare assume to be their masters. The gentleman asks me whether the Democratic party would be in favor of paying the four thousand million dollars of floating debt of which Mr. Delano speaks. I tell the gentleman what the Democratic party will be in favor of. We will cut down the expenditures of the Army; we will abolish your negro regiments; we will reduce the expenditures of the Navy one half; we will drive the thieves and plunderers, who are now sucking at the heart of the nation and drawing forth its life's blood, out of power, and put honest men in their places. We will correct all these evils and abuses, and in doing that we shall reduce the burden of taxes upon the people, and reform this odious system of taxation which the party now in power originated.

Mr. DRIGGS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that if he can convince me that his party will do all that I will promise to support it. I cannot see that it has done it in the past, and I fear that it will fail to do it in the future, should it ever again get into power.

Mr. MORGAN. I thank the gentleman for the opportunity to convince him; and if he will give me his candid attention I will secure him as a convert before I am through. I have been speaking of the abuses of the Republican party, their wicked expenditure of the nation's treasure, drawn from the sweat and toil of the people. Millions have been lavished on the favorites of the party in power, and like so many leeches they are fastened upon the public Treasury. I have spoken of the aggregate amount of expenditures by the Republican party. Let me now call attention to the fact that the ordinary expenses of the Government for 1867-68 are estimated at more than one hundred and forty-eight millions over the expenditures of 1861. Why this great excess in the ordinary expenditures of the Government? Where does the money go to? Whose pockets does it fill? Why, sir, the leaders of the Republican party have become so accustomed to handling millions upon millions that the greater the amount proposed to be appropriated the more ready is this House to vote the appropriation. Not only that, but the leaders of that party are guilty of an offense which amounts to a political crime. It was but a few days ago that a resolution was introduced into this House by my colleague [Mr. VAN TRUMP] calling for a statement of the amount of money that had been taken from the Treasury of the people to pay for the publication of a book containing what is called the tributes of all nations to Abraham Lincoln.

The letters contained in this book had already been published in book form, and had been circulated by thousands at the cost of the people. But that was not sufficient. A resolution was introduced by some loyal member of the Thirty-Ninth Congress ordering the same book to be printed in the most expensive style, in full gold, and bound in Turkey morocco. Well, sir, did the resolution of my colleague pass? No, sir; it was strangled at its birth by being referred to a committee; the committee-room intended to be its grave. The cost of this wicked and foolish expenditure is said to be two hundred thousand dollars; but the true amount will never be known until the dominant party shall have been driven from power, and until the people send new agents to investigate the great wrongs which have been perpetrated against them by those who have been acting in their name. Will not every farmer in the land understand, will not every merchant and mechanic and laboring man in the land understand, that the abuses which exist in this Government can only be corrected by driving the men from power who have been for eight long years to their armpits in the national Treasury?

Now, sir, why should the expenditures of this Government for the year 1867-68 amount to one hundred and forty-eight million dollars more than when the Democratic party was in power during the year 1860? Why, sir, during the decade from 1850-51 to 1860-61 the average expenditures of the Government amounted to only fifty-two million dollars, and yet this audacious party, this party of false pretenses, when the Representatives of the people rise in their places in this House and ask for an investigation, dare to refuse to allow an investigation to be had.

Now, sir, these are facts the people wish to know; these are facts the people have a right to know, and if I know my countrymen, as I think I do know them, they are facts which will be investigated by the Forty-First Congress, to which body I will have the honor to belong.

Now, I desire to call your attention to another startling fact. We are told in the report of the Special Commissioner of Revenue, (see page 27,) sent to the Senate of the United States on the 3d day of January, 1867, that—which is nine mills on the dollar, or only ninety cents to every one hundred dollars, on the general valuation of property. This estimate is not based upon the taxes directly collected from the people, but it is the general amount raised from all the sources of taxation, direct and indirect.

"Assuming the value of the real and personal property of the United States to have increased since 1860, the date of the last census, sufficient to compensate for all the losses and depreciations growing out of the war, the ratio of taxation to property the last fiscal year, was three and ninety-three hundredths per cent."

Nearly four cents on the dollar, or four dollars on every hundred dollars of property, while—

"During the same year the estimated ratio of taxation to property in Great Britain was nine tenths of one per cent."

It has been truly said—

"We are taxed for our clothing, our meat, and our bread.
On our carpets and dishes, our table and bed,
On our tea and our coffee, our fuel and lights,
And we're taxed so severely that we can't sleep
o' nights."

"We are stamped on our mortgages, checks, notes, and bills,
On our deeds, on our contracts, and on our last wills;
And the star-spangled banner in mourning doth wave
O'er the wealth of the nation turned into the grave."

"We are taxed on our offices, our stores, and our shops,
On our stoves, on our barrels, on our brooms and our mops,
On our horses and cattle, and if we should die
We are taxed on our coffins in which we must lie."

"We are taxed on all goods by kind Providence given;
We are taxed for the Bible that points us to Heaven;
And when we ascend to the heavenly goal,
You would, if you could, stick a stamp on our soul."

It is an astounding fact that in proportion to the wealth of the two nations the taxes in the United States to-day are more than four times as great as they are in Great Britain. And yet, sir, England supports the largest navy the world has ever seen; in England there is a monarchy; in England there are princes of the royal blood whose pensions amount to millions; in England there is a proud and haughty aristocracy. And all this disadvantage on our part has been the result of the reckless profligacy of the Republican party. I beg the masses of the Republicans to pardon me for saying the Republican party, for it is the leaders who are alone responsible. And when they shall leave their seats, after the adjournment of this Congress, go back to the people, it will behoove the people to call them to a stern account; it will behoove the people to require these gentlemen to say why it was that when resolutions were introduced into this body by the minority to investigate fraud and speculation and profligacy that investigation was denied. I will say further, Mr. Chairman, that I hold in my hand the report of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue, and that the facts that I have stated upon the subject of taxation and the expenditures of the Government are official, and if any gentleman doubts their accuracy I challenge him now to say so. Why, sir, who ever heard when the Democratic party was in power of a man being compelled to pay a tax and put a stamp upon his promissory note when executed by him? Who ever heard, when the Democratic party was in power, of there being a threefold tax on every pair of boots? Who ever heard when the Democratic party was in power of every article worn by every citizen, male and female, old and young, paying a threefold tax?

Sir, for all these evils the Republican party is responsible. It is the result of their maladministration of the affairs of the Government. They have been looking after their own individual interests, to the neglect of the best interests of the country. From being poor, many of them have suddenly become enormously rich. In every large town and in every city men who were not worth ten thousand dollars in 1860 are now worth their millions. And where do their millions come from? From the toil and sweat and labor of the people.

These are the abuses which afflict our country; these are the abuses which demand redress; these are the abuses which oppress our people, and cause them, when they lay their heads upon their pillows at night, to doubt how the tax-gatherer will be paid when he comes around in the morning.

Sir, we certainly hear gentlemen from the New England States tell us that the commerce of the United States is only half as great to-day as it was in 1860, when the Democratic party was in power. During this period of eight years the Democratic party have borne cheerfully their share of the burdens of the Government without having the slightest influence in its administration. We saw the evils; we denounced the maladministration of the rulers of the people; but, carried away by party passion and party prejudice, they turned a deaf ear to the truth, and refused to listen to the warning of their real friends, until at length the whole country has become covered over, as if by an Egyptian plague, with tax-gatherers, tax inspectors, tax collectors, tax assessors, and tax spies.

Sir, I was speaking of the cries which have come from New England in regard to the prostrate commerce of our country. If our commerce is prostrate, if our tonnage has fallen off more than one half, who is responsible for it but those who have had the control of the legislation of the country? Why has our commerce fallen off? I will give you some of the reasons. The Republican party has spent the last three years in attempting to perpetuate its own power instead of legislating for the benefit of the people. They have been forgetful of the people, forgetful of the country. The leaders of that party have shown themselves ambitious, selfish, and unpatriotic, though "loyal;" for "loyalty" means adhesion to party without regard to the interests of the country. This party, having the entire control of the legislation of the country, are, I say, responsible for the maladministration which has stricken down our commerce.

Why, sir, from the southern States alone, where one great source of our commerce has been found—from the southern States alone, during 1866, we exported cotton to the value of two hundred million dollars. By the policy pursued by the Republican party, not accidentally but intentionally, that great trade has been paralyzed; and now, three years after the close of the war, we only send abroad seventeen per cent. as much cotton as we did during the Democratic rule. And thus there has been drawn from our commerce in that single article alone more than fifty-four thousand bales of cotton a year.

To encourage the growth of this article what have these enlightened statesmen done? Why, sir, they imposed a tax on cotton lands amounting to twelve dollars on the acre by way of encouraging the growth of cotton! The tax was three cents on each pound of cotton, which amounts to a tax of twelve dollars per acre. What will the farmers of the country say when they learn that you impose a tax of twelve dollars an acre on the farmers of the South? And if you have the right to tax the southern farmers on every pound of cotton how long will it be—should the people continue your lease of power—how long will it be before you impose a direct tax on every bushel of wheat and corn grown in the North?

And what is the result of this blind and stupid policy toward the South? The Special Commissioner of Internal Revenue tells us that a single district in the State of New York pays into the Federal Treasury twice as much internal revenue as is paid by the whole of the eleven southern States. Why is this? Because, instead of legislating for the people of the country, instead of legislating in behalf of the industry and commerce of the nation, the leaders of the Republican party have pursued but one object—to keep the control of the Treasury and to retain political power. Then, I repeat the charge, that the leaders of the Republican party are responsible for the burden of taxation which rests upon the people; that they are responsible for this appalling debt of six thousand five hundred million dollars! What mind can appreciate that amount? One might as well attempt to count the stars in the heavens, to number the leaves of the forest, or the grains of sand upon the sea shore.

Mr. DRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield to me for one word?

Mr. MORGAN. With pleasure, for a question.

Mr. DRIGGS. I understood the gentleman to say, a few minutes ago, that he expected, from my remarks, that if I would remain here a few minutes longer and listen to his argument I would become a convert to his party. I must confess that his arguments during the last five or ten minutes are very far from convincing me.

Mr. MORGAN. I yielded to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. DRIGGS. I understood the gentleman to say that the Republican party is responsible for all the taxes, all the stamps, all the tax collectors through the country.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the question the gentleman desires to ask?

Mr. DRIGGS. The question is this: I want to ask the gentleman if he candidly believes that the sweeping statement is correct that he has made in regard to the Republican party being responsible for bringing on the war, and for all the taxes, stamps, and tax collectors with which the country is now infested?

Mr. MORGAN. Why, sir, I am astonished that a gentleman of intelligence—one of the recognized leaders of the Republican party—should propound to me such a question, with the history of the last eight years before him; with the history of the Republican party in the miscalled peace convention demanding blood; with the voice of his Senator [Mr. CHANDLER] still sounding in his ears, demanding that blood should be shed.

Sir, the truth of history demands that I should say that the war was caused by the two extremes, North and South; that they mutually involved the whole country in the horrors of civil war. The leaders of the Republican party in the North are not alone responsible for the war. Jefferson Davis is equally responsible, I grant, with BENJAMIN WADE, and Robert E. Lee. No, I doubt if he is equally responsible with Wendell Phillips, but Mr. Yancey was. It was the leaders of the Republican party in the North who are responsible, with the radical leaders of the South; and let me tell you that to-day Wendell Phillips is not only your leader, but your master. Sir, the honorable gentleman who propounded to me that question is one of that class of individuals given over to hardness of heart, and is beyond the power of political regeneration.

There are a class of people so tenacious in adhering to their own views that they would rather starve or die than admit that they had been wrong. Look at the Republican party at the present moment. Who are responsible for the wheels of legislation having been stopped during the last three months? Why is it, sir, that during the last three months, while merchants, manufacturers, business men of all kinds have been calling upon Congress to legislate for the interests of the country we have been lying here idle, doing absolutely worse than nothing? I ask the question, and as there is no reply I will answer it. These three months have been given up to adjusting a quarrel in the Republican party—a quarrel between a Republican President and a Republican Congress.

But, sir, not only does the Republican party now in power in both branches of Congress wage war against the President whom they themselves elected, but they have threatened to impeach the Chief Justice of the United States, whom they themselves elevated to the high position he so well fills. This is in harmony with the history of all revolutions. When men become infatuated in the pursuit of revolutionary projects they frequently act more like madmen and demons than like reasonable beings. Yes, sir, I say again that the Republican party is responsible, and will be held to a stern responsibility by the people whom they have betrayed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, Mr. DRIGGS, and Mr. KERR, moved that the gentleman from Ohio be allowed by unanimous consent to proceed with his remarks.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. MORGAN. I thank my colleague, [Mr. ASHLEY.] I thank the other gentlemen for their courtesy in asking to have my time extended, but I have done; and will only express the satisfaction I have experienced at the attention with which honorable gentlemen have been pleased to listen to my remarks. Mr. Chairman, we are all countrymen, and for weal or for woe a common destiny awaits us. And we should try to inspire in the people something of the liberality and wisdom which characterized the Athenians. There was a provision in the Athenian constitution which required every citizen to attend the public council when any question was under debate, and he who failed to attend paid the penalty of a fine. How is it possible, said Solon to the Athenians, for you to know how to vote, unless you hear both sides of the question upon which you are to give your judgment? And I was glad to observe during the past campaign in Ohio that wherever I went—and I had the honor to be in the district of my colleague, [Mr. ASHLEY]—I found the patriotic men of the Republican party coming out in large numbers to hear what was to be said. This was a new feature in Ohio politics, and the result proves how wise it is to hear both sides of every question.

Mr. KERR obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio) having resumed the chair, Mr. MAYNARD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. KERR. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BECK: The petition of the tobacco and cigar manufacturers and merchants of the city of Lexington, Kentucky, praying that the tax may not be increased as proposed in the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. COVODE: The petition of 90 citizens of Indiana county, Pennsylvania, setting forth that the productive interests of the country are suffering and its industry paralyzed for want of efficient protection against the cheap capital and labor of foreign countries; that the manufacturing population cannot continue to pay prices for provisions, even approaching those now realized by agriculturists, while exposed to competition with the Old World under a tariff framed to meet exigencies of a totally different character; that much of the distress now prevalent, and daily increasing, would be relieved by the passage of the tariff bill which failed in the House, March, 1867; and praying Congress to resume consideration of that measure, and enact it into a law at the earliest practical moment.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: A memorial of 88 cigar dealers of Cincinnati, protesting against an increase of tax on cigars.

Also, a memorial of 42 merchants of Cincinnati, protesting against a change of tariff on sugar.

By Mr. FARNSWORTH: The petition of James M. Catlett, of Catlett's Station, for removal of political disabilities.

By Mr. GETZ: The petitions of 18 manufacturing firms and companies of Reading, Pennsylvania, employing when in full operation 3,201 workmen, now employing 1,451 workmen; also signed by 49 citizens of said place, setting forth that the productive interests of the country are suffering, and its industry paralyzed, for want of efficient protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries; that in prospect of a continued decline in gold, customs duties, at present inadequate, must shortly prove ruinous; that the manufacturing population cannot continue to pay prices for provisions even approaching those now realized by agriculturists, while exposed to competition with the Old World under a tariff framed to meet exigencies of a totally different character; that much of the prevalent and daily increasing distress would be relieved by the legislation suggested by Special Commissioner Wells, as perfected in the tariff bill, (passed by the Senate,) which failed in the House, March, 1867; and praying that Congress will resume consideration of that measure, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petitions of 7 manufacturing firms and companies of Berks county, Pennsylvania, employing, when in full operation, 998 workmen, now employing 559 workmen, signed, also, by 43 citizens of said county, setting forth that the productive interests of the county are suffering for the want of efficient protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries; that the customs duties which, under a high gold premium, invited the investment of capital and labor in manufactures, have become inadequate, and, in prospect of a continued decline in gold, must shortly prove ruinous; that much of the distress now prevalent, and daily increasing, would be relieved by the legislation suggested in the report of Special Commissioner Wells, and embodied in the tariff bill, which failed in the House March, 1867; and praying that Congress will resume the consideration of that measure and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petitions of 162 citizens of Reading, and elsewhere, in the county of Berks, and State of Pennsylvania, complaining of the insufficiency of customs duties to afford efficient protection against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries, and praying that Congress will resume consideration of the tariff bill which failed in the House of Representatives March, 1867, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. KOONTZ: The petition of manufacturers of Bedford and Franklin counties, Pennsylvania, employing, when in full operation, 135 workmen, now employing 135 workmen, setting forth that the industry of the country is suffering for want of efficient protection against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries, that customs duties, sufficient under a high gold premium, have become inadequate, and in prospect of a continual decline in gold must shortly prove ruinous; that much of the distress now prevailing would be relieved by the passage of the tariff bill which failed in the House March, 1867, for want of time; and praying that Congress will resume consideration of that measure and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. McCARTHY: The petition of 50 cigar manufacturers, dealers, journeymen, makers, and growers of tobacco, of Syracuse, New York, against the proposed increase of taxation on cigars, and asking the substitution of revenue stamps in place of inspector's stamps.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: The petition of 61 manufacturing companies and firms of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, 50 of whom employ, when in full operation, 14,190 workmen, and now employ 7,350 workmen, representing that the productive interests of the country are suffering and its industry paralyzed for want of efficient protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries; that customs duties sufficient under a high gold premium to invite the investment of capital and labor in manufactures have become inadequate, and, in prospect of a continued decline in gold, must shortly prove ruinous; that the manufacturing population cannot continue to pay prices for provisions, even approaching those now realized by agriculturists, while exposed to competition with the Old World, under the existing tariff; that much of the distress now prevalent, and daily increasing, would be relieved by the legislation suggested in Special Commissioner Wells's report of last year and perfected in the tariff bill, as passed by the Senate, which failed in the House March, 1867, and praying Congress to resume consideration of that measure and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petitions of 47 coal-mining companies and firms, of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, employing, when in full operation, 3,360 workmen, now employing a less number, representing that the productive interests of the country are suffering and its industry paralyzed for want of efficient protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries: that the customs duties, which, under a high gold premium were sufficient to foster manufactures, have become inadequate, and must shortly prove ruinous; that much of the distress now prevalent and daily increasing would be relieved by the legislation suggested in Special Commissioner Wells's report and perfected in the tariff bill, as passed by the Senate, which failed in the House March, 1867, for want of time, and praying that Congress will resume the consideration of that measure and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petition of Atterburg & Company, manufacturers of glass in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, setting forth that they employ, when in full operation, 123 workmen, and now employ 62; also signed by citizens of said place, complaining that the productive interests of the country are suffering and its industry paralyzed for the want of efficient protection against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries, and praying that Congress will resume consideration of the tariff bill which failed in the House, March, 1867, for want of time, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. SCOFIELD: The petitions of manufacturers of Erie and of coal companies of McKean county, Pennsylvania, employing, when in full operation, 375 workmen, now employing 145 workmen, complaining that the productive interests of the country are suffering for want of adequate protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries, and praying Congress to resume consideration of the tariff bill, as passed by the Senate, which failed in the House, March, 1867, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. UPSON: The petition of S. L. Conkling and 9 others, citizens of Coldwater, Michigan, remonstrating against increasing the tax on cigars.

By Mr. WOODWARD: The petition of 224 coal-workers at Pittston, Pennsylvania, setting forth that owing to foreign competition their industry is greatly depressed, and many of the trade are out of employment, and praying for additional protective duties.

Also, the petition of 44 workers in the mines at Eckly, Luzerne county, Pennsylvania, praying for additional protective duties.

Also, the petition of J. D. Traphagan and 34 others, iron-workers at Carbondale, Pennsylvania, setting forth that owing to foreign competition their industry is greatly depressed, and many of the trade are out of employment, and praying for additional protective duties.

Also, the petition of 333 workers in Hazleton, Luzerne county, Pennsylvania, setting forth that owing to foreign competition their industry is greatly depressed, and many of the trade are out of employment, and praying for additional protective duties.

Also, the petition of 518 coal-workers in the northern district of Hazel Township, Luzerne county, Pennsylvania, setting forth that owing to foreign competition their industry is greatly depressed, and many of the trade are out of employment, and praying for additional protective duties.

Also, the petition of 45 workers in coal and iron at Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, praying for additional protective duties.

Also, the petition of 5 mining firms and companies of Pittston, Pennsylvania, employing when in operation 1,181 workmen, and now idle or working but part of the time, praying for the passage of the tariff bill which passed the Senate but not the House in 1867.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 1, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have received from the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, for presentation to the Senate, a joint resolution of a very peculiar character, and yet I deem it my duty to present it to the Senate, as it has received the sanction of a majority of the Legislative Assembly. It is entitled "A joint resolution protesting against efforts to tamper with the members of the high court of impeachment." It recites that "A violent outside pressure is publicly and shamelessly being brought to influence members of the court to render a decision without regard to their oaths to try the case impartially according to the law and the evidence;" therefore, they resolve—

"That we solemnly protest, in the name of the people of this State, against all efforts to tamper with the members of the court, and denounce as infamous and unprecedented in American history, and an outrage on the right of an accused party to a fair trial, every attempt to browbeat and force Senators acting as sworn judges to render a judgment contrary to their conscientious convictions of what the law and evidence in the case may require."

These persons were evidently very anxious to have the Senators from the State of Ohio vote against the conviction of the President. Now, Mr. President, as you and I are the only persons who will be affected by this resolution, as I do not believe anybody has approached you to browbeat you and force you to vote in favor of acquittal, and I know no one has made such approaches to me—

Mr. POMEROY. What party is that from?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a resolution from the Legislature of Ohio, the Democratic party, who protest against influences brought to bear to induce us to vote against acquittal. I think, on the whole, although the resolution is rather extraordinary in its character, it had better be sent to the committee of which the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] is chairman, and let them ascertain, if possible, whether any such threats or force have been exercised to induce you and me, sir, to vote against conviction. I move that the resolution be referred to the select committee on threats and intimidation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. YATES presented a petition of mechanics and other laboring men of Chicago, Illinois, praying the passage of a law making eight hours a day's work in all Government workshops; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the petition of Robert Murray, jr., praying that an American register may be granted to the Hamburg brig Blohn, now called by him the brig Oliver Cutts; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of Moses Van Name and others, owners of the schooner M. Van Name, of New York, for damages caused to her by the revenue-cutter Nemeha; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

RECOMMITTAL OF A REPORT.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Ordered, That the report of the Committee on Claims in the case of Wyly Woodbridge be recommitted to that committee.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1117) to supply partial deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1868, reported it with an amendment.

REPORT OF J. ROSS BROWNE.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, from whom I reported a resolution the other day for the printing of the report of J. Ross Browne, instructed me to report an amendment which I carelessly omitted. It is embodied in this resolution which I now report, to which I think there will be no objection. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which is as follows:

Resolved, That the Congressional Printer be authorized, under such regulations as he may deem requisite for the public interest, to loan to J. Ross Browne the stereotype plates of his "report on the mineral resources of the States and Territories west of the Rocky mountains," with permission to print from the same such number of copies as he may desire.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I merely desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are many stereotype plates in the possession of the Government, for the use of which applications have been made and refused. I believe in the case of the Pacific railroad surveys applications have been made by publishers for the plates, and they have been refused. So in regard to the plates of the Japan expedition report, publishers have desired to obtain them, but hitherto they have been invariably refused. It seems to me that we ought not to establish one rule in one case and a different rule in another.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, this is for the author of the work himself. I think it would be a very safe rule to allow the author of any report to have the plates. We print this book for gratuitous distribution. He proposes to print some and distribute them without expense to the Government. For my part, I would be very glad if he would print the whole edition himself, and I should have no objection to loaning any stereotype plates, from which books have been printed for gratuitous distribution, to any publisher who would print them in proper style and with accuracy. Of course, in that way he would be able to lay them before the public at a cheaper rate than they could buy them if printed from type originally set up. I think there can be no abuse in this case.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 506) for the payment of the claim of Charles A. Sumner and William M. Cutter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

THANKS TO SECRETARY STANTON.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, the Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution, submitted by him on the 28th of May:

Resolved, by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the thanks of Congress are due, and are hereby tendered, to Hon. Edwin M. Stanton for the great ability, purity, and fidelity to the cause of the country with which he has discharged the duties of Secretary of War, as well amid the open dangers of a great rebellion as at a later period when assailed by the Opposition, inspired by hostility to the measures of justice and pacification provided by Congress for the restoration of a real and permanent peace.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When this resolution was presented the other day by the Senator from Vermont, I objected to its immediate consideration, as I wished to look into the phraseology of it. Although I think it is an unusual thing for Congress to express its thanks to any public officer for the discharge of purely civil duties, I did not care to object to the resolution upon that account; but as I heard the resolution read, I thought the draftsman in the latter part of it undertook to give it somewhat of a political character, which I supposed was not necessary for any just and proper purpose on the part of Congress in an effort to express thanks to a public officer. That part of the resolution to which I refer is as follows:

"As at a later period when assailed by the Opposition, inspired by hostility to the measures of justice and pacification provided by Congress for the restoration of a real and permanent peace."

I do not know very well, Mr. President, to what particular acts of the Secretary of War that part of the resolution refers. I do not know in what respect the execution of the acts mentioned here came under the control and the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War. I thought the execution of those acts was more particularly placed under the control of the General of the Army; so that I do not know what it is intended to compliment by that part of the resolution, nor do I know what particular assaults have been made upon the Secretary of War because of any of his acts in that regard. What has the Secretary of War done in regard to what are known as the reconstruction acts which "the Opposition," as it is expressed in this resolution, have particularly found fault with? I do not know, sir. It seems to me these are simply words which are used without any particular meaning. While the draftsman was employed in preparing the resolution, a particular aspect was desired to be given to the subject, and therefore this language is inserted. That Mr. Stanton has been the subject of severe criticism for the last few months cannot be questioned, but not in regard to his conduct in the execution of the reconstruction acts. The severest criticism that has been made upon his conduct was in advance, and made in the Senate, not by the Opposition, as I understand, but by distinguished Senators who belonged to the same political party with himself. The criticisms that have been made upon Mr. Stanton for the last few months have been made mainly, I think I may say nearly altogether, because he continued in the Cabinet after the President had asked his resignation; and the opinion of the public in regard to that conduct was more emphatically expressed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] than, perhaps, by any persons who have expressed opinions upon it; that it was not becoming, not right for a Cabinet officer to hold that position after he had been properly requested to resign. Whether Senators have changed their opinion in that regard I do not know. I do not believe the country has changed its judgment on the subject.

Mr. President, in my opinion the particular conduct of Mr. Stanton, in refusing to resign under the circumstances, will continue to be the subject of criticism and remark to the country, and of growing and increasing criticism as time shall roll on; and no resolution passed by the Senate of the United States will be sufficiently potent to change the judgment of the country upon that matter. As a member of the President's Cabinet, when called upon to give to the President his advice on the subject, under the solemnities of his position, in giving an opinion called for under the circumstances by the Constitution itself, he said to the President that the tenure-of-office act was unconstitutional, and advised the President to interpose his veto. If unconstitutional it became no law; it was as idle as an expression could be of a popular assembly, and never had the force and sanction of law. After thus advising the President of the United States he chose to hold his office under the claim of right to hold it under that law; and this country has been much distracted, its quiet, its business much disturbed, the course of trade and commerce disturbed by the very controversy which he brought upon the country by claiming to hold an office by conduct which the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Oregon said was in bad taste, and also to hold it under a law that he had advised that same President could be no law. In my judgment no act of the Senate of the United States can relieve him from the position in which he has thus placed himself.

I therefore do not choose to consent that a resolution of the Senate, without some objection on my part, shall be passed, which undertakes to indorse a piece of conduct which the Senate in advance condemned, which his own advice to the President of the United States condemned. That Mr. Stanton was an able Cabinet minister I have never questioned. That he gave great force, power, and energy to the prosecution of the war, I, as cheerfully as any Senator here, concede; and to express that opinion gives me pleasure. In my judgment, during the progress of the war, toward its close, he was held by many persons in the country responsible for acts which I believe others did without his authority; acts which will be condemned in history; acts of violence and wrong and disregard to law which will be condemned in history, but which, in my opinion, in many instances are not to be charged upon him. But, sir, when it is undertaken to indorse his conduct in bringing upon the country that agitation which so recently has disturbed it, much to the prejudice of its business interests, I will not concur in such a resolution.

For the purpose of understanding that last clause of the resolution and expressing my views upon it, I objected the other day. To a resolution expressing the judgment of the Senate of the ability of that officer during the progress of the war, I make no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the time in the morning hour does not permit any extensive debate on this subject; therefore I will occupy less than five minutes in saying what I desire to say in reply to my distinguished friend from Indiana. He has said what I should have expected him to say of Mr. Stanton's conduct during the war. Do we not all know that Mr. Stanton had no more vigorous supporter during the war in his efforts to assist President Lincoln in putting down this rebellion than was to be found in the person of my friend from Indiana; and do we not all know that he had in the country no stronger supporters than the distinguished party that my friend represents from Indiana? I presume my friend near me, on my left, [Mr. MORTON,] who was in Indiana at that time, knows the vigorous aid that the Democratic party, represented by my friend over the way, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] in that particular State gave us in the trying times; and so my friend has said, what I should have expected him to say, words of praise and encouragement and thankfulness for the vigor of the intellect and the strength of the hand that ruled the military operations of the country during that time, as well in the States that were a little north of the border, where treason was lurking, as in any of those that were somewhat south of it. We concur, then, that the thanks of Congress are due to Mr. Stanton for the eminent, I might say the preëminent, services he performed during those dark times of trial.

But my friend from Indiana finds cause of complaint in the concluding clause of the resolution which declares that he also deserves the thanks of Congress for his administration of the War Department at a later period than the war when he was assailed by opposition, inspired by hostility, not to his holding the office, but inspired by hostility to the measures of reconstruction Congress had enacted. Now, sir, is not that true? Is there any man who disputes it? The difficulty with Mr. Stanton was, in the eyes of the President of the United States and of some of his associates, that he desired to maintain the law; that he desired to have carried out the measures of reconstruction in the spirit in which Congress had passed them, when the President of the United States desired that they should be defeated, if possible; and, therefore, it was as early as 1866 that Mr. Stanton knew, and the public knew, and the President knew, that the cause of difference and the reason of the President desiring Mr. Stanton to retire then and ever since was the fact that Mr. Stanton was the willing agent of Congress speaking through the law, when the President desired a Cabinet officer in that position who should be otherwise.

When a question of that kind arises, Mr. President, between a minister of the law and the chief executor of it, what is to be done? Is the minister and the law with him to go down, or is he to execute the law? This, sir, was the sole cause of the President's woe, that Mr. Stanton remained in the Cabinet, as my friend calls it, remained attending to his duties as Secretary of War; that the President was determined that those acts, beginning with the civil rights bill and the Freedmen's Bureau bill, for which the country may thank my friend from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] as well as General Howard, and coming down through all those measures to this time, were believed in by Mr. Stanton, and the President did not believe in them; and so believing in them, although he considered the tenure-of-office bill, as my friend says, when it passed unconstitutional, it having passed by the majority which the Constitution requires to make it a law he felt bound to obey it as a law instead of assisting the President to overthrow it as a law. And this is one marked difference between the two men—between the views of the two men, I should say, because I mean to say nothing offensive to the President personally; I am merely criticising his position and his opinions. That being the case, sir, and that being the reason, as we all know, why this minister stood at his post as the faithful agent of that law which we had passed at a time when it was a greater trial to him than it was when he bore the whole burden of the military operations of the country as its chief administrative officer during the war, because it was at a time when those feelings which are common to us all would have led him personally (as he desired personally, to my own knowledge,) to retire at once; and yet, in spite of those feelings, under a sense of public duty, he stayed at his post as the country wanted him to do, and as I believe half a million majority of the citizens of the United States, if they could have their way, would vote to restore him to-day. It is, sir, for that, for one, that I propose to thank him; and for that I think the country will thank him at a later period even than that to which my friend from Indiana refers.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, can the resolution be divided, so as that the vote can be had on the first clause?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is incapable of division.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is it susceptible of division in the vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a whole, and must be voted on as a whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have it read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let it be read, to see whether it is divisible.

The resolution was read.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I cannot afford to let this opportunity go by without saying something in regard to Mr. Stanton. During the war I occupied a position which brought me into intimate official relations with Mr. Stanton, and gave me good opportunities of judging in regard to his ability, his decision of character, and his patriotism. I think, Mr. President, that the country now has but an imperfect comprehension of the great services which Mr. Stanton rendered to the nation during the prosecution of the war. Mr. Stanton displayed, in my opinion, remarkable powers of intellect. He comprehended from the very beginning the magnitude of the contest, which a great many of our public men failed to do, and the preparations which he made for carrying on the war were commensurate with the necessities of the Government and the condition of the country. Mr. Stanton's preparations were almost of the most ample character. I think he displayed very great executive ability in furnishing not only men, but in furnishing materiel of war, and placing it promptly at the point where it was needed. Mr. Stanton displayed great courage in the administration of his office. There was no responsibility that he was not willing to take if he believed that the success of the Union Army and the good of the country demanded it. He was exceedingly prompt in the discharge of his duties. His intellectual operations were not only accurate, but they were exceedingly rapid. Mr. Stanton lacked the arts of the politician. He never cultivated the art of pleasing. He would transact a very large amount of business in a day; but it was done by going right to the point of the subjects which the different parties presented to him.

I have been present when business was presented to Mr. Stanton, and when men were laying before him, in what they regarded as a studied and perhaps a clear statement, the thing which they wanted done or not done, and Mr. Stanton's intellectual operations were so rapid that long before the man got to the end of the story he would comprehend the point, and decide it either for him or against him; and if he decided against the person he would go away and swear that Mr. Stanton refused him a hearing, or that he decided the case without having understood the question, whereas his intellectual operations were so rapid and accurate that he anticipated the very statements which were made to him, and in this way often made enemies and brought down censure upon his own head. But he would work in his office eighteen hours out of the twenty-four, and transact an amount of business that was perfectly incredible. I will not undertake to say that other men could not have been found who would have conducted the affairs of the War Office as successfully as Mr. Stanton did, but the chances were against finding them. He performed great services for his country, and if it had not been for his ability, his comprehensiveness, his great labor, the accuracy of his intellectual conclusions, and above all the courage that he displayed in carrying out what he believed the interests of the country demanded, it is hard to tell what might have been the result of the war.

I will say, in justice to the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] whom Mr. Stanton succeeded, that his views of the character of the contest, of its immense magnitude, were not properly understood at the time he left the office; that he had made provisions in the way of arms and munitions of war which were regarded as extraordinary, and for which he was denounced at the time, but which subsequent events showed had been properly determined upon by him, and his action was justified by subsequent events. Mr. Stanton comprehended from the day he went into that office the work that he had to do, and he gave his whole time to it. I believe that for two years he never left this city, but devoted himself day and night to the discharge of the duties of his office. He was not self-seeking either; he was not paving the way to be a candidate for the presidency, or for any other preferment; he was not trying to please men, either in the Army or out of the Army; but he seemed to me to be actuated by a single desire of discharging his duty to the country, regardless of whom he offended or whom he pleased. I would speak longer, but I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] call for a division of the resolution?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I asked the Chair if it could be divided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There seem to be two clauses to it, but the Chair is not certain that it can be divided.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to strike out the latter clause, that part of the resolution beginning with the words "as well."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

As well amid the open dangers of a great rebellion

as at a later period when assailed by the Opposition, inspired by hostility to the measures of justice and pacification provided by Congress for the restoration of a real and permanent peace.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to offer an amendment, which I think will obviate the objection. It is in the sixth line, to strike out the word "has," and in the seventh line to strike out the words "as well," and then to strike out all after the word "rebellion," in the eighth line, so as to make the resolution read:

That the thanks of Congress are due, and are hereby tendered, to Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, for the great ability, purity, and fidelity to the cause of the country with which he discharged the duties of Secretary of War amid the open dangers of a great rebellion.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I prefer the original resolution to the amendment. It is more positive and direct, and expresses more fully my views at any rate. I desire to say here that I have approved the whole course of Mr. Stanton in the War Department, and I have regretted greatly that circumstances compelled him to leave it. I think he has been one of the most faithful, efficient, and able officers this Government has ever had in any Department. I take some pride in saying this, because Mr. Stanton went into the War Department upon my suggestion. He was no applicant for the place, and never dreamed of getting it until it was offered to him, and nobody applied to Mr. Lincoln on his behalf but myself. I had known him for years; known him as a lawyer and as a friend. I recommended him because I thought he had great ability, and because from conversations with him I was satisfied that he understood the magnitude of the war, and especially from my conversations with him had I discovered that he believed, as I did, that the rebellion could not be put down without the use of the negro element. He agreed with me fully, even at that early day, in the importance of arming the negro and making him a great element in the power which was to destroy the slave masters. To my mind, at that day, the war could not be closed without that element; and I think circumstances have fully justified that opinion entertained by myself and Mr. Stanton. During his administration of the War Department I believe about two hundred thousand negroes were employed in the Army, and they were employed just at the time when the crisis was upon us, and when but for them the enemy would probably have succeeded in destroying the Government.

Having had these views from the first I have naturally observed Mr. Stanton's course throughout; and I believe, as I have said, that we could have had no more faithful, no more able man there. I doubt whether there could be discovered in the whole country a man so well fitted for the place. In addition to his great ability he had a physical strength and a power of endurance which few men have. I was myself almost brought to the grave by the labors which I underwent there, and could not have lived there six months longer. I believed so then, and think so now. Very few men could have undergone, not only the great fatigue of the office, but the terrible pressure which was made on men occupying that office by their friends and their foes. The great difficulty I had was the annoyance of my friends who wished me to give them the patronage of the Department. They were a great deal more troublesome to me and did me a great deal more harm than my enemies, for I think a brave man can always fight and successfully battle with his enemies, but it takes a stronger man than I am to fight with everybody who claims friendship, and many of whom have a right to claim it. I think Mr. Stanton was peculiarly fitted for the place, because he had not been in public life; he had never been engaged in politics, except that he was appointed to and occupied for a short time the place of Attorney General under Mr. Buchanan. In that position he did great service to the country, because his patriotism pointed out at once to him the improper course of his chief, and he wisely and bravely stood out against it.

I think that the nation has lost a brave public servant and that a great wrong has been done to the country by forcing Mr. Stanton to leave that place, and I regret that he has determined, for the sake of his health, for the sake of his impaired fortune, to take no public place hereafter. I know of no man who could so ably fill any place under the Government as I think he could.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I hope that there will be no amendment made to the resolution presented by the Senator from Vermont, and that we shall pass the resolution exactly as it has been submitted. I think Mr. Stanton deserves this praise at the hands of the Senate, and all of it, and much more from the voice of the country whom he has served so ably and so well. History, sir, will record his efficient services in prosecuting the war to put down the rebellion, and there will be no public man in the history of the United States in this age whose name will shine with greater luster upon that page than the name of Edwin M. Stanton. We owe to him much more than I can mention here, for his great services, his fidelity, his activity, his magnanimity, his persevering courage in putting down the rebellion while the rebellion was flagrant. But, sir, in saying this I do not underestimate that other service which he has rendered to the country since the close of the war. I look upon no act of his as more patriotic or magnanimous than the stern and unflinching opposition which he conscientiously found it his duty to make to that policy of the President of the United States which, if it had prevailed, would have resulted really and practically in the establishment of the rebels themselves in power in the insurgent States; and it was on account of this stern opposition of his that he was requested so modestly to resign his place by Mr. Johnson. Sir, he refused to resign, and why? For the reason that in case of his own resignation and the vacation of his office in that manner some person might be appointed by Johnson to fill his place who would be disposed to assist in carrying out that most destructive policy which had been launched by President Johnson and other members of his Cabinet in the year 1865. Hinc illæ lachrymæ. He was determined that the laws of reconstruction as passed by Congress, so far as depended on him, should be faithfully, honestly, and efficiently carried out, for the purpose of establishing a permanent peace at the South and securing for all time to come the fidelity and loyalty of the southern people to the Constitution of the United States. He saw, as clearly as you and I did, sir, that without the effectuation of this policy there was danger, great danger of a recurrence of the rebellion itself and the ultimate disruption of the Union.

The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] makes it matter of grave complaint against him that he did not resign his place when requested, but stood upon the tenure-of-office act. Sir, it was his duty, as an honorable man, entertaining the views which he did, still to stand at his post and to endeavor to carry out the reconstruction policy of Congress. He was under no obligation to resign his place at the request of the President of the United States; but, on the other hand, if public duty required him to remain at his post, he was bound so to remain; and I tell you, sir, and I tell other gentlemen in this Chamber, especially those who are so much inclined to censure Mr. Stanton, that there is no act even in his life which will redound more to his honor as a man and a statesman than his refusal to resign his place at the request of Mr. Johnson, and thus abandon the reconstruction policy of Congress.

Time will not allow me to proceed further. I might, however, allude to the false charges which were brought against Mr. Stanton by the President in the message which he sent to the Senate announcing to us that he had suspended

Mr. Stanton from office. I might allude to the false accusation brought against that pure and incorruptible Secretary of War, that he, the Secretary, was really and effectually responsible for the New Orleans massacre of 1866, an event which, according to the best proofs that have been obtained, or probably ever will be obtained, is directly attributable to the dispatch of Andrew Johnson of July, 1866, by which the insurgents, the Thugs, and murderers of New Orleans were let loose to do their bloody work upon the convention which was then in session. Sir, in respect to that matter, let me say that no fault lies at the door of Edwin M. Stanton. If there be fault anywhere in reference to any official at Washington, that fault rests upon the head of the present Executive of the United States, who brought against Mr. Stanton that unfounded and cruel charge. I hope, sir, the resolution will pass as it has been submitted, and not amended.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I wish to add but a word or two to what I felt it to be my duty to say upon this resolution. Senators will observe that I have interposed no objection to the vote, so far as it relates to Mr. Stanton's services as Secretary of War during the rebellion. While I do not approve very much that has been charged against Mr. Stanton during that period, yet there is very much that has been charged against him that is not properly so charged, but that he has been held responsible in popular judgment for very much that was done by others without his authority. But, sir, I wish to know what it is that Mr. Stanton has done since the close of the war that calls upon even the majority in this body for a vote of thanks. A vote of thanks on the part of Congress ought to be for some very distinguished services, not for the ordinary and routine service in a Department, but for that which lifts a man above the age in which he lives, which makes him a marked man, something that has materially contributed to the greatness and superiority of his country. What act of the Secretary of War which he has performed since the close of the rebellion do Senators refer to? I understand the Senator from Michigan now to refer to the policy of the Secretary as opposed to that of the President; that he remained in office for the purpose of defeating the policy of the President of the United States. How does that appear? When Mr. Johnson adopted his policy in the spring and summer of 1865, is it understood that the Secretary of War threw himself against that policy?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When the President of the United States issued the North Carolina proclamation, which was the enunciation of his policy, was that opposed by the Secretary of War?

Mr. HOWARD. It was opposed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, sir, the Secretary of War does not support the statement now made by the Senator from Michigan in the testimony which the Secretary gave before a committee of Congress. Let the Senator refer to that. I refer the Senator to the Secretary's own testimony. He remained in the Cabinet at that time, and there was no public protest made by him, no expression of his opposition to that policy at that time; and, as I understand, it received his approval.

Again, sir, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] referred to his support of the civil rights bill and the Freedmen's Bureau bill as a part of the reconstruction policy. Are Senators prepared to say that those measures received the very cordial support of Mr. Stanton? Do Senators not recollect the speech that Mr. Stanton made in this city shortly after the passage of those laws, in which he evaded the expression of an opinion in regard to them; in which he regarded it as quite sufficient to evade the question? Instead of throwing his voice in favor of the policy of Congress, as expressed in those acts, he said that those acts were passed, and were not now the subject of discussion. I wish to know to what part of the conduct of the Secretary of War since the rebellion Senators can refer as even supporting the policy of Congress with such energy as that it calls for a vote of thanks even by the majority?

Mr. HOWARD. If the honorable Senator will allow me a moment—I will interrupt but a moment—if the Senator will look into the testimony to which he refers he will discover that Mr. Stanton drew up a sort of projet for the reestablishment of the State governments in the South, and that in that projet he incorporated the principle of colored suffrage, which was disagreed to by Mr. Johnson and other members of the Cabinet; but Mr. Stanton insisted from the beginning upon the right and propriety of the negro voting in the rebel States as a matter of security in the future.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I was not to be understood that Mr. Stanton drew up the proclamation, for I understand from the testimony of General Grant that that proclamation was almost word for word with the proclamation that had been drawn up in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet before his death, and that Mr. Johnson simply adopted the proclamation that had been prepared by Mr. Lincoln in his Cabinet, and read twice in that Cabinet before his death.

Mr. HOWARD. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but he is entirely mistaken when he says that that proclamation was drawn up by Mr. Lincoln or in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, or acted upon even by Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet. As a matter of fact that is incorrect.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Why, Mr. President, the Senator had better refresh his memory. I think he had better read the testimony of General Grant, as given before the committee, in which he speaks of having seen that proclamation in President Lincoln's Cabinet, in President Lincoln's presence, twice as he believes, and that he believes that the very language was adopted, and that they just went on to put that through. That is the testimony substantially. I have it not before me, not expecting it to come up, but that is substantially the testimony upon that question. Did Mr. Stanton object to that proclamation when it was issued? Did he not give it the support of the War Department? Was not the War Department brought in support of the policy of Mr. Johnson? And so far as that Department could contribute to it, did not that Department contribute to the establishment of governments in the southern States under Mr. Johnson's policy? Then there is nothing in that part of Mr. Stanton's conduct as a Cabinet officer for which even the majority is called upon to give a vote of thanks.

Then you refer to these other bills, his support of which, to say the least of it, was very equivocal. When I read his speech I could not say with certainty and positiveness whether he was for the civil rights bill or against it, whether he was for the Freedmen's Bureau bill or against it. It seemed to be evasive. This bold Secretary of War at that time was not willing to say that the President was wrong and that Congress was right.

Then, sir, the most marked part of his conduct since the close of the war is in holding on to the office of Secretary of War after he was asked to resign. For what purpose? To control the policy of the southern States. What had he to do with that? What has he done? What order has he issued as Secretary of War which has at all influenced the management of affairs in the southern States? No order of his has controlled in any one of those States, so far as I now recollect. I do not wish to protract this debate, but I say that the conduct of Mr. Stanton in holding on to that office and involving this country in the excitement which has so much disturbed the interests of the people and their composure is not the subject of thanks and commendation, but it will be written down in history as the subject of criticism and of rebuke, in my judgment. If Senators choose to confine this resolution to his policy, his conduct during the rebellion, let it go; but, for one, I do not expect to indorse that which in fact I condemn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to announce that the unfinished business of yesterday is, before the Senate, being the bill for the admission of the State of Arkansas to representation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that that be laid aside informally to allow a vote to be taken on this resolution. If we cannot get a vote in ten minutes or so, I shall not press it further to-day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the special order can be passed over informally for a few minutes, I will not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the special order being passed over informally? No objection being made, it is passed over informally, and the resolution of thanks to Mr. Stanton is before the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, there is no public honor which could be paid to Mr. Stanton that would not be personally gratifying to me and of which I should not think him worthy. I have before said, though not in open session, that, as I conceived, there was no man in this country who, in the events that have gone before in the last seven years, has rendered greater services (if so great) than he has. I can vote with great pleasure for the resolution upon the table in all its parts. I feel some regret, however, that it should be so worded as not to command a unanimous vote of this body, and I could wish that it should receive that vote. But I see, although it is perfectly agreeable to me as it stands, that there are members who cannot give to all parts of it their support. Therefore we must be content with it as it is, and those of us who approve the whole must indorse the whole.

Mr. President, at this late day, and after what has been said, it is not advisable for me to waste time in praising Mr. Stanton. I was, as I have before said, intimate with him from the time that he went into the War Office. I had a chance to know him well, not only to see, as all the world could see, the remarkable energy and ability and purity with which he discharged the duties of that great office, and the services that he was thereby enabled to render to his country at a most trying period, but I could look still further and know, as I did know and feel, the entire disinterestedness of his action, the absence of all personal ambition, the absence of all looking forward to any reward except the approbation of his own conscience and the proud consciousness of rendering great services to his country. If there was any man connected with the Administration, not excepting the President himself, Mr. Lincoln, who served his country merely for love of it and from the desire to save it from the dangers that he saw impending and the difficulties that hung over it, it was he.

Under these circumstances, although it is not customary to pass votes of thanks for civil services, I can, with pleasure, vote for making an exception in this case. But I am more particularly willing to do so, and it is peculiarly fitting, in my judgment, to do so, from the facts that have since transpired. We all know that since the termination of the war Mr. Stanton has occupied a peculiarly trying position; and, sir, as I have before had occasion to say, I think the position in which he has since been placed has developed in him a greatness of character which I did not know he possessed.

It is no trifling matter for a man to stand in a position where the discharge of his duties, as he understands those duties, exposes him every day to misapprehension and obloquy. It is a peculiar position to be placed in for an officer of Government, more especially a member of the Cabinet, so called, to hold on to his office under circumstances when the majority of lookers-on would think that it was his duty, in good taste and delicacy, to retire. And yet, sir, there are higher duties, there are higher considerations applicable to the mind of a public officer than the mere consideration of what others may think of him or what construction others may put upon his acts. If duty requires him to put his character at hazard, it takes a strong man to do it. If duty to a man's country requires him to peril even the favorable consideration (which is so dear to a public man) of his fellow-citizens, it requires a man of more than ordinary strength of character to meet the exigencies and the responsibilities of the occasion. Such has been the position in which Mr. Stanton has been placed, as we all know.

The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] has asked what he has done. Without saying what he has done, we all know the position Mr. Stanton has occupied in relation to the President. The Senator says that on a certain occasion he did not express positive opinions about certain laws which had been passed and vetoed by the President, and repassed over his veto. Sir, he said all that the occasion would allow him to say, that they had passed, and were laws; and he was not called upon to express an opinion in regard to them. I know very well that, although Mr. Stanton thought it his duty to remain in the Cabinet, and to take the consequences which public judgment might pass upon him for remaining there, he held it to be a matter of duty not unnecessarily to place himself in collision with his chief. No man of good taste and of good feeling would do so. The question was whether he would remain and meet the exigencies of the time, avoiding, if possible, all occasions when he might come in collision with the chief whom he served, the head of the Government.

Now, sir, we know that on these matters of reconstruction, whatever might have been Mr. Stanton's original opinion, whatever course of action he might have acceded to at the beginning of this last Administration, from the time when Congress adopted its policy in opposition to the policy of the President Mr. Stanton considered it his duty to stand by that policy of Congress, for he considered that Congress was the proper tribunal to establish a policy on the subject. In that I agreed with him; in that we all agreed with him on this side of the House. Congress was the proper tribunal to establish what policy should be adopted with reference to these confederate States out of the Union, or out of practical relations to the Union. He held that Congress was that tribunal, and that it was his duty and the duty of the executive Government to adopt its policy and follow it and carry it out. This necessarily brought him in collision with the head of the Government, and probably with the rest of the members of the Cabinet, and being in that collision he thought it his duty to remain there. He deemed the crisis to the country to be a very peculiar one. He deemed it the duty of every man, placed as he was, to sacrifice his own wishes, all feelings of delicacy, to what he believed to be a great and overruling contingency. And, sir, for that I honor him. Few men, as I have said, would have the courage and the manliness to do it. He was man enough to do it all.

Under these circumstances, I approve of what is said in the resolution with reference to that very thing. Perhaps it might be worded a little differently, although I do not see that it could be much improved; but the idea is that the fact that he has remained at his post of duty from considerations of the highest public good, willing to risk his great reputation which he had acquired by the unsurpassed services he had rendered in carrying to the end that which he deemed to be for the country's good, entitles him to a still larger measure of our approval.

I take pleasure, sir, in saying these things, because I have had occasion many times to hear matters spoken of that pained me with regard to Mr. Stanton when I knew that he was misunderstood and misrepresented. All that is now dying away. As he retires from that great office the public mind settles down to the consideration of what he has done, what services he has rendered; and I think it peculiarly fitting, under the circumstances of the case, singular as they are, that Congress should give an expression of its approbation to a man who has thus rendered services so distinguished and is now about retiring to private life.

Other circumstances attending his retirement also render it peculiarly proper. I was one of those who could not agree with the majority of my friends, in the recent action, and in the construction which was placed upon the so-called tenure-of-office bill; and will say here that the matter which gave me, perhaps, as much pain as any other thing in disagreeing with my friends was that I was obliged to put myself apparently in a position somewhat in opposition to Mr. Stanton. But, sir, even that I was obliged to get over.

Now, sir, after this action has been had, and the consequence of that action has led to his final retirement from that great office, I deem it even more necessary, and I taken even greater pleasure than perhaps I otherwise might, in this tribute to him. Although I can hardly think of anything that could increase the pleasure I always feel in rendering honor to a man like him, yet I say these peculiar circumstances increase the readiness with which I am willing to meet this resolution and to act upon it; and I hope our friends on the other side of the Chamber, seeing that there is no reflection upon them, or upon their action, either as a party or individually, will yet reconsider the determination which seems to be intimated by my honorable friend from Indiana, and come to the conclusion that on this resolution as it stands they can readily indorse the whole course of this distinguished public officer.

I have said, sir, all perhaps that it is advisable for me to say, and I need not take up further time. I will close, as I began, by saying that I shall take peculiar pleasure in voting for this resolution in the shape in which it stands, or in any other complimentary to Mr. Stanton which it can assume.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I shall occupy the time of the Senate but for a minute or two; and I do this chiefly on account of an apparent misunderstanding between Senators here in relation to the position of Mr. Stanton on the subject of the North Carolina proclamation to which reference has been made. I think it will not be denied by anybody conversant with the facts, that the leading idea of the North Carolina proclamation originated with Mr. Stanton; I do not doubt it was the conception of his own brain. He wished to secure restoration of peace without recognizing the then existing so-called State governments in the rebel States. In his opinion, they could not be recognized without restoring the rebels to power in the States, in Congress, and in the Electoral College. He therefore proposed to Mr. Lincoln, after the surrender of Lee, the establishment of a provisional government in each of the insurrectionary States; and with that view I have no doubt that he prepared a memorandum and submitted it to the late President Lincoln, and that that paper was read several times in Cabinet before the accession to the Presidency of the present incumbent; but I personally know that that feature of the proclamation which has occasioned a diversity of opinion between President Johnson and Congress was not settled on by Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet. The very first executive paper that ever came into my hand as Secretary of the Interior was a copy of that proclamation, or of that paper, as it was said to have been prepared preceding the death of Mr. Lincoln, and all that part of it which related to suffrage was a blank. Mr. Stanton could, therefore, with great truthfulness, say that he approved the North Carolina proclamation; for, so far as relates to its grand purpose, its great object and aim, it was his own conception. But Mr. Stanton has never said that he approved of it in its details as it was afterward published. A majority of President Johnson's Cabinet did not approve of the suffrage clause. I have heretofore stated who dissented. Mr.

Stanton was one of them. He, doubtless, did not then think, as I did not then think, this difference a sufficient cause for resignation. It was then understood that these organizations were to be merely provisional, subject to the future approval of Congress. Mr. Stanton, with all the members of the Cabinet, with the President at its head, so far as anything appeared to the contrary, expected Congress, when it should convene, to control the whole subject. A statement of this much I suppose due to the Secretary of War, since his position seems to be misunderstood.

I wish now only to add that I shall vote very heartily for the resolution for reasons some of which have been and many others that have not been stated. I am aware that Mr. Stanton, during the war, gave offense to many earnest and patriotic friends of the Government. He could not always grant their requests. It frequently became his duty to make unceremonious denials of favors. And he doubtless often said no with a will and an apparent earnestness which seemed to many uncalled for, but which to him seemed a necessity. On this account he was probably more misunderstood by the American people than any one of the great actors in the late rebellion; on this account some have thought him morose, and even hard-hearted, when he is, in fact, one of the most humane, kind-hearted of men. I never made an appeal to him, either as a Senator or as an associate in an executive capacity, in favor of the friendless, of a wounded soldier, of a sick soldier, of a minor soldier boy, or of a subordinate officer that was supposed to be oppressed by his superior, or of the suffering on the field of battle or in the hospitals, that he did not respond to instantly and heartily.

The Senator from Indiana has stated that he knows of nothing that lifts Mr. Stanton above his fellows, nothing great that distinguishes him from the rest of mankind. Well, sir, I know that publicists in discussing the morally sublime sometimes think they find in their heroes traits of character which arouse feelings in the mind of the reader or observer akin to the feelings experienced in contemplating the sublime in nature; such as their superior adhesion to principle, their adhesion to their conceptions of justice, of truth, sometimes of humanity, sometimes on account of their great courage, knowledge, or wisdom, which lifts them above their fellows; but it is certainly not unknown to that Senator that there are characters known to history whose lives are cited as illustrative of the morally sublime concerning whom there is no individual characteristic that particularly distinguishes them. As a marked illustration I name the character of Washington, the Father of his Country. In almost any one characteristic of mind or morals he had at least his equals among thousands of his countrymen of that and subsequent periods; but in the harmonious blending of all elements of character which ennoble and adorn human nature he surpassed the majority of men, and hence all writers refer to the character of Washington as an illustration of the morally sublime; and it is, I fancy, as true in a very marked degree in relation to Mr. Stanton, that he possesses all the qualities of humanity harmoniously combined that lift him above the majority of men.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President—

Mr. CORBETT. I will ask the Senator from Illinois to give way for one moment, as I desire to leave the Senate. I wish to say that a resolution cannot be framed too strong as a tribute to this great man, Edwin M. Stanton. As I have an important engagement, by which I am compelled to leave the Chamber, I desire to say thus much.

Mr. YATES. I can assure the Senate that I do not intend to occupy time, in fact I did not expect that so much time would be taken on this subject. But, sir, as one of the Senators from the State of Illinois, I cannot, in justice to myself, permit the occasion to pass without saying a word or two. I should consider mere eulogy upon the late Secretary of War as out of place at this time were it not that he is the representative, and has been made specially the representative, of great principles.

The State of Illinois raised two hundred and fifty-eight thousand troops during the war, and it is justly due both to the predecessor of Mr. Stanton, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] and to Mr. Stanton himself, that I should say that to their policy, their vigor, and their energy, were we very much indebted for a successful prosecution of the war. The people of the United States, perhaps, have but little appreciation of how very much of our success during the war depended on the persons who occupied that important position.

I have referred to the fact that Illinois raised so many troops during the war for the reason that, as the executive officer of that State, it became necessary for me to make my applications for the raising of troops and the equipping and supplying of troops to these Secretaries of War, and both of them lent their energy and their aid for what we called a vigorous prosecution of the war. When it was said by the Democratic party at that time that we should not forage upon the enemy, that we should not employ colored troops, that we should not raise additional forces, and when they were declaring that this was war against "the Union as it was," it was to these distinguished officers that we applied and obtained necessary means to carry on the war. None who were not brought in immediate contact with them, who were not there to see, know how important their services were. They were ready to adopt those vigorous measures which resulted in the successful prosecution of the war, and the verdict of this country has been pronounced, so far as Edwin M. Stanton is concerned. Whether it be because of the policy which he pursued during the war or during peace, he has established a name as the great organizer of war and victory; he wielded that mighty engine by which millions of our troops were equipped and fed and supplied. He was in his place what we would call a positive man. No application was ever made to him that he did not decide with promptness, and although, as has been remarked, sometimes not to the satisfaction of the applicants, yet, as it has turned out, as subsequent events have proved, his decisions were always dictated by prudence and wisdom. I shall not refer to the course of Mr. Stanton during the late investigations which have been before the Senate, except to say that he has displayed the same energy, the same vigor, the same determination and firmness of purpose, and the same lofty and elevated patriotism that he displayed during the perilous hours of the Republic.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] surprised me when he called in question the accuracy of my recollection in regard to the support Mr. Stanton gave to the Johnson policy. I thought I could not be mistaken, sir; but as the Senator expressed himself so confidently upon it, I felt it to be my duty to send for the evidence that bore upon that question, and I now propose to read briefly from the testimony given by Mr. Stanton himself before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives in its impeachment investigation last year:

"Question. Did any one of the Cabinet express a doubt of the power of the executive branch of the Government to reorganize State governments which had been in rebellion without the aid of Congress?"

"Answer. None whatever. I had myself entertained no doubt of the authority of the President to take measures for the organization of the rebel States on the plan proposed during the vacation of Congress, and agreed in the plan specified in the proclamation in the case of North Carolina. It may be proper to add in regard to the history of this subject, that on the day succeeding the date of the telegram to General Weitzel, and on the last day of Mr. Lincoln's life, there was a Cabinet meeting, at which General Grant and all the members of the Cabinet, except Mr. Seward, were present."

Then he goes on to speak of having drawn up himself a projet:

"I left a blank upon that subject [the subject of suffrage] to be considered. There was at that time nothing adopted about it and no opinions expressed; it was only a projet. I was requested by the other members of the Cabinet, and by Mr. Lincoln, to have a copy printed for each member for subsequent consideration. My object was simply to bring to the attention of the President and Cabinet, in a practical form, what I thought might be possible means of organization without rebel intervention. Mr. Lincoln seemed to be laboring under the impression that there must be some starting point in the reorganization, and that it could only be through the agency of the rebel organizations then existing, but which I did not deem to be at all necessary. That night Mr. Lincoln was murdered. Subsequently, at an early day, the subject came under consideration, after the surrender of Johnson's army, in the Cabinet of Mr. Johnson. The projet I had prepared was printed, and a copy in the hands of each member of the Cabinet and the President. It was somewhat altered in some particulars, and came under discussion in the Cabinet, the principal point of discussion being as to who should exercise the elective franchise. I think there was a difference of opinion in the Cabinet upon that subject. The President expressed his views very clearly and distinctly. I expressed my views, and other members of the Cabinet expressed their views. The objections of the President to throwing the franchise open to the colored people appeared to be fixed, and I think every member of the Cabinet assented to the arrangement as it was specified in the proclamation relative to North Carolina. After that I do not remember that the subject was ever again discussed in the Cabinet."

Again, as to the form, he testifies thus:

"Question. In this connection be good enough to state who prepared that proclamation?"

"Answer. I do not know who prepared it."

"Question. Was it submitted by the President to the Cabinet?"

"Answer. Yes, sir. The projet I had was different in this respect—that mine was in the form of an order. I proposed as an order, 'ordered' so and so. The President modified it by certain recitals which I thought an improvement, and it emanated from the State Department."

"Question. The Cabinet did agree unanimously, as I understood you to say, on the North Carolina proclamation?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; that is, Mr. Johnson's proclamation; and when I say unanimous I mean all who were present. I wish to say this: that I do not desire here to state what other people agreed to; that is what I agreed to, and I do not know of any dissent by any member of the Cabinet."

The same subject is presented in the testimony of General Grant, where this occurs:

"Question. I understood you to say that Mr. Lincoln, prior to his assassination, had inaugurated a policy intended to restore those governments?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. You were present when the subject was before the Cabinet?"

"Answer. I was present. I think, twice before the assassination of Mr. Lincoln, when a plan was read."

"Question. I want to know whether the plan adopted by Mr. Johnson was substantially the plan which had been inaugurated by Mr. Lincoln as the basis for his future action?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; substantially. I do not know but that it was verbatim the same."

"Question. I suppose the very paper of Mr. Lincoln was the one acted on?"

"Answer. I should think so. I think that the very paper which I heard read twice while Mr. Lincoln was President was the one which was carried right through."

Mr. CONKLING. Read the next question and answer, if you please.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am asked to read the next question. I will do so.

"By Mr. CHURCHILL:

"Question. What paper was that?"

"Answer. The North Carolina proclamation."

"By Mr. BOUTWELL:

"Question. You understood that Mr. Lincoln's plan was temporary, to be either confirmed, or a new government set up by Congress?"

"Answer. Yes; and I understood Mr. Johnson's to be so, too."

Mr. CONKLING. That is the point.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is General Grant's expression of his view of the effect of that proclamation. The point that I made was, that at the time the proclamation for North Carolina was issued it received the approval of Mr. Stanton; and that the point made by the Senator from Michigan, that one of the merits of this Cabinet officer was that he had opposed that plan, was not correct; but that, on the contrary, it appears that it was a part of his own production, that his own intellect contributed to its production. Whether it was a permanent or a temporary plan is a question for further discussion. I do understand that the plan, so far as it involves the appointment of a provisional governor, was temporary; but so far as that plan went beyond that, and directed that provisional governor to take steps for the change and modification of the State constitution, that of necessity in its very nature was permanent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Without the approval of Congress?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, it is proposed to thank Mr. Stanton by resolution of Congress on his retiring from long incumbency of the War Department, commencing in 1862, and, with a slight interruption, continuing down until the end of the impeachment trial. What is he to be thanked for is the question propounded to me and other members of the Senate, and it must be answered. What is he to be thanked for in this formal manner? He is to be thanked for one of two things, as the resolution is explained to us. He is to be thanked for services performed by him as Secretary of War during the continuance of the rebellion, or he is to be thanked for the conduct which he has pursued during the last year in regard to retaining possession of the War Office.

Now, Mr. President, as Mr. Stanton has retired after a prolonged controversy, in which he has been the prominent figure, from the War Department, and has surrendered possession of it up to the President of the United States, I would be disposed to say nothing further about him; I would be content to let him pass from the public scene for the time being without a word of complaint or a word of censure on his past conduct. He has retired; that is sufficient; and it is not necessary that those who have disagreed with him in opinion and have thought unfavorably of his conduct should say anything further about him or about that conduct. But, sir, this resolution is brought here and it is put before us to be voted upon. It is conceived in such terms, it is expressed in such language, that it must be when it is passed a simple party resolution. It is not a tribute of respect from the Congress of the United States to a distinguished public servant for great and brilliant services performed in behalf of the country. As drawn, in the form in which it is presented, it must be the tribute of a political party, through its representatives in the two Houses of Congress, to a gentleman who has agreed with them in opinion, and has done certain of their party work and has been identified with them in certain party controversies and disputes.

All I desire, Mr. President, to do upon this occasion, having described the nature of the resolution, the character which it must bear after it is passed, if it shall be passed, is to protest against that system of congressional action of which this is an example.

I believe, Mr. President, if you go back to the history of this country from the beginning you will find our records clean and pure from party compliments by Congress. I do not remember any resolutions to compliment a distinguished party chief or party man for services which he has rendered to his political friends. I know that Congress has thanked distinguished public servants who, upon the field of battle, and sometimes, on a few rare occasions, in civil life, have rendered such service to the country that it has commanded the respect of both the parties into which our population is divided, and commanded the respect of people in foreign countries who discern the progress and character of our Government. Perhaps in recent years there may have been some resolutions passed complimenting distinguished military officers which were prompted somewhat by party motives, but which, upon the face of them, were directed simply to distinguished military service in the field.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does my friend from Pennsylvania refer to the recommendation of the President to thank General Hancock?

Mr. BUCKALEW. No, sir; I speak of resolutions passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought you did refer to that.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am speaking of the action of Congress, and not of propositions that have been submitted to it, and which have been refused or have not been acted on by the two Houses.

Now, Mr. President, having explained my view of this case so as to indicate my vote, I shall not multiply words in pointing out the grounds of objection which I have to Mr. Stanton's conduct during the last year further than to say this: in the first place, Mr. Stanton has attempted to hold an office under a law which he himself believed to violate the Constitution of the United States. I cannot approve of that conduct myself; I cannot laud it; I cannot praise it; I cannot hold it up as an example to others for other public officers to follow. Mr. Stanton said in August last that he desired only to hold his office until Congress met, till the Senate was in session; and yet when Congress met, when the Senate was in session in December last, he did not resign; he did not end the controversy between himself and the President, as he had led the country to believe he would; he maintained his attitude, and caused further difficulties and disputes between the President and the Senate to go on for many weeks afterward, until he secured a vote apparently reinstating him in the office. What did he do then, sir? What reasonable men would have supposed natural and proper under the circumstances—pass over a resignation, having vindicated the point of honor for himself? No; he did no such thing; he took possession of the office, and apparently intended to hold it in spite of the President and against the will of his executive chief indefinitely in the future. By these means he produced the orders of the 21st of February of the President, and precipitated upon the country this scandal or this inconvenience of impeachment. We have had a very expensive trial, we have had the public business protracted for months by reason of this conduct of Mr. Stanton, and arising out of it. Now, sir, if his friends say that this was mere matter of judgment, that nothing more could be said of it than it was a misjudgment or an error on his part—

Mr. EDMUNDS. We do not say that.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If they should say that, I think it is the best thing that can be said of it, the most favorable thing, at least, which I can admit; but what then? Why, he has acted unfortunately, unwisely, and has brought upon the public councils of his country great inconveniences and serious mischiefs, and has agitated the country for a long period of time to no purpose, and at the end of it he is obliged to retire from his position, give up that office which he has sought to hold.

As I said before, I am willing to let all this pass. We have gone through this ordeal of our institutions, and we have come forth from it without any injurious result, in my judgment, and without any great mischief having fallen upon us except the annoyance and the hazard and the time; but it is, from any point of view, perfectly absurd, even for those who think Mr. Stanton has been right in these proceedings, to thank him for it.

It cannot be, sir, that we are to pass this resolution because Mr. Stanton did material service and worked diligently during the war. The war ended three years ago—in 1865; here we are in 1868. Thanks ought to be timely for public service. When a general has won a great battle, when he has struck down a proud enemy that is invading our shores, we ought to thank him upon the moment. When he has performed any other great service we ought to thank him at the time. It is a very tardy and ungracious thing to go back and attempt to thank Mr. Stanton for services as a civil Secretary during the war. Why not thank Mr. Seward, who worked with equal diligence, and perhaps did more labor, if we are to judge from the magnitude of the volumes accumulated on behalf of his country?

And he suffered what Mr. Stanton never did suffer; he suffered personal injury by his position as a public servant; he invoked the hostility of a would-be assassin, and bears upon his own person yet the marks of a ruffian outrage. He was a member of the Cabinet during the same time, passed along with Mr. Stanton, shoulder to shoulder with him through the war from beginning to end. Why not thank other members of the Cabinet who performed service under Mr. Lincoln, and whose names are yet green in the recollection, no doubt, of the Senator from Vermont, and of other Senators who think with him? No, sir, you are not thanking Mr. Stanton for his services; you are not thanking him for courage, for perseverance, for indomitable will, for prodigious industry during the great trial of years which taxed the energies of all patriotic men to the utmost. No, sir; you are thanking him for a partisan act, for partisan conduct during the last twelve months; and it is in vain that you go behind that and attempt to revive our recollections of the war to get a color for the passage of your resolution from considerations of that kind. I think, sir, in regard to a man who has attempted to hold an office which he, according to his own expressed opinion, could not hold under the Constitution of the United States, who has falsified the expectations which the country had of his proposed conduct when he was suspended in August, 1867, and who has now only retired from the encounter under the compulsion of the disastrous public result of the impeachment trial which he provoked, all that can be asked for him by his friends is the indulgence of silence, that as soon as possible the curtain of oblivion should be cast over the transactions of the past year, and that Mr. Stanton hereafter should be judged by his future conduct and justly treated.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I shall not take up the time of the Senate; I merely wish to state that in the vote on this resolution, if I shall vote against it—and I think I shall in its present shape—I do not wish to be understood as being unwilling at all to express thanks to Mr. Stanton for his services in the War Department during the rebellion. I suppose that no Senator here entertains a higher regard for Mr. Stanton and his services than I do, and I am perfectly willing to express that regard in a resolution; but, as has been very justly stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW,] this assuredly is not intended to thank Mr. Stanton for anything he did during the war. This is too tardy; it comes too slow for that. The rebellion ceased in the spring of 1865. This resolution is offered in the year 1868. The rebellion closed in April, 1865. This is the 1st of June, 1868. After the lapse of over three years we are now called upon for the first time to express thanks to Mr. Stanton. Mr. President, that is no compliment to Mr. Stanton at all. I do not so regard it. I would not so regard it if it were to me.

Then there can be but one purpose in this resolution. What is that? Is it to compliment Mr. Stanton for his services during a time of peace, since the war? Certainly it cannot be intended, as I said, for anything during the war, because it is too slow. Then it is for that which has occurred since. Do the Senator from Vermont and those who favor this resolution say that it is usual or customary to thank heads of Departments for civil services? Has it ever been done?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We intend to say just what the resolution does say.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the Senator if there is any precedent for such a proceeding?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know whether there is or not; but in this particular case I think it is high time to make one.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not understand why the necessity arises for making one. There are some things that I could say in vindication of Mr. Stanton in regard to allegations which have been made against him, if it were necessary to vindicate his character, for I think I know something about Mr. Stanton's views in regard to reconstruction, at least down to October, 1865. But Mr. Stanton does not need anything that I may say in his vindication; nor does he need one word of this resolution; it will do him no good. His fame is established far beyond the reach or the help that will be brought to it by the resolution under consideration; if not, the resolution will be of but little service.

Is there not something else at the bottom of this movement? Some of us thought that Mr. Stanton was not protected in his office by the civil-tenure bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This resolution does not say that he was.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand what it means, and I am able to state it and will state it. Some of us, I say, thought that he was not protected by that bill; and we voted that the President committed no crime in removing him. We believed that he was legally removed. But, of course, after the defeat of impeachment it became essential to have a Secretary of War. We could not get along in the condition we were; sensible men all admitted that we could not proceed with the Government in that way. Does Mr. Stanton tender his resignation? Certainly not. Have I any condemnation for his action? Surely not. I have known that Mr. Stanton had his own views, and he acted upon those views; and what did he do? He relinquished the office. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] the other day, when I asked him if Mr. Stanton had resigned, said "no." Then Mr. Stanton was legally in the office, was he not? But the President had sent the nomination of a successor "in place of Edwin M. Stanton, removed." We were not permitted to vote for that confirmation simply upon the ordinary resolution of confirmation; but there was a preamble attached to it; and I do not think there is a precedent in the history of the Government for such a preamble.

However, we must have the preamble, and why? Simply because this confirmation could not be made without it, because Senators wanted some new vindication of their position on that subject. Are Senators not satisfied with their vote on the subject of impeachment? Is not that a sufficient vindication? When they have thirty-five to nineteen upon that subject, is not that enough? Where the necessity of again repeating this thing? Do Senators wish to whistle through the churchyard every day? Is it necessary to keep their courage up? Is it necessary for them to force each other to stand together in this matter every day? Mr. President, there are some things that cannot stand alone, and it is absolutely essential to reaffirm them from day to day in order to make them stand.

I desired to vote for the resolution of confirmation, but that was not enough; the preamble is put on, and it goes out that Mr. Stanton had not been removed and that the attempt of the President to remove him was illegal and unconstitutional. And what does the Senate do thereupon?

The Senate thereupon indorses this illegal and unconstitutional act and takes the office from Mr. Stanton! Why not let Mr. Stanton remain there? Why confirm General Schofield at all? Is there any necessity for it? Why not let Mr. Stanton remain? Could he not remain there as well as he did before? Certainly so. He had been remaining there as Secretary of War for a long time. Why not let him remain in the position? The Senate then occupies the position before the world of having taken away this office from Mr. Stanton, he being legally in possession of it; and you may pass as many preambles as you choose, it results in this: that the Senate has forced out of Mr. Stanton's hands this office. Either Mr. Stanton resigned the office or he was legally in the office under the view of the Senate; it must be certainly so; and if he was legally in the office we took it away from him by our confirmation of General Schofield the other day.

Mr. President, immediately upon the heels of this action a resolution of thanks to Mr. Stanton is offered. I have distinctly stated that I will go as far as any Senator will go in voting thanks to Mr. Stanton. If it is for any of his conduct during the war in the War Office I approve it all. If it is for his conduct on the subject of reconstruction and in opposition to the views of the President, I approve it all. And I do not wish now, in recording my vote against this resolution, to say that I condemn any act of Mr. Stanton except one single act, and that was a simple error of judgment. Indeed, I do not condemn him for that. Mr. Stanton had a right to suppose that he was illegally and unconstitutionally removed. He had the indorsement of the Senate to that effect, and I am not prepared to condemn him for that; but I will not vote for a resolution which I understand is simply to make me eat leeks. I do not understand it in any other sense, and I do not suppose that those Senators who voted as I have voted on the subject to which I have referred can understand it in any other sense.

If the Senate desires simply to vote to thank Mr. Stanton for his services in the War Department during the rebellion, for what he did in the suppression of the rebellion, I am prepared to vote for it. But immediately upon the proceedings to which I have alluded this resolution is introduced and we are called upon to vote on it. If we vote against it, we go before the country as not approving anything Mr. Stanton has done; and if we vote for it, our votes are laid before the world just as they were on the resolution as to removing Mr. Stanton. Senators vote for it because they at the moment suppose it is proper, and afterward it will be used as a condemnation of our own conduct upon the subject of impeachment.

Mr. President, if Senators find any consolation in this course of conduct, I certainly will not rob them of it. If there is any happiness or joy received in their hearts in this way, I do not desire to deprive them of it. I am the last man to take one particle of satisfaction from anybody; I would not deprive my fellow-man of the least particle of satisfaction that he derives from any act whatever; but I see no necessity of this tardy resolution for anything Mr. Stanton may have done during the war, and I see no reason for putting it in such language as that it may convey a condemnation upon ourselves and still have us vote for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to assure my friend from Missouri that there is no such purpose, so far as I know, as he seems to suppose, to disturb his equanimity or put him in a false position. I drew up the resolution myself without consultation with anybody, as a thing which I supposed was proper, and I thought would occur to any one as the proper time to thank a meritorious public officer for distinguished services when he retired from office. I am sure that there is no design on the part of anybody to put my friend from Missouri or any one else in a false position, or to allude to the impeachment subject, and I thought I had drawn the resolution in such language as that my friend from Missouri could vote for it with pleasure, as it seems my friend from Maine can, who voted as he did on the question of impeachment. At the time I drew it up I hoped that it would be so. But, Mr. President, something seems to stick constantly in the heart of my friend from Missouri about this impeachment business. He returns to it on every occasion almost out of season, as well as always in season; and he will pardon me if I say to him that it reminds me of the Ancient Mariner who stopped the passers by to tell his tale about an unfortunate event that had happened to him, and as an apology for it he said to every man he met and stopped:

"Since then, at an uncertain hour that agony returns,
And till my ghastly tale is told, this heart within me burns."

It would almost seem, Mr. President, as if there was something we cannot understand. We believe our friend voted with entire conscientiousness; but there is something after all which seems to need a constant defense or a constant apology or a constant justification, in whatever way the question may possibly be alluded to, on the part of my friend from Missouri. Now, I wish, for one, to disclaim having any purpose or any design to embarrass anybody, and the resolution will not bear any such construction.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President—
Mr. HENDERSON. With the Senator's permission, I desire to assure my friend from Vermont—

Mr. HOWARD. I shall occupy but a few moments.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is a mere personal matter that I rise to.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall occupy but a moment or two.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very well; go on.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to say one word in reply to the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] in regard to the part which Mr. Stanton actually took in the preparation of what is known as the North Carolina proclamation. I understood the honorable Senator to say that Mr. Stanton was substantially the author of that proclamation, and that it originated in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, and received the approval and assent of Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet. If I misunderstood the Senator I hope he will correct me. The very testimony the Senator has read shows the inaccuracy of that statement of his in reference to Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, for it shows clearly enough that nothing was done either by Mr. Lincoln or his Cabinet in reference to the project furnished by Mr. Stanton, except merely an order to have it printed. There was no discussion upon the subject in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, and at the request of President Lincoln Mr. Stanton caused it to be printed, and a copy of it to be furnished to each member of that Cabinet. There the matter stood until after Mr. Lincoln's assassination. On Mr. Johnson's accession to the Presidency this same subject came up again for discussion before his Cabinet. The only material point which I made was, that in the preparation of that order of Mr. Stanton which finally took the shape of the North Carolina proclamation, Mr. Stanton favored colored suffrage in the rebel States. I might go further here and add that I believe that he was the only member of Mr. Johnson's Cabinet who did favor that measure, except perhaps Mr. Speed, the Attorney General. That is the only important part of the question in this relation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Does the Senator intend to say that that was inserted in the order Mr. Stanton drew up?

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; I was about to read the facts from Mr. Stanton's own testimony. Mr. Stanton, in his testimony, says:

"Shortly previous to that time I had myself, with a view of putting in a practicable form the means of overcoming what seemed to be a difficulty in the mind of Mr. Lincoln as to the mode of reconstruction, prepared a rough draft of a form or mode by which the authority and laws of the United States should be reestablished and governments reorganized in the rebel States under the Federal authority, without any necessity whatever for the intervention of rebel organizations or rebel aid. In the course of that consultation Mr. Lincoln alluded to the paper, went into his room, brought it out, and asked me to read it, which I did, and explained my ideas in regard to it. There was one point which I had left open; that was as to who should constitute the electors in the respective States. That I supposed to be the only important point upon which a difference of opinion could arise—whether the blacks should have suffrage in the States, or whether it should be confined for the purposes of reorganization to those who had exercised it under the former State laws. I left a blank upon that subject to be considered. There was at that time nothing adopted about it, and no opinions expressed."

That was in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet.

"It was only a project."

Again he proceeds to say:

"Mr. Lincoln seemed to be laboring under the impression that there must be some starting point in the reorganization, and that it could only be through the agency of the rebel organizations then existing, but which I did not deem to be at all necessary. That night Mr. Lincoln was murdered."

"Subsequently," he proceeds:

"Subsequently, at an early day, the subject came under consideration, after the surrender of Johnston's army, in the Cabinet of Mr. Johnson. The project I had prepared was printed, and a copy in the hands of each member of the Cabinet and the President. It was somewhat altered in some particulars, and came under discussion in the Cabinet, the principal point of discussion being as to who should exercise the elective franchise. I think there was a difference of opinion in the Cabinet upon that subject. The President expressed his views very clearly and distinctly. I expressed my views, and other members of the Cabinet expressed their views. The objections of the President to throwing the franchise open to the colored people appeared to be fixed."

Of course, if his opinions on that subject were absolutely fixed, as Mr. Stanton swears they were, then it was impossible to expect that he would issue any proclamation which would allow colored suffrage at all. He blocked the progress which Mr. Stanton had begun to make toward effecting colored suffrage. Mr. Stanton adds:

"And I think every member of the Cabinet assented to the arrangement as it was specified in the proclamation relative to North Carolina."

That is to say, they assented to it as a matter of mere form. It was dictated by Mr. Johnson in substance, and drawn up by some one in the office of the Secretary of State, and Mr. Stanton, like the other members of the Cabinet, did not see fit to throw up his commission and resign his place simply because colored suffrage was not embraced in the North Carolina proclamation; that is the simple explanation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does not Mr. Stanton twice or thrice in his testimony expressly say that when issued he agreed to and approved the North Carolina proclamation?

Mr. HOWARD. I think he does not, Mr. President. I think all he says is expressed in the passage which I have just read in which he says, "and I think every member of the Cabinet assented to the arrangement as it was specified in the proclamation relative to North Carolina." It was a matter of mere form, as I have remarked. But let me go on; he adds again:

"After that I do not remember that the subject was ever again discussed in the Cabinet."

"Question. Do the committee understand that in your project you provided that all loyal male citizens twenty-one years of age should vote, and all disloyal persons should be excluded, or how otherwise?"

The Senator did not read this part of the testimony. Mr. Stanton answers:

"Answer. My own position was in favor of that; the plan I proposed left it in the alternative. I stated it both ways, considering it a question on which there would be difference of opinion. How it was printed I do not now remember."

That, sir, is substantially all I have to say in reply to what has been said by the honorable Senator from Indiana. It shows that at that early day, at the earliest possible moment, Mr. Stanton was the friend of colored suffrage in the rebel States, looking upon that measure as one of the greatest security, and promising the best results in reference to the peace and tranquillity of the rebel States, and the final establishment of loyal governments in them.

Mr. HENDERSON. In reference to a remark made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] a few moments ago, I wish to say simply one word. He is not the only Senator who has taken occasion to allude to my reference to impeachment upon this floor, and to insinuate that I was too prompt to excuse myself. I did not reply to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts when he made that very unjust and ungenerous and unkind and unsenatorial insinuation. But I desire now, once for all, Mr. President, to state to those two Senators, and to any others, that I have no excuse to make for my action in that regard, none whatever. I supposed that I acted from proper motives. I tried to do it, and I attribute proper motives to everybody else.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I said I thought you did.

Mr. HENDERSON. I care not for my vote upon that subject, and I have never attempted to excuse it upon this floor, and I never supposed I should refer to it again until this morning, when this resolution was brought up. I simply gave my reasons why I did not wish to be tortured on the subject any further.

The Senator from Vermont does not bring any accusation against the vote, but he continues to put before the Senate propositions which I would gladly vote for in some form, but for which I cannot vote in the shape in which they are presented. It is not, then, because I am a heretic that I am to be tortured. First the thumb-screw is to be applied, and if I complain I am to be further tortured, not for heresy, but for the complaint.

Mr. President, I simply rose to protest against this course of proceeding, and not to say anything on the subject of impeachment, and I now promise Senators that if it is in my power I never will allude to the subject of impeachment here again. I do not wish to refer to it, for I have no excuse to make in regard to it. I am able to defend myself if attacked. I never expect to undertake to volunteer to defend myself in that matter, because my action needs no defense. I did what I thought was right, and I intend to stand by it. I shall defend it whenever it is attacked, and only then, and I shall not ask others to help me defend it.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, it is more than one hour since a motion was made to lay aside informally the bill which was the regular order of the day, and continue this subject, with the statement that about ten minutes would suffice to get through with it. Now, I wish to give notice that if this debate is to continue I shall probably be able to speak two hours and a half on the subject of this resolution, and I think that the Senate had better, in order to escape that infliction, take a vote upon it now, if it is possible, or pass it by until to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We shall get a vote presently.

Mr. DRAKE. If further debate is to be had upon it, I move that it be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We shall finish it presently.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Missouri can call up the special order if he wants to go on.

Mr. DRAKE. I desire that the order of the day may be taken up, because I do not wish to be obliged to address the Senate upon that order when it is impatient.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us try this a little longer.

Mr. DRAKE. Very well, I yield to the wishes of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. President, I felt like asking the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] with the utmost kindness and respect, after hearing the remarks which fell from his lips, why it was that he referred to the thirty-five Senators who voted for conviction, in the manner in which he did refer to them. He intimates that we want to whistle going through a graveyard. I have not felt at all as if we were approaching a graveyard. He says we introduce measures here for the purpose of vindicating our votes on impeachment. It seems to me that is rather an unkind intimation from the Senator from Missouri, who has introduced the subject of impeachment so often. I have no desire to do anything here to vindicate my vote, and I have heard no expression from any Senator who voted for conviction on that occasion showing that he desires any vindication of his vote. I am ready to leave it to time and to posterity, conscious that I never performed an act more justly than the one I did on that occasion.

In voting for the preamble to the resolution in reference to the confirmation of General Schofield we voted simply in accordance with the resolution of this Senate passed on the 21st of February last, wherein the Senate, three to one, declared that under the Constitution and the laws Andrew Johnson had no right to remove Mr. Stanton. Do we need any vindication when we are simply pursuing one straightforward and consistent course? When that resolution was before the Senate the honorable Senator from Missouri did not raise his voice against it, and he did not vote against it when, according to his view and his construction, the Senate was perpetrating a great wrong. Where was he at that time that his voice was silent and his hand not uplifted when that resolution was passed.

Again, he says that three years have elapsed since the close of the war and this resolution of thanks to Mr. Stanton comes too late. Mr. Stanton has just retired from the War Department. When is there a time so fitting as that to give expression of our appreciation of his great public services?

Mr. President, it is not alone the soldier in the field or the officer who leads him who merits recognition of great public services. Others were needed in different departments of life. It was as necessary to have men at home to furnish the means and to send forward troops and to organize them as it was to have armies in the field; and who performed that service in a manner equal to the late Secretary of War? Why, sir, he was the main man in the Government. So I have heard from those who had the means of knowing. It was his dauntless resolution, his unflinching courage amid gloom and darkness and doubt, when those around him were despondent, which cheered Mr. Lincoln and others to carry forward and to continue in carrying forward the operations of the war. Hence it is that this public recognition of his services is due to him.

I will not dwell longer on that point; but I desire to refer to the argument of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] in regard to the indorsement of the policy of Andrew Johnson by Mr. Stanton. It is a matter entirely immaterial whether he indorsed him or not in 1865, for the fact stands out beyond contradiction that that was simply a provisional policy, as General Grant testified. If his testimony is good on the one point it is good on the other, and it was brought out by the call of my friend from New York. General Grant testified that he regarded it only as temporary.

There are two dispatches of Mr. Seward which add confirmatory and complete proof on this point. One is to Governor Sharkey:

"Your telegram of the 21st instant has been received. The President sees no reason to interfere with General Slocum's proceedings. The government of the State will be provisional only until the civil authorities shall be restored with the approval of Congress."

The other dispatch contains this sentence to Governor Marvin, of Florida:

"It must, however, be distinctly understood that the restoration to which your proclamation refers will be subject to the decision of Congress."

It is incontestible that Mr. Johnson and his advisers at that time and for some months afterward only regarded his policy in the South as temporary and subject entirely to the revision and control of Congress.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I regret that any resolution should have been introduced to provoke a discussion of this kind. I believe that the history of the country does not show any precedent for it. No Congress has ever been called upon to pass a resolution or vote of thanks to any civil officer for the performance of his civil duties, however ably they have been performed, from the time of Washington down to the present moment. It is conceded, sir, that it is without precedent. It is a novel thing in the history of the Government. As a matter of course, it introduces subjects of discussion necessarily political in their character, and which, if entered upon, can have no end. At this period of the session, when there is so much public business upon our hands, it seems to me unwise that any such resolution should have been introduced.

I know, Mr. President, that to Mr. Vanderbilt, of New York, Congress passed a vote of thanks; for he had presented to the Government of the United States a ship of great value, one of the most munificent donations that a private individual ever gave to his Government, and for that reason the vote of thanks was passed. Mr. Peabody made a present of $1,000,000 for education, and a vote of thanks to him was passed. For some great gift, for some magnificent donation having no reference to parties or to political affairs, Congress could vote thanks without entering upon any discussion of the distracting questions which necessarily arise between parties. If a resolution be introduced to thank the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, or any other high officers in the Government, political discussion must always arise. I do not propose to enter into a discussion of this question upon the merits at all at this time. I do not desire to take the time of the Senate for that purpose; but, sir, I do appeal to the Senate not to enter upon this dangerous precedent of interminable political debate, debate which effects no good purpose, which is against all precedent, and which certainly interrupts the public business. If we are to pass resolutions of thanks to the Secretary of War for the great services which he performed during the rebellion, what reason can be given why we should not pass a vote of thanks to the Secretary of State, who performed as great labor as the Secretary of War, and who, in the performance of that labor and in the negotiations carried on between this country and foreign Powers by which he prevented their recognition of the southern confederacy while the war was going on, rendered perhaps as important service to the country as can well be conceived? And why not pass a vote of thanks to the Secretary of the Navy also? For whatever men may say about the administration of any Department of this Government, no Department of it has been administered with more vigor, with more efficiency, with more economy, or has rendered greater service to the Government than the Navy Department; and, ay, sir, if you are to go into the facts compared with its administration, the War Department, so far as economy is concerned, will sink into insignificance. Nor has it been conducted with any greater efficiency in the organization or movement of its forces than the Navy Department. In no respect whatever has the Department of War been more efficient than the Department of the Navy. But, as I have said, I do not wish to go into the discussion of these matters. Of necessity the introduction of resolutions of this kind will involve debate. If this resolution is to be pressed, it will probably be followed by other resolutions of a similar character.

Mr. President, there is another reason why I do not propose to go into the merits. Some gentlemen speak of this as a kind of funeral, that we are passing through graveyards. As it is never in good taste on funeral occasions to criticise the departed ones, I shall not enter upon any criticism of the late Secretary of War on this occasion. It is always left to friends to speak as highly as they please in their eulogies of the deceased. I shall reserve for some other proper time my criticisms upon the course of Mr. Stanton. I rise to protest principally against this measure because it is a bad precedent. It never has been done before from the beginning until now. We have had great men before in the administration of our affairs equal and more than equal to Edwin M. Stanton. If it were wise that Congress should be passing votes of approval upon retiring members of the Cabinet or upon Presidents of the United States or upon other of the high officers of the Government, we might be occupied half our time in the discussion of personal questions. Comparisons are always odious. They always provoke discussion. They do little or no good. If Mr. Stanton has earned the reputation which men say he has, during his administration of the War Department in putting down the rebellion, that reputation is established. The vote of Congress does not establish it, nor change it. It neither makes it better, nor makes it worse. It stands upon the truth of history, and that history is written. It was finished three years ago. If, however, this resolution be intended as a political endorsement of the course of Mr. Stanton during the last twelve months, if that be its purpose, there is so much the more force in the objection to bringing forward the resolution at all. It is opening a political discussion upon a mere personal question. It is only a hindrance to the public business.

Mr. President, I protest against this resolution, and shall vote against it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I merely rise to see if it is not possible that we can get a vote on this resolution. It seems to me that the value of it is very much impaired by the discussion that has been gone into. I can very cheerfully vote for everything that is in the resolution, and I could vote for a great deal more. I can say very many things in commendation of Mr. Stanton, going back to an earlier day than the resolution does, even before the war began. He was one of the men that saved this Government from going into the hands of the rebels during Buchanan's administration. There is nothing in the resolution that I cannot most cheerfully vote for, and I ask the Senate if we cannot get a vote upon it?

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I want to say but a word or two. I approve of this resolution, and the more so since the disclaimer of the Senator from Vermont. But I principally rose to say that I voted in executive session the other day, from which the injunction of secrecy has been removed, against a portion of the resolution of the same Senator under a misapprehension. I thought it contained an expression which was in a resolution of the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] and to which I was opposed. I was very unwell on that day, and did not, perhaps, pay that attention that I should have done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] striking out certain words.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the original resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to offer an amendment, to add the following:

And Congress takes this occasion to tender its thanks to Chief Justice Chase for the great ability, purity, and distinguished learning which have illustrated his position on the bench of the Supreme Court.

Mr. STEWART and Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays on the amendment; and they were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. VAN WINKLE (when his name was called) said: I concur with the sentiment of this amendment, but believing it entirely out of place here I vote nay.

The call of the roll having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 11, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Doolittle, Fowler, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, and Vickers—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, and Willey—13.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not intend to say a word, nor do I mean to say anything now, in regard to the merits of this resolution; but I feel compelled, by the vote upon the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, to say that a very great injustice, in my opinion, is done to the Chief Justice in dragging him into this controversy, because the Chief Justice retired from office as an associate of Mr. Stanton in the same Cabinet four years ago, and was then rewarded with the highest office, in my judgment, in the gift of the people of the United States; that is, the Chief Justiceship of the United States. There is nothing in the history of the recent events to connect the Chief Justice with this matter. Therefore, while the vote was being taken, I withheld my vote, simply because I thought it had pertinence to the matter in hand. I have no doubt the Senate will be perfectly willing, on a proper occasion and at a proper time, to speak in commendation of the Chief Justice, and of his purity as Chief Justice, though many might differ in regard to his opinions on the recent trial. But it seems to me that has no pertinence to and nothing to do with this question.

Now, in regard to Mr. Stanton, my own opinion upon that matter is perfectly clear. I have always been willing to say all that is said of Mr. Stanton for his services as Secretary of War proper. The resolution is carefully drawn, so as not to compel us to pass at all upon the question of whether he did right or wrong in refusing to resign when he was requested to do so. My own judgment is that Mr. Stanton's character before the people of this country and the whole world, his future reputation in all time, would have stood higher if, after Congress convened and the legislative power had been again restored to its full exercise, Congress being in session, he had then voluntarily retired from office as Secretary of War and left to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the power to appoint a Secretary of War. My own opinion expressed upon the record is that the President had the power under the tenure-of-office act to remove Mr. Stanton at any time, and that he was not at all to blame for exercising a power which by the Constitution and law he possessed.

But as the resolution itself is so framed that I am not called upon to pass any opinion on that question, I see no objection to passing it. It is a proper compliment, it seems to me, to a high officer of the Government, who, during a period of long public service, in a time of great difficulty and danger, faithfully discharged and performed his duty as Secretary of War. The precedent is not a bad one, in my judgment, for the circumstances are not likely to occur again.

I am very sorry that this debate has assumed a political bearing, because I believe there is nothing contained in the resolution that the people of the country of both parties will not fairly assent to. It is so carefully worded that it does not necessarily involve any expression of opinion as to the conduct of Mr. Stanton in refusing to resign the office of Secretary of War. It simply declares that in the discharge of his duties as Secretary of War, both before and since the war, he has deserved well of his country, has shown high ability, purity, and virtue. It seems to me we all ought to be willing to vote for such a resolution as this. I certainly shall do so.

Mr. MORTON. I desire simply to say that the Senator from Missouri, by his amendment, has, in my opinion, placed the Chief Justice in a false position. The proposition in regard to Chief Justice Chase was in no wise connected with the resolution under consideration. They could not be properly connected. A resolution of thanks to one distinguished man can never with any propriety be complicated with a resolution of thanks to another. The resolution we are considering does not refer to impeachment, does not cast any reflections upon anybody, and the introduction of the amendment in regard to Chief Justice Chase was out of place, and I think has placed him in a false position.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to subjoin simply to what has been said by the Senator from Indiana, that when Chief Justice Chase retires from the Supreme Bench, as Mr. Stanton has retired from the Department of War, it may be a suitable occasion then to consider a resolution of this kind; but it seems to me wholly unprecedented and in very bad taste to propose to compliment the Chief Justice of the United States by a resolution of this kind for his services upon the Supreme Bench while he continues in that office. It was for that reason that I voted against the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to say one word in explanation of my vote. I voted for this as an amendment to the resolution. I should have voted against it as a final proposition, believing that resolutions of this character ought not to pass.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to say, simply in explanation of the vote I shall give, that for whatever of distinguished service Mr. Stanton has done the country, and in my opinion he has done much, I am willing to vote the thanks of Congress in return. I think I entertain as high regard for his distinguished, patriotic, and valuable services to the country during our long war as any individual on this floor; but I cannot consent to vote for a resolution which will, even if not so intended, condemn my former action in the late trial. If I thought this resolution was so worded as simply to tender thanks to that distinguished man, for whom I entertain the highest regard, and for whose services I entertain the highest appreciation, and so as not to place those who voted against the impeachment of the President of the United States in a false position, I should very gladly concur in the resolution. I should like to bestow upon all those men who participated in the suppression of the late rebellion any honors that possibly could be. In this case I cannot.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 37, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Doolittle, Fowler, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, McGreevy, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, and Vickers—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Grimes, and Sanbury—6.

So the resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1078) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1869, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments to the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 786) declaring St. George and Boothbay, in the State of Maine, and San Antonio, Texas, ports of delivery, and authorizing the establishment of bonded warehouses at Bucksport and Vinalhaven, in the State of Maine.

ENROLLED BILL, ETC., SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 786) declaring St. George, Boothbay, Bucksport, Vinalhaven, and North Haven, in the State of Maine, and San Antonio, in the State of Texas, ports of delivery; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 279) in relation to the breakwater at Portland, Maine.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that Mr. GRIMES be excused from serving upon the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the naval appropriation bill, and that the Chair be authorized to supply his place by an appointment.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. NYE.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1869, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPRESENTATION OF ARKANSAS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of Saturday, being the bill (H. R. No. 1039) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, upon which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. By the leave of the Senator from Missouri, I wish to present an amendment to the bill now under consideration, so that it may be read.

Mr. DRAKE. There is an amendment pending now.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, there will be no objection to mine being read.

Mr. DRAKE. You had better let it be read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are two other amendments pending now. No other amendment is in order at this time.

Mr. HOWARD. By the indulgence of the Senator from Missouri, I wish to have my amendment read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information, no objection being made.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, which was to insert as an additional section the following:

And whereas the people of South Carolina, in pursuance of the act entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, did, by a convention held at Charleston, in the months of January, February, and March, 1868, frame a constitution for said State, which constitution was duly ratified by the votes of a majority of the qualified electors of said State, at an election held in the month of April, A. D. 1868, for such ratification, more than one half of all the registered voters of said State having voted upon the question of the said ratification; and whereas the people of said State have duly elected a Legislature under their said constitution, which has not yet assembled, to act upon the question of the adoption of the ratification of the amendment of the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, known as article fourteen; and whereas said State constitution is republican in form, and in all respects in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, and with said act of Congress passed March 2, 1867, and with the approval of a majority of all the qualified voters of said State, and is approved by Congress: Therefore,

Be it further enacted, That the Legislature of said State so elected be, and they are hereby, authorized to assemble under said constitution whenever the Governor-elect under the same shall see fit to call them together by proclamation, any when so assembled said Legislature may proceed to act upon the question of the ratification of said amendment to the Constitution of the United States. In case said Legislature shall ratify said amendment the Governor-elect of said State shall cause certificates of such ratification, under the seal of the State, to be forwarded, one to the President of the United States, one to the President of the Senate, and one to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to be laid before each House of Congress; and thereupon said State of South Carolina shall be entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives chosen under said State constitution shall be admitted therefrom.

Mr. HOWARD. I merely wish to say, with the indulgence of the Senator from Missouri, that I offer that as an amendment, to come in as section two of the bill, a separate and independent section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask to have it printed?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be entered. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I desire to modify the amendment that is now pending offered by myself and put it in the shape that I now send it to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, as modified by the mover, will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as modified, is to strike out all of the bill after the word "condition" in the fifth line, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That there shall never be in said State any denial or abridgment of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason or on account of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and that any such denial or abridgment shall authorize the exclusion, while it continues, of said State from representation in either House of Congress.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, it will be noticed that I have so far modified my amendment as to present, in its present form, the simple point of choice between the fundamental condition embodied in it and that in the original bill. The sense of the Senate in this particular can thus be better tested than if other provisions were connected with this.

Reflection has convinced me that it is improper and unwise, to say the least, for Congress to attempt to compel Arkansas to retain in her fundamental law, unchangeable for all time to come, the exact qualification of voters now embodied in her constitution. That State, like every other, should be allowed to change those qualifications, with the single exception that it should never have power to deprive any man of civil and political rights because of the color of his skin. To strip her of that right in all future time is the object of the fundamental condition expressed in this amendment. And the fulfillment of this condition is sought to be guaranteed by declaring that its violation "shall authorize the exclusion, while it continues, of said State from representation in either House of Congress." It will thus be seen that my purpose is, if such a thing be practicable—as I believe it is—to bind this late rebel State to respect the rights of American citizens in the whole long future, though their skins be black. I intend, if possible, to destroy the infamy of caste in that State forever, and at the same time leave her people otherwise free, as those of all the loyal States are, to regulate suffrage in every other respect at their will.

It cannot be denied that this is a matter which brings into view some of the great principles which underlie our whole system of government. When it is proposed thus to bind a State the act must rest upon sound principles or it cannot be upheld. I have no difficulty in finding a principle which rightfully sustains the attempt. It is that which gives to every sovereign the right to say who shall take part in its government, and upon what terms any person or body of persons shall be permitted to take such part. That right inheres in the sovereignty of this nation as much as in the sovereign of any other Government, and it is written down, too, in its Constitution. The question, then, is whether the nation has the power to declare and enforce the conditions on which it will permit a part of its people, organized as a State, to share in the government of the whole. It is the old question between nationality and State rights, and I meet it on the side of nationality.

Mr. President, if any one could be justified in believing any matter in the relations of the nation to the several States to have been settled by continued practice, it is that the General Government has a right to prescribe conditions to the admission of a State into the Union. When that right is disputed at this late day one may well be surprised. With all respect for those who dispute it, I am constrained to say that in my judgment they have not only not got upon the right track of thought on this subject, but have got upon the wrong track. Still it may be that I have taken the wrong one. I am prepared, however, to state the grounds of my judgment upon this important question, and leave the Senate to determine their value.

It will be observed that the first clause of this condition is, in substance and almost in words, that which was imposed upon the admission of Nebraska less than eighteen months ago; and so imposed by an act passed over the President's veto. If it was constitutional then to impose such a condition, it is so now. If it was right and expedient then, as to a State where slavery had never existed, and where there are but few negroes, it is much more so as to a State where slavery had existed, and where negroes form a large part of the population.

It seems to me nothing can be clearer from the history of the past four years than the steady and repeated assertion by Congress of its right and power to treat the rebel States as conquered, with no rights but such as the nation, through its Congress, might choose to give them. This assertion has been made again and again, has overridden vetoes and executive opposition in every form, has shaped itself in all sorts of provisions and conditions, and if its constitutionality and rightfulness have not been established then it is hard to say what can be considered established by reiterated congressional action. Upon this corner-stone, then, I build, in part, my argument, that the rebel States were conquered territory and conquered people, perfectly at the mercy of the victorious nation, and without the least right to invoke the Constitution to support their claim to any political franchises or privileges whatever. Deny this, and your whole series of reconstruction acts must be swept away. Upon no other ground can you justify them.

In those acts you prescribed the qualifications of voters in the reconstruction of all those States, and bestowed the elective franchise upon a race always theretofore deprived of it. By what right did you do that, if it be true, as now contended by some here, that after having carried reconstruction thus far on the basis of negro suffrage, you have no right to say that that suffrage shall not hereafter be denied or abridged on account of race or color? Sir, it cannot be that you could rightfully secure it, as you did in the past, and cannot rightfully secure, or, at least, guard it in the future. You must retrace all your steps on this subject if you have not the right to take this last one.

Will it be denied that in Congress alone is the right to admit States into the Union? Of course it will not. Will it be denied that Congress is vested with a complete, unquestioned, and unquestionable discretion as to the admission of States? If denied, I ask where is the provision of the Constitution which fetters or limits that discretion? That instrument says nothing on this subject but that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union." Who has the right to convert that "may" into shall, and compel Congress against its will to admit any State? No one here will contend that any such compulsory power exists anywhere, or that any State can come into the Union without the consent of Congress.

If, then, Congress has the sole, exclusive, and discretionary power over this whole subject, it may prescribe the terms upon which any State may be admitted into the Union; for the Constitution prescribes none; and when that instrument authorizes Congress to act on any subject, without saying when, how, why, or on what terms it shall act, the time, mode, considerations, and terms of its action are as absolutely in the discretion of Congress as if the Constitution so declared in express words. If this be not so, a State might come into the Union when and how it pleased without any authority or any terms. Once establish such a doctrine, and the control of the nation over this subject vanishes.

But it may be assumed that the constitutional provision just quoted applies to new States only, and therefore not to the case in hand. Let us briefly examine this.

What is it to admit a State into the Union? In this debate, so far, this has not been considered; but it is, in my judgment, in an important degree worthy of attention. It is not to admit the people of a State into the nation, for they are already a part of the nation. When, therefore, a State is admitted into the Union, it is not into the Union of the people as a nation, but into the Union formed under the Constitution for purposes of government. It is admitted to participate as a body-politic in the Government formed by that Constitution, in which the people composing the State had no previous participation, or whose participation had been broken off. This, I take it, is the meaning of the admission of a State into the Union, except as in the case of Texas, where a foreign people are, by the act of admission into the governmental Union, also admitted into the Union of the people as a nation, which latter Union, let it be remembered, antedates the former, for it has existed since the assembling of the Continental Congress in September, 1774, outside and independent of, as well as anterior to, any Constitution or written form of government whatever.

If these views be correct, it follows that the word "new" in this clause of the Constitution does not confine the action of Congress in the premises to the original admission of States into the Union. That word, if it have any special significance there—which I think it has not—applies to all States which are outside of the governmental Union, and dependent on the action of Congress for their admission into that Union. If not, had the rebel States succeeded in establishing themselves as an independent and separate nation they might have remained such for a hundred years, and then come back, in defiance of Congress, into the governmental Union upon their own terms, or without any terms.

If, then, it be true that the admission of a State into the Union is merely its admission to a participation in the government of the Union, it disposes of a common error which probably is entertained by many, to wit: that no portion of the people can become a State until they are admitted as a State into the Union. The history of the Government, in my opinion, disproves this. The State of Vermont was the first admitted into the Union after the adoption of the Constitution. She came in in 1791 without any previous authority from Congress for her organization as a State and the act for her admission had this preamble:

"The State of Vermont having petitioned the Congress to be admitted as a member of the United States."

Here was an express recognition of the pre-existence of that State outside of the governmental Union, while her people were a part of the nation, and as such subject to the authority and power of that Union. Since that time no less than ten States have been admitted, which were formed without the previous authority of Congress, and yet were recognized as existing States by the acts passed for their admission. They were, with the years of their admission, Maine, 1820; Arkansas and Michigan, 1836; Florida and Iowa, 1845; California, 1850; Oregon, 1859; Kansas, 1861; West Virginia, 1862; and Nebraska, 1867. If these facts show anything, they show that it has not, in all the history of the Government, been held that a State is dependent upon its admission into the Union for its existence as a State. It cannot be admitted into the governmental Union unless it be organized as a State; but it may be so organized and exist without being so admitted. Hence result two important deductions. The first is, that, as long as a State is outside of participation in the Government of the Union, from whatever cause, it has, when it seeks admission to that participation, the status and character of a new State. That is, it is just as much out, just as much to be admitted, just as much dependent on the will of Congress for its admission, when it has, by its own act of rebellion, severed its practical relations with the governmental Union, as when it first seeks admission into it as a new-born State, and therefore falls within the scope of the power of Congress to admit "new States into this Union." My second deduction is, that being a State de facto, though not yet in the governmental Union, or with its practical relations thereto severed by its own act, it is capable of acting as a State; and binding itself as such, especially in all matters pertaining to its admission or readmission into the Union. If this be not so, how could conditions be proposed to it by Congress, to be assented to before its admission, as has been heretofore done? To ask the question is to answer it. If a State at all, it may contract as a State; if not a State, with power to contract, to propose conditions for its acceptance would be absurd.

Sir, I see all this clearly, whether I have succeeded or not in showing it to others. I see that the insurgent States, by their rebellion, severed their practical relations to the governmental Union, but did not sever themselves from the union of the people as a nation. They were out of the Union, and at the same time not out of it; an apparent paradox when you lose sight of the fact that the word Union in the clause of the Constitution now before us means the governmental Union formed by the Constitution, and not the popular Union formed nearly fourteen years before the Constitution took effect, and which the Constitution was avowedly intended to make "more perfect." Those practical relations, for all purposes of government under the Constitution, were dissolved by war for four years, and have never yet been restored. Why? Because the terms of restoration prescribed by Congress have never yet been fulfilled. Had not Congress the right to prescribe those terms? Had it not a right to say when and on what conditions those rebel States might again take part in the Government they had renounced, warred against, and attempted to overthrow? If not, then are we conquered by the conquered, and our fathers formed a Government which has no power to keep itself out of the hands of its enemies and destroyers? If this be true, then should our cry be not vae victis! but vae victori! woe to the conqueror! woe to the conqueror! But, sir, I leave the letter of the Constitution, and invoke the decision of this question on higher grounds.

No nation can live and not have the absolute and unassailable right, through its very existence as a nation, to say who may and who may not share in its government. To say that rebels, because they constitute States, cannot be for their rebellion debarred from a share in that Government, is to set a part above the whole, to break down constitutions and laws, and to snap every ligament which can bind a people in unity of popular or governmental organization. And as the greater includes the less, if you can debar them you can readmit them on terms, such terms as you please, and the Constitution affords them no remedy. When, therefore, as in this amendment, you say to Arkansas that she may come back upon the condition therein expressed, you exercise a clear and undoubted right, for which you find a warrant not only in the Constitution, but in that primal law of self-preservation, which belongs to nations as well as individuals, and is high above all constitutions.

But Senators assert that to impose this condition on Arkansas is to deprive her of equality among the States. Sir, what means this much talked of equality of States? Does it depend on their internal organization? If one State lets negroes vote and another does not is there therefore inequality between them? If one lets women or foreigners, or Indians or Chinamen vote, and others do not, is there for that reason inequality between them? If one requires a property qualification in voters and another does not, are they therefore unequal? I look in vain for any such inequality. But suppose it to exist, where is there anything in the Constitution which forbids it? There is not a word there about the equality of the States, except in the single point of representation in this Senate. In every other respect, even in representation in the other branch of Congress, the States were unequal at the adoption of the Constitution and have been so ever since, and will continue to be so always.

There is a gross mistake or perversion in all this talk about the equality of the States which proceeds, doubtless, from the language of the acts admitting new States, declaring that a State is admitted into the Union "on an equal footing with the original States." Does that import that the new State is equal to any other State? By no means; but that it is admitted to take part in the Government of the Union on an equal footing with the others; possessing its relative share of power, subject to its relative quantum of burdens, and enjoying alike with the others the rights, immunities, and privileges secured by the Constitution to the States respectively, as participants in that Government. It therefore follows that when a State is admitted with her two Senators she is the exact coequal of every other State in this body; and if she have the number of Representatives which her population entitles her to, she is, relatively, as nearly as practicable, the coequal of every other State in the House of Representatives; and, therefore, for all purposes of participation in the governmental Union, is on an equal footing with the original States; and this is the whole scope of the vaunted equality of States. Internally they may be, as we all know they are, totally unequal in every material, moral, and political respect, but in their relations to the Government of the Union they are as nearly on an equal footing as they can well be put.

Sir, in requiring Arkansas never to deny or abridge the elective franchise to any person on account of his color do we deprive her of that equal footing? Do we thereby take away her equal participation in the Government of the Union? Not in the least degree. If not, we violate no part of the Constitution in exacting from her this guarantee of the rights of citizens of the United States, whose rights we are bound by honor and justice to protect and defend.

Mr. President, there is one feature of the debate on this bill which seems to me to deserve a place in some book which may some day be compiled from that exhaustless repository of curious things, the Congressional Globe, and given to the world under the title of Curiosities of Congress. The honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. TRUMBULL] reports this bill to the Senate, and recommends its passage, with a fundamental condition far more stringent and objectionable than that contained in my amendment, and then stands in his place here and emphatically proclaims that fundamental condition to be of no force or value.

Sir, I do not understand this. I do not comprehend why that committee should recommend the Senate to engage in the mighty work of firing a big blank cartridge at Arkansas, merely to see it go off in smoke. I was credulous enough to believe that one of the main functions of that committee was to see that our legislative guns were well shot, so as to hit something when they went off. I should very much regret to believe that they had taken to the business of making smooth-bore pop-guns for the Senate and the country. I do not in this instance believe it, though the honorable chairman, in effect, says so. Sir, in the short time of my service here, I have noticed no more marked peculiarity in that gentleman's character as a legislator than the keenness of his vision in discovering that the amendments proposed by others to bills in his charge are "of no use." In this instance, however, his vision is not exactly in its normal condition. He sees double, or, rather, two ways. He scans the fundamental condition in the bill, and pronounces it of no use, valueless, a mere pop-gun, and yet urges its adoption by this body of "most potent, grave, and reverend seigniors," as if we had no better occupation for the precious time, of which all the world knows we waste so little, than to exercise ourselves in getting up that kind of juvenile ordinance.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Missouri certainly does not mean to do me injustice in regard to the matter. I stated that I reported the House bill under instructions from the committee; that in reference to the fundamental condition, I myself was opposed to it, though I thought it had no such binding efficacy as to compel me to vote against the bill. I voted to strike out that condition on the yeas and nays, stating at the same time, however, that if the Senate retained it I should not feel compelled to vote against the bill although it was in. It never met my approbation.

Mr. DRAKE. I certainly do not intend, Mr. President, to do any injustice to the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee. I did not before know that his position was as he has now stated it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I voted against it in committee.

Mr. DRAKE. I understand that the objection of the honorable chairman is to the condition contained in the original bill. If he will oblige me so much as to answer an inquiry I would make of him here I would state it thus: is he opposed equally to the condition embodied in this amendment of mine? Does he regard that in the same light of uselessness and inefficiency that he regards the condition in the original bill?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The condition which the Senator from Missouri introduces is not so objectionable as the condition imposed by the House, in my judgment; it does not go quite so far, though I think its legal efficacy is obnoxious to the same objection as the condition of the House.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I think I am not mistaken in saying that the Journal of the Senate for the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress shows that the honorable Senator from Illinois voted to pass the Nebraska bill over the President's veto. I do not comprehend this thing of voting to pass a bill over the President's veto which contains a provision that is a mere brutum fulmen. I took this condition as I have embodied it in this amendment from the very bill that the gentleman aided by his vote to pass over that veto. I did not regard that condition, nor do I now regard it, as being a mere empty concatenation of words.

Sir, in this matter I do not think we are handling a pop-gun. I believe that there is force, efficacy, power, in a fundamental condition imposed by Congress upon the admission of a State. I know that the General Government may lawfully make a compact with a State government which shall bind both. I know that there is no express constitutional limit to the power of both governments in that respect. I know that the Government is by the Constitution authorized to supervise, to a certain extent, the creation of State governments, and has always, upon the admission of a State, exercised that power. I know that if Congress should make it a condition of the admission of Arkansas that she should have but one Senator here, or none at all, and Arkansas should agree to that condition, the compact would be valid by the express terms of the Constitution, and as long as it stood Arkansas could have but one Senator here, or none, according as she might agree.

One or two of the Senators near me say that I cannot maintain that point. Very well, sir; let us see. I think I can make some show towards it anyhow, if I cannot absolutely maintain it. In the fifth article of the Constitution it is provided that—

"No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

If that is not a negative pregnant to the effect that it may deprive itself by its own consent of its representation in the Senate, then I do not know what a negative pregnant is.

Mr. HENDERSON, who was sitting next to Mr. DRAKE, made a remark to him in a low tone of voice.

Mr. DRAKE. If my colleague will only be so good as to state his remarks so that the reporter will catch them and I can answer them in direct connection I will do so. He suggests to me that a State may not send any Senators here at all. That does not touch the case.

She may be deprived of her equal representation in the Senate by her own agreement, by her own consent; and, in my opinion, the Constitution says so plainly.

Now, sir, all the things that I have just stated I know, or, at least, believe I do, and knowing them I deny the proposition that we cannot bind Arkansas by compact in this matter. That proposition cannot be maintained unless you can show that either this Government or hers is unable to contract and be contracted with.

But it is said that if we make the compact, impose the fundamental condition, we cannot enforce it; that if Arkansas chooses to violate it we have no remedy. I deny this, too. As an estate upon condition ceases upon a breach of the condition, so an admission of a State to representation in Congress upon condition would cease upon a violation of that condition, and her Senators and Representatives might be excluded from these Halls, and ought to be. Whether they would be is another thing, with which we have nothing to do. When we enact laws imposing penalties for crimes we do not know that the penalties will be enforced, but we know they ought to be, and we assume that they will be. We ought to assume as much in this case, and not hold back from proper legislation because we doubt its certain enforcement. But even if a violation of the condition should never be enforced in the Halls of Congress, it may serve a great and valuable purpose as a foundation for an appeal to the courts by those for whose protection it is designed, if their rights should be invaded.

But suppose it highly probable that the condition would be practically of little or no value, is that a valid reason why we should not do all we can to plant barriers against the future robbery of the civil and political rights of the colored citizens there? That the white rebels of the South will, from the hour that the strong arm of the Government ceases to restrain them, bend all their energies to the disfranchisement of the loyal negro; that they will plot and counterplot, and scheme, and strive, yea, agonize for his practical reenslavement; that they will in this ferocious crusade against the rights of man defy alike the laws of God and man to the uttermost extent they dare, no man can doubt who knows them. Have you not seen enough of their tyranny, treachery, duplicity, and ungodly lust for dominion in the last seven years—yea, in the last forty—to put you on your guard? Will you willfully shut your eyes to all this? Will you deliberately leave all power in hands which all past experience proves will abuse it for the most inhuman purposes and ends? Will you leave your country's friends in the remorseless grip of your country's enemies? What if you cannot plant barriers which you know will certainly stand firm against all the surges that may beat upon them, is that any reason why you should plant none?

But, sir, again I deny the imputed impotence of the barrier which this amendment proposes, unless you first establish the fact that all compacts between the Government of the Union and that of an individual State are impotent. No such doctrine as that has ever been authoritatively sustained in this country, nor do I believe any such will ever be. But whether so or not, I demand that on behalf of the colored race in the South we reject it here and now, and leave the future to sanction and protect our work. That it will do so I have not a doubt.

Mr. President, there is one other consideration which it seems to me should be taken into account in our action on this bill. In whatever shape we frame it with a fundamental condition designed to protect the civil and political rights of the colored people of Arkansas, we may safely assume that it will be met with a veto. He who vetoed the bill to admit Nebraska into the Union because it contained a fundamental condition precisely similar in substance to that embodied in my amendment will be quite sure to do likewise with the bill for the admission of Arkansas, whether it contain that condition or the one in the bill as it came from the House. The question then arises, in which form should the bill be put so as to secure its passage over a veto?

I hold that from this out to the end of his term we should not fail to pass over his veto any bill to which he may apply it. We have the strength, if united, and we should exercise it. If the vote of last Saturday on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] proposing to strike out from the bill the fundamental condition, be any criterion, you cannot pass the bill over a veto in the form in which it came from the House. If the Senate concur with me in that view is it not better to put the bill in a shape that two thirds of us will sustain? Adopt the same fundamental condition that was imposed upon Nebraska and passed over a veto and that object is attained, and the protection of the colored voters in Arkansas secured. On the other hand, pass the original bill, and it may be that you will have to do all your work over again, or still leave Arkansas out of the pale of the governmental Union and in danger of again passing under the domination of rebels. Let us religiously labor to forestall and avert that result. If we fail to do so what account shall we render to the loyal millions we represent?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I in very brief terms discuss the question which the amendment of the honorable member from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] and that proposed by the honorable member from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] present.

Before doing so, I beg permission to explain a vote which I gave upon a subject which is not now before the Senate; I mean upon the amendment which was proposed by the honorable member from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] to the resolution of thanks to Mr. Stanton. I did not hear it read distinctly. I supposed it to be a proposition of thanks to the present Chief Justice of the United States for the manner in which, while Secretary of the Treasury, he had administered the finances of the Government. I was perfectly willing to do that, and more than willing to do that, if the Senate itself should think it proper to pass a vote of thanks to any civil officer. But I find, upon my attention being called to it particularly, that it proposed to thank the Chief Justice for the manner in which he has discharged the duties of the high position which he now holds. I should be very unwilling to have it supposed that I would knowingly support a proposition of that sort. It seems to me but calculated to bring the judiciary into the political contests of the day, and that its tendency would only be to injure that department of the Government. I wish it, therefore, to be understood that the vote which I cast upon that subject, as I am not at liberty to strike it out now, was given under a misapprehension.

Mr. President, the question which is before the Senate on the bill which is now upon the table is a very interesting one; and although the honorable member from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] and those who concur with him think that Congress has the power to impose such conditions as are suggested, I think it very clear that the power does not exist. The condition in the bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee is, that the right of suffrage as it now exists, or will exist under the constitution of the State if the State should be admitted, shall not at any time be changed so as to take from the parties who are entitled to vote under the present constitution that right hereafter. I suppose, if anything be true, whether we consult the debates in the convention by which the Constitution was framed, or consult the debates in the several conventions by which the Constitution was ratified, or consult the words of the Constitution itself and the interpretation put upon it in the particular in question, nothing is more clear than that the States were left to control the franchise among themselves just as they had the authority to control it before the Constitution was adopted.

The honorable member from Missouri asked, and I think it was asked again by some one of the other Senators upon the floor, whether there was anything in the Constitution of the United States which declares that the States shall be equal. The inference involved in the question is true, if it is intended merely to inquire whether there are any express terms to be found in the Constitution declaring the equality of the States; but, although there are no such express terms, it seems to me to be clear, beyond all reasonable doubt, and that the Government could not exist if it was otherwise, that there is absolute equality among the States, as far as a question of this description is concerned. That state of equality is to be gathered from almost every source. First, the Convention itself was called by the people of the States, acting in their separate capacity of people of the several States. The States were represented in the Convention as equals, each having the same voice. The Constitution adopted by the Convention was submitted to the States afterward as equals; and if we look into the Constitution itself we find that all the provisions, which relate to the States as such, show that in the intentment of the Convention they were considered as equal.

Their representation in the House of Representatives is founded upon the idea of equality; their representation in this Chamber is founded upon that idea; and the Constitution provides that that equality shall not at any time, even by an amendment of the Constitution, be changed. If we look at the nature of a State government, the object of retaining the State government, so to speak, or rather the purpose of creating a general government endowed with only certain specified powers, and the tenth amendment of the Constitution which says in so many words that all the powers not delegated to the General Government are to be considered as expressly reserved to the States, or the people of the States respectively, we are led, as I think, only to one conclusion, and that is, that in the judgment of the framers of the Government of the United States, and of the people by whom it was adopted, the States were esteemed to be equal in all the powers which they had not agreed to transfer to the General Government. That being so, the moment we ascertain in any particular instance whether the power in question has or has not been delegated to the General Government, and the result of the examination is that there has been no such delegation, then the power is in the States, not only from the nature of the General Government, but by force of the tenth amendment of the Constitution which reserves to the States that power.

If, then, the General Government has not the power to interfere with the franchise so as to take from the States the absolute and uncontrollable power to regulate it directly, it would seem to follow that they cannot do it indirectly. I do not know whether the Judiciary Committee has made a report upon the several bills or resolutions which from time to time have been referred to that committee, providing for the regulation of suffrage throughout the States by act of Congress; but I suppose that that proposition, if it shall be brought before the Senate by the committee, will never receive the sanction of this body. I think all the indications of the opinions of the members of the body show that they do not believe the General Government has that authority.

Assuming, then; that it has not the authority to interfere with the States which are now in the Union beyond all dispute, the question immediately before us is, (to take the case of Arkansas as the immediate one now pending,) assuming that Arkansas is not now a State but is to become a State by our legislation, can we impose it upon her as a condition that she shall surrender the right to regulate her franchise so that at no time hereafter can she interfere with it in contravention of the condition upon which alone we agree to admit her? If we have that power, there is some way, of course, of making its exertion effectual. That must be true. It can never be true that the General Government has a power which it cannot exert practically. A former President of the United States told us that he was of that opinion; that although he believed the States had no authority to secede from the Union, and that it was the duty of the General Government to prevent it, yet that it had no power to enable it to execute that duty. That is not my view. I think that all the powers that are vested in the General Government it has the means by legislation to execute, where they fail to execute themselves by their very nature.

If it is so, Mr. President, that the power exists in relation to a State which is not now in the Union, but is to be brought into the Union, and we impose it, then what becomes of the equality of the States? Arkansas, that being done, cannot change her franchise as regulated by the Constitution, and made by us a condition of the admission of the State. New York can; and so can every other State now in the Union, not only without the consent of Congress, but against its legislation. In other words, as far as New York is concerned, she is now just as absolutely the mistress of the power to regulate the franchise as she was before the Constitution of the United States was adopted. So is Maryland; so are all the other States; but Arkansas comes in with that power denied her; and that is inequality. If we have the right to exclude her except upon the condition that she will abandon forever the possession of that power which belongs to all the other States, why have we not the right to exclude her if she will not abandon all the other powers that belong to the other States? Why not regulate the number of which her Legislature is to be composed? Why not provide that there shall be only one branch? Why not provide that her judiciary shall be for life, or for a term of years? Why not say that they shall not be composed of lawyers or professional men? Can any reason be given?

If the power is in Congress to impose conditions which will limit the power of a State by a condition denying to her the right to regulate the franchise, I cannot see how any such distinction can be made. As the honorable member from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] suggested the other day, if the power exists why can she not agree to abandon her right to be represented upon this floor by two Senators; agree that she shall only have one, or that she shall have none; agree that her representation in the other House shall not be regulated by the rules by which representation in the other House on the part of the remaining States is regulated by the Constitution? Why not provide that her citizens shall not be at liberty to sue in the courts of the United States, or that they shall be compelled to sue alone in the courts of the United States? In a word, upon what ground, logically, reasonably, can it be maintained that Congress has the authority to take from a State the right to regulate the franchise by way of a condition to her admission into the Union, which will not lead to the demonstration of the power in Congress to deny to her any and every other of the sovereign rights which belong to the other States of the Union.

The honorable member from Missouri I think fell into an error, and the one upon which his argument rests, of not distinguishing between the authority which Congress exerts over the Territories of the Union and the formation of a Territory into a State, and that which will belong to Congress after the Territory and the people of the Territory are admitted as a State. Under the authority to make rules and regulations for the disposition of the public property of the United States, or under the authority of acquisition, whether that acquisition be made by purchase or by conquest, the Supreme Court of the United States said in the case of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter, in 7 Peters, the authority by the Government to constitute governments for the Territories necessarily existed; and I think they were clearly right; and having the authority to govern it as Territory and to govern the people as the people of a Territory, they have the power in the exertion of that authority to govern as seems to them to be best. What will conduce to the interests of the people of a Territory, Congress having the governing power, is necessarily to decide. The people of the Territory have no power whatever over the question. The whole is vested in the legislative department of this Government though the people of the Territory are not the constituents of that legislative department. The constituents of that department are the people of the States already in the Union. The Territory, therefore, is held by the States as represented in Congress, or the people of the States as represented in Congress, in trust for the benefit of the States and the people of the States, and for the benefit of the people of the Territory. We stand to them as guardians, and they to us as wards; but that relation exists only as long as the condition out of which it arises continues. The moment we admit them as States, then from the very nature of the Government they become entitled to all the political rights which belong to the other States of the Union.

Over the question of taxation the States have the power in particular instances to limit the exertion of their authority in the way of contract. Such was the case of New Jersey vs. Wilson, reported in Cranch; such is the authority of the several cases from New York and Maryland. In the first case, New Jersey, having stipulated with the Indians who owned a part of the lands within the limits of that State, that if they would transfer them they should have others, and that the others should never at any time be taxed, the Supreme Court held that the law passed by New Jersey in contravention of the terms of that agreement was void; void because it was in contravention of that clause of the Constitution which denies to the States the authority to pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract. That case only decided this: first, that a State can contract; and secondly, that whether it will tax a particular property or not is a subject about which it may contract.

So in the case of Maryland. We chartered banks, and we chartered them upon the condition of their paying a certain amount into the State treasury, and agreeing that in consideration of that amount being paid annually, so many cents on the dollar, no subsequent taxation should be levied. The Supreme Court maintained that; and they adopted the same doctrine in the case from Ohio. But as far as I have any knowledge, the legislative department of the Government never have at any time claimed the right to interfere with any power which belongs to the States, and have therefore never claimed the right to interfere with any such power unless the subject of the power is to be found in some one of the grants delegated to the General Government. Failing to bring them within the grasp of those delegated powers, then the court have said they are with the States absolutely.

Now, Mr. President, if we have the power which the condition of the bill assumes that we do possess, and which the condition of my friend from Missouri also assumes us to possess, it is because the subject of the power is with us, and that subject is the franchise. If that is a subject within our control we may control it just as we may think proper from time to time. If we have the right to impose this condition we have the right to impose any other condition which may affect that power. We may impose it, therefore, as a condition of the admission that the State will allow women to vote; that she will permit minors to vote; that she will permit aliens to vote. If we have the power to say that she must permit through all time a black man to vote, we have the right to say that she must, at all times, permit everybody else to vote who happens to be within the State at the time of her election. Will anybody pretend that our powers are as extensive as these suppositions imagine? I think not.

The error of the argument upon the other side, if it be erroneous, as I think it manifestly is, is in supposing that States of this Union can exist if deprived by the legislation of Congress of any right growing out of any power not included within those delegated to the General Government. In the case of Pollard's Lessees vs. Hagan, in 3 Howard, it was held that whether the navigable waters of Alabama were made free to navigation by the terms of the deed of cession, whether that deed was by Georgia or Virginia, or by any treaty of cession, was immaterial; the waters still (notwithstanding the State was admitted upon the condition that they were to be navigable) were as much under the control of the State as are the waters within the limits of the older States; and whatever power, therefore, is in its nature with reference to the waters municipal is in the States, not in the Government of the United States. The Supreme Court has recognized the same doctrine in various other cases.

In a case from Mississippi, Withers vs. Buckley, 20 Howard, page 92, the question arose substantially in this way: the waters of Mississippi were made free to navigation, absolutely free to everybody; the river itself, the Mississippi, changed its bed and left dry during the greater part of the year its original channel. It became necessary to the health of the State; it became necessary to the improvement of the land along this river, that certain improvements should be made by the State, and they changed the bed of the river, made canals; and one of the questions in the case was whether the act of Mississippi authorizing such improvements was constitutional, its constitutionality being denied upon the ground that the rivers within the limits of the State were made free to everybody. The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Daniel; the whole court united in it, Mr. Justice McLean then being upon the bench, and the late Chief Justice. Mr. Justice Daniel expressed himself in two or three sentences, which I will read. He said the provision relied upon—"could have no effect to restrict the new State in any of its necessary attributes as an independent sovereign government, nor to inhibit or diminish its perfect equality with the other members of the Confederacy with which it was to be associated."

"Clearly Congress could exact of the new State the surrender of no attribute inherent in her character as a sovereign, independent State, or indispensable to her equality with her sister States, necessarily implied and guaranteed by the very nature of the Federal compact."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend permit me to ask him if the court did not, after all, decide that what the State of Mississippi was doing was not a violation of the act of Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON. It did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And, therefore, would not this be merely the individual opinion of the judge?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; it is not the individual opinion of the judge; it is the opinion of the court; there was no dissent at all. It was not necessary to decide that question; but that question was before them and was argued, and the result of the deliberations of the court on it is to be found in the passages to which I have just adverted.

It must be so, I think, if we carefully consider the nature of our Government. The doctrine of my friend from Vermont and those who agree with him makes us a collection of States of unequal powers.

Equality, as the court say in that case, exists from the very nature of the Federal compact. That compact, evidenced by the Constitution in which it is incorporated, was a compact made between equals, and what was true of the States who were parties to that compact in 1789 is equally true of the States which are brought in, because it was a part of the compact, not that new territory might be brought in, but that new States might be brought in.

What was the evident meaning or the term "States" as there used? States like the rest;

States possessing all the powers belonging to the rest; the object being to have an association of equals, each agreeing to transfer to the General Government powers necessary for the protection and prosperity of all, but each reserving to itself all powers not deemed by those who framed the Constitution essential to the protection of all, but, on the contrary, reserved, because such reservation was necessary to the prosperity and protection of each.

I have said all that I propose to say upon the question of power. Mr. President, a word or two more and I have done. No member of the Senate is more anxious to see these States again in the Union than I am. I am for their re-introduction; that is the better term; because I want the Union to be what it was in every respect except slavery. That is gone, never to be restored.

But I want them back, not from the recollection alone of our common renown, but from a conviction that our future renown is connected with it. I want to get clear as soon as possible of the hands of the General Government over them, because I believe that the States as such are much better able to manage their own concerns than they can be managed by any measures which the Congress of the United States may adopt. Above all, I desire to get rid of the Army, of the military. To be governed by arms is wholly unsuited to the genius of American freedom. It may suit the nations of the continent of Europe; but that love of freedom which animated the country from which we have inherited nearly all the rights which we possess is such that her people would not for an hour, except from dire necessity, submit to the rule of the bayonet. Goto England; go to London, with her millions of inhabitants, where, I suppose, is to be found every degree of vice into which humanity falls, and you do not see a soldier. He is studiously kept within his own barracks, never to be called out until absolute necessity demands his assistance to the civil arm. I want to see that here; not that I have any prejudice against the Army as such, against the officers who have led it during the last war to victory upon so many battle-fields, and have won for themselves such imperishable renown, frustrating, as they did, the greatest rebellion ever known among men; but because from the very nature of military power it is dangerous to individual freedom, because it is unrestrained, and where ever that power is to be found whose only restraint, if restraint it can be called, is to be found in those who wield it, there is the very element of despotism. I want the States, then, readmitted. I care not what may be the effect upon the political questions which are agitating the country now or at any time hereafter.

I want them back upon this floor to aid us in the administration of our high functions; but I want them back as equals. I should be unwilling to sit here—and which of us would not be unwilling to sit here—the representative of a State which was not the equal of every other State in the Union represented on this floor? How would the sturdy men of the North, whose love of freedom is inherent, consent to abandon any State power which belonged to any of the other States of the Union in any other portion of our land? Not one. Great as they are in enterprise, able as they have been to maintain themselves upon a soil comparatively fruitless and barren, there is one thing that they prize more than that: it is the possession of equal rights; and, if I know them, I think, in the end, whatever may be their opinion now, they will insist upon the possession of equal rights by the States as well as by individuals. The two things cannot be separated. Destroy the equality of a State and her citizens are deprived of the rights which belong to others. I beg pardon, Mr. President, for having trespassed so long.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it seems to me that this whole question turns upon a point about which there has been no discussion on this occasion, and I beg leave to add, about which there is but little controversy; and that is, whether, under the Constitution of the United States, each State has a right to regulate or control suffrage for itself. I have taken that for granted, and I believe it has not been denied by a single Senator on this floor. Now, sir, if that be conceded, it seems to me that the question is at an end; for if the States individually have the right to control and regulate suffrage for themselves they cannot, under another clause of the Constitution, be deprived of it even by their own constitutions or compacts. The second section of the sixth article of the Constitution declares:

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

If it be conceded that by the Constitution the States have the power to regulate and control suffrage for themselves it is a right that cannot be affected by their own constitutions, by any compact or by any act of Congress, for the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land. How can a generation for itself, or acting for some particular purpose, or a party in Congress, that may be in power to-day and out of power next year, make a compact by which the supreme law of the land is to be changed or affected? It is declared in so many words that the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land, and therefore, whatever right by that Constitution is given to a State is the supreme law of the land, any State constitution or law to the contrary notwithstanding. This is the express declaration of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, I understood the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] to say that if a State desired to part with both its Senators it had the power to stipulate when it came into the Union that it should have no Senators in Congress or Representatives in the other House; and that, by an agreement between the State thus coming in and Congress, the State could forever be deprived of its representation, notwithstanding the Constitution says that each State shall have two Senators in Congress. To sustain this view, the Senator referred to that provision which says that "no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate," and he argued that by its consent it might be. But the Senator failed to notice the very important fact that that provision is contained in the clause in regard to amending the Constitution of the United States, which reads thus:

"Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses of the ninth section of the first article; and that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

It refers to the amendment of the Constitution, and this provision was inserted at the request of the weaker States at the time it was made, that the Constitution should never be so amended in any way by which the smaller States could be deprived of their equal representation in the Senate without their consent. That is what it meant. The clause refers to the amendment of the Constitution, and has no reference to an act of Congress, and gives no warrant for the declaration that by an act of Congress and the agreement of a State a State may be forever deprived of its representation in the Senate. It is not treating of acts of Congress, but it is treating of the amendment of the Constitution itself, and provides that it shall not be amended in this particular without the consent of the States affected themselves.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator from Indiana allow me a word there?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. DRAKE. The honorable Senator from Indiana is mistaken in supposing that I had overlooked the connection of that portion of the Constitution which I quoted with the matter that he refers to. It is, to be sure, in the article of the Constitution which relates to amendments; but I beg leave to suggest to my friend from Indiana that the very phraseology of it dissects it in fact from the very thing that he wishes to connect it with. The proviso to that article, after going on to provide how amendments shall be made, is in these words: "Provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article." Mark the language, that no amendment which shall be made shall affect certain provisions, and then the sentence is divided into two parts, and the next part is not "that no amendment shall be made which shall deprive a State of its equal suffrage in the Senate," but the general proposition—added on, doubtless, in that place merely as a matter of convenience—"that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." With all respect to the honorable Senator from Indiana, I conceive that the change of phraseology there, dropping the expression "that no amendment which shall be made shall have such and such effect," and coming to the other form of speech, "that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate," does not mean alone simply that no State shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate by an amendment of the Constitution, but that in no case shall it be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate without its own consent; and if it shall not be deprived of it without its own consent, manifestly the inference is that it may be deprived of it with its consent.

And while I am up, if the honorable Senator will allow me a single word more, I would ask permission to correct a statement that he made in his remarks just now. The Constitution nowhere says that each State shall have two Senators in this Senate, as the honorable Senator stated it. The Constitution says that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State." It is perfectly optional with a State to elect Senators or not as she pleases. It is simply fixing the number of Senators, not making it constitutionally obligatory upon every State to elect its two Senators.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator says that this clause may be detached from the rest of the article, and is general in its application, and means that by consent of a State it may be deprived of its two Senators in this body. I do not much like to argue this proposition; but this whole article five is one sentence, and applies exclusively to the subject of amending the Constitution of the United States; and this clause unquestionably refers to the subject of amendment, simply providing that no amendment shall be made by which the equal suffrage of a State in the Senate shall be taken away except by its own consent, and then there must be in addition to that the consent of three fourths of all the States besides, or it must be one of the three fourths. To amend the Constitution in that particular the consent of three fourths of the States must be given, and the State herself must be one of the number. To tear this language rudely from its context, and to say that it does not refer to amending the Constitution, and that it may as well refer to an act of Congress, or to a compact made by a State, is doing too much violence entirely. The argument of the Senator is ingenious, but it is not sound.

Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Missouri to say that Congress has the right to prescribe the conditions on which a State may be admitted. I agree with him in that, provided those conditions are of such a character as not to violate the Constitution of the United States. We are not bound to admit new States at all. If we refuse to admit them we need not give any reasons or we may give bad reasons. Our action is equally valid in either case. Therefore, to come in they must make their constitutions to please us; but when they have once come into the Union then they have the rights that any other State in the Union has; and one of those rights is to amend its constitution at its will and pleasure, governed by that overruling clause, however, that it shall still be republican in its form. I ask if every State in this Union has not exercised that right, and if the States are not exercising it from year to year, neither consulting Congress in regard to the character of the amendments nor as to the fact of their amending their constitutions at all, but at pleasure calling conventions and amending their constitutions. It is a right recognized as belonging to every State. There is but one restraint upon it, that they shall not so alter or change their form of government that it shall cease to be republican in its character.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Or impair the obligation of a contract.

Mr. MORTON. "Or impair the obligation of a contract," says the Senator from Vermont. A contract by whom made? As he would say, a contract made between the Government and the State, by which the State has surrendered to the General Government one of the rights it has under the Constitution of the United States, in defiance of the provision to which I have referred. If the right to regulate and control suffrage is given to the States by the Constitution, if you admit that, then that is the supreme law of the land, any provision of any law or State constitution to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator be good enough to point to that clause of the Constitution which confers that right on the States?

Mr. MORTON. What right?

Mr. DRAKE. The right to control the matter of suffrage exclusively.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator is disposed now to change his ground and to deny what has been taken for granted all through this debate, I shall, perhaps, take another occasion to discuss the matter. But I can refer to the fact that has been conceded from the foundation of the Government, and has been conceded in this argument up to this moment, so far as I know, that that right does belong to the States. Further than that, the fourteenth article, the amendment of the Constitution, which we insist shall be made part of the Constitution, distinctly recognizes that this power does belong to the States, and provides that if it shall be so exercised by any of the States as to exclude any race of men from the right of suffrage, they shall not be counted in the basis of representation.

Mr. DRAKE. The honorable Senator will allow me to interpose here for just one moment. It is not my purpose to interrupt him, but to make a suggestion. I take it that if the right to regulate suffrage, exclusive of all other authority, is to be derived from the Constitution at all, fixed in the States, it is under the tenth article of the amendments to the Constitution, which says that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." I suppose that to be the clause, if any, under which this power abides in the States.

Mr. MORTON. That clause will cover it; but there is another in which the right to vote for members of Congress is expressly refused to the electors who have the right to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature in each State, and under that it has been conceded from the foundation of this Government that the States had the right to control suffrage.

Mr. DRAKE. And yet as this is not mandatorily fixed in that people with an express prohibition against their alienating the right at all to any extent, my position is, not that they have not the right, but that they may by compact alienate it in part or in whole.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I shall not allow myself to be turned aside to-night to discuss the question whether, under the Constitution, the States have the right to control suffrage. I have taken that for granted for a long time.

Mr. DRAKE. I take it for granted, too.

Mr. MORTON. If that be taken for granted, I think it is the end of the question; but I will go a little further. My friend from Missouri puts it on the ground of conquered territory, and he says if we take any other ground our reconstruction acts would be invalid. He says that this is conquered territory, and we have a right to prescribe the conditions. Mr. President, suppose that we now consider this question for a moment on the ground that we are dealing with conquered territory. We have not acted upon that theory, but let us suppose now that that is the true theory. Suppose that we had acquired this territory by conquest and not by purchase or discovery; when we come to admit the conquered territory into the Union it is immaterial how it was acquired, whether by conquest, by purchase, or by discovery. We are about to make States of it, and the question of the method of acquisition is wholly unimportant. When it comes into the Union as a State it must have the rights of a State, and its people must possess the rights and privileges of the people of every other State according to the express terms of the Constitution.

My friend says what is the equality of the States? He does not recognize any such thing. Why, Mr. President, what is the equality of men? It is not that all men are equally intelligent or equally vigorous, physically or intellectually, or are of the same size; but it is that they have the same rights before the law; and the equality of the States is that each State of the Union has the same right to do any one thing that any other State has the right to do. That is all it means. Their constitutions may not be alike; they may be widely different; but they have the power to make them all alike or to make them unlike. Men having equal rights, they do not all act in the same way, but they have equal rights before the law; and the constitution is the law to the States. As I had occasion to say the other day, we have no right to alienate our natural rights as men; our life, our liberty, our right to our family or the pursuit of property; and any contract we make to that effect is invalid. That has been a fundamental doctrine in this country for over one hundred years, and it is now received by liberal men throughout the world, I believe. Neither has a State the right to alienate a right which that State has as a State under the Constitution of the United States. The doctrine that the present generation, for its own convenience or its imaginary interest, has the right to alienate against all coming generations, a right which a State possesses under the Constitution is absurd, and is contrary to the whole theory of the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has not a State a right under the Constitution to impose taxes upon its inhabitants, and may it not alienate the right to tax in a particular case or a particular class of cases?

Mr. MORTON. I was about to come to that. The whole class of cases referred to by the distinguished Senator the other day, in the discussion of this question, have no bearing on the present case. Why? The right of a State to make contracts is not denied, but it cannot make contracts in reference to its political rights. It may alienate property. The question of taxation is within the control of the Legislature of the State, and a State may make a contract with another State, with the General Government, or with a private person, by which it may alienate property, a piece of real estate that it has, for all time to come. That is a necessary part of alienation. You cannot sell your property unless you sell it against your heirs and all coming generations. And a State may make a contract in reference to the taxation of that property; but I ask if that is a parallel case to these things that go to the very foundation and constitution of government, as the right to control suffrage does a political right going to the very formation and creation and sustentation of government itself?

There is no comparison between the two, and the Supreme Court of the United States, in the judgment read by the honorable Senator from Maryland, while it admits that the decisions in regard to taxation are valid, yet draws a broad distinction between that and the class of cases that I referred to, and says that it is in the very nature of this Government that a State cannot be stripped of any of its powers by which it shall come into the Union inferior to any other State. One State can come in stripped of its right, according to the Senator from Missouri, to send Senators; another new State, Montana, for example, comes in and we say to it, "You shall not have representation; you will not have enough people to send a member of Congress for years to come; therefore you shall wait five or ten years before you send a Representative to the other House." They agree to it, and they are stripped of a fundamental right that belongs to a State according to the Constitution of the United States, and gentlemen say it is valid. Sir, I say that that theory will destroy this Government; destroy the equality of the States. Here are a collection of States, one having these rights, another having those, and a third having still different rights, having parted with this, that, and the other thing to suit the convenience or whims of Congress or the men who happen to be in power in the State or Territory at the time. The symmetry of the Government is gone; the theory of it is gone; and although this legislation may be harmless, as intimated by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] I am not prepared to enact harmless legislation of such a serious character.

These conditions may fall, as they will do. Having no vitality, having no power of enforcement, they will fall dead letters from the beginning; but they will form precedents for far more dangerous invasions of the powers of the States in time to come, and the matter is too grave and serious to be trifled with in this way, to say merely that it will do no harm. You may say that of any unconstitutional proposition, as the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] suggests, because being unconstitutional it will fall to the ground.

Mr. President, I have shown by my political life and by my works, I think, that I am an inveterate enemy of the blood-stained doctrine of State sovereignty; but while I hate that as being fraught with so much misery and ruin to our country, I still recognize the doctrine of State rights. There are rights that belong to the States, secured by the same Constitution that secures the rights of this Government, and therefore they are equally sacred. The States have their rights recognized by the Constitution of the United States as clearly and distinctly as that Constitution builds up this Government; and to the same extent, by the same power that sustains this Government, those rights are to be sustained. We cannot, we dare not, trample upon them. It was the abuse of the doctrine of States rights that led to the doctrine of State sovereignty; and it will be another abuse if we run to the other extreme, and say that the States have no rights which cannot be taken away by an act of Congress, or taken away by a compact, and a compact with a Legislature elected upon no such question, elected under a constitution not yet in force, and which would have to vote at a time when they have no constitutional power of any kind. A mere Legislature to make an agreement by which a State for all time is to be deprived of a right that is secured by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you mean to say they have no constitutional power of any kind now?

Mr. MORTON. These Legislatures? I do, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that be so, how can they agree to the fourteenth article, which is made the ground of their admission?

Mr. MORTON. I can answer that question. If these State governments now have constitutional rights they do not depend upon recognition by this Government. We have put their existence upon the acceptance of the State governments in each State by the Congress of the United States. Will you deny it? Will my friend insist that these State governments have become valid and constitutional without the acceptance of Congress? If he does, he must repudiate the reconstruction acts themselves, which provide expressly that they must first be accepted by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not insist on anything of the kind. I was asking my friend how, if these are not constitutional Legislatures, they can agree to the fourteenth article?

Mr. MORTON. I will tell the gentleman just how that is. When Nebraska came in as a State we first authorized by act of Congress her people to meet and form a constitution and State government. She went on and elected Senators of the United States. That election was invalid at the time, but that election was validated by the subsequent acceptance of that State government and receiving her into the Union. And now, when we shall accept these States, receive these State governments, and they come back into full fellowship and power in the Union, that act relates back and covers their ratification of the constitutional amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. The case is stronger, because we have said expressly here by the enabling act that they might do it.

Mr. MORTON. So we have; but that is the history of all the Territories.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend will permit me to say that I agree to that; and if that be so, I do not see why, so far as that particular point is concerned, we cannot also validate their act in agreeing to this fundamental condition.

Mr. MORTON. That brings me right back to my friend's argument on Friday last. I asked him the question then whether a State Legislature could make a fundamental condition binding on the people of that State for all time. He said that it could not in regard to a State already in the Union, but that it might be done by the Legislature of a State that was not yet received, but afterward came and continued in the exercise of its rights under the constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the line of reasoning you have now adopted.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; on the contrary I insist that the Legislature of a State—whether the State is as old as New York, as young as Nebraska, or is not yet admitted—has no power to make a fundamental condition any more than a State Legislature has power to make a constitution. What is our theory? That constitutional law is fundamental law, and therefore it is not to be made by State Legislatures, but to be made by the people in their primary capacity, their constitutional conventions, and afterward again to be ratified by the people at the polls. That is the way a constitution is to be made. Now, I should like to ask a question on the other side, as I have had a great many put to me. Suppose the State of Arkansas had put a provision in her constitution to the effect that it should never in any respect be amended, and the people of the present day met at the polls and ratified that, would that be binding on the people ten years hence, or upon the next generation, or one year hence? They have, we will suppose, provided and ratified it solemnly at the polls that the constitution shall never be amended. I say it is not binding on that State for one moment.

They have a right to meet the very next month in constitutional convention and change it, because it is part of the fundamental principles of this Government, declared in the Declaration of Independence, that the people have a right to meet from time to time and alter or amend their constitution or form of government, and therefore a constitutional convention of to-day cannot bind the people for all time. Why, sir, it has frequently happened that State constitutions have fixed a certain way in which they shall be amended. Some have fixed periods saying they shall not be amended except every ten years or every twenty years. I think in at least a dozen cases these provisions have been disregarded; and in States where they have provided that the constitution shall only be amended in a particular way they have amended it by a general convention; and where they have provided that they should only be amended at certain stated periods, ten years or twenty years, they have been amended at shorter periods, because the great fundamental right is respected that the people have the right to alter and amend their form of government from time to time; and it is not in the power of this generation to take away that right from the next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the right of revolution, otherwise than provided.

Mr. MORTON. I am not speaking of the right of revolution; I am speaking of the way in which the right has been exercised from time to time to amend the constitutions of the several States.

Mr. President, I have said about all I want to say in regard to this matter. I feel some interest in the question from the fact that this legislation would be a blemish upon the legislation of Congress, that it would form a dangerous precedent. I think we have no right to assume that we can take from States by contract rights which belong to them by the Constitution of the United States. It may now be applied to a thing that appeals strongly to all our feelings, as does the right of suffrage to men of all races and of all colors, but it may be equally applied to take from them the right to representation in whole or in part; it may be applied to a hundred things which would disqualify the States in time to come, make them unequal to each other, and be a burden to future generations. Let us preserve the simplicity and the harmony of our Government. The simple theory propounded by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case referred to by the Senator from Maryland is the true one and the just one.

One word in regard to the Nebraska case which has been referred to. I think it does not amount to much of a precedent according to my recollection of the case. The reference back by which the State Legislature was to say that no distinctions of color should be made in the right of suffrage was a mere make-shift at the time. The constitution had been formed; the Legislature had met and elected Senators; the State government was all organized, and the Senators were here and the State was knocking for admission; the constitutional convention had been dissolved, and certain Senators on this floor—I believe eight or nine, according to my recollection—declared that the State should not come in without a provision that suffrage should be equal to all without distinction of race or color, and it was found that they were determined, and the bill could not be carried over the President's veto without their votes, and, therefore, it was fixed up to avoid the necessity of calling another constitutional convention and have all this thing over. It was fixed up as a sort of greased board to slide down on, [laughter,] that we should put that in the act of admission and the Legislature should ratify it, and, therefore, the thing be fixed up so that Nebraska could come in without division in the Republican party. That is my understanding of that case. I was not here, but I understand that to be the fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator states that to be the fact, I want to dissent now, because I acted on an entirely different principle for one.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That was about my understanding of it.

Mr. MORTON. That was my understanding.

Mr. CONKLING. It was pretty thoroughly the understanding in both Houses at the time.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, the bill for the readmission of Arkansas to the Union is now before the Senate. I desire, before recording my vote upon this singular measure, to explain briefly my reasons for it.

The State of Arkansas was by a solemn act of Congress, in the year 1836, made one of the United States.

From this position she could not recede save by conquest of a foreign Power, by a successful revolution, or by the decree of the whole people of all the States. She could never again by act of her own or by act of Congress become a province or a territory.

I will not attempt now to pursue a theme barren of practical results, but direct my attention to the real issue before my mind.

Seven years ago this State, in connection with ten other States, made an effort to withdraw from the Union and establish a confederacy of their own, founded upon what they called the divinity of slavery.

It was an institution that made its appearance in America in the very dawn of the earliest settlements. It took deep root in the affections and interests of the people. It grew with their growth and multiplied as they did. Its years and sins only augmented its power and its evils. It became the sole idol of the church. Before it the politician bowed in humble submission to its power. It became the sole agent of the planter and the trader. It was their present support and future hope. It was the element of their pride and the nurse of their self-respect. They defended it with an instinctive ferocity unknown in history.

This outgrowth of passion and selfishness increased from the food on which it fed until it became a monster that filled the whole land. Ambition, pride, rage, war, and ruin have followed in its pathway. Reason, prudence, wisdom, and moderation had no place within the limits of its power, or even within the atmosphere of its vain pretensions.

It was no visionary theorist. It placed no reliance on the unseen and unfelt power of thought to accomplish results. The all-pervading and insensate power of charity and love of humanity was to it the dreamer's visions. It trusted not to the ideal nor the insensate. It was practical, aggressive, positive, material, real physical force. It trusted to no Davids with pebbles, sling, and faith. It relied on Goliaths armed with iron mail and swords like a weaver's beam.

Like all selfishness, it nursed the passions that culminated in the unfortunate revolution that prostrated the adored idol forever. Out of its ruins the nation has sought to evoke a new and higher civilization inspired from higher principles and nobler motives. Instead of selfishness and power for its foundations, liberty, equality, and love are its fountains of life. Instead of physical force, faith is its defense. It relies not on Congresses, armies, nor Presidents, but on a heroic and generous people in defiance of the blighting influences of slavery, and on those causes which a wise and ever wakeful Providence is directing to the accomplishment of good results.

Before the close of the rebellion the loyal people of Arkansas hastened to place themselves in their former relations with the Union. They were prompt to renounce the cause of all their woes, and to establish a State government that should prove acceptable to the nation. In this they did not succeed.

At the close of the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress the military bill for "the more efficient government of the rebel States" was passed. This bill received my vote, not because it met my approbation, but because it proposed some plan, some possible opportunity for the restoration of law and order to these States. I do not desire to shrink from any part of the responsibility of these measures, nor to wear any portion of the laurels that may be won from their success.

When this measure was first proposed it was a pure military measure for the government of the States then without representation in Congress. It was the naked sword of power suspended by a fragile thread over the heads of these devoted States. It was cold and cheerless as the eternal ice-fields of Arctic regions. It had not a single warm ray of light or love to commend it to humanity. It was the very abstraction of unalloyed power. It commanded obedience and unsheathed the sword. That it would have been efficient no one will doubt unless from that resistance, the sympathies of man with man, that will be found in every being not wholly divine or demon.

Before its passage it was amended by uniting with this cold expression of power some human warmth and promise. The BLAINE amendment from the House and the military bill were put through the crucible of a caucus committee, and the present bill, with the variations of the caucus itself, gave it its redeeming character, the principle of impartial suffrage, and it became the law of the land March 2, 1867. The spirit that conceived and embodied in that act the appellation "rebel States" was neither Christian nor American. While some of the people were rebels the State never. The good name of every State is a part of the pride of every patriot. This appellation is given to the State to endure through all time. Those that deserved it were the creatures of the moment; they were here to-day and gone to-morrow. To apply this epithet to the States is unworthy the dignity of statesmen or patriots. While I do not desire to reflect on the action of Congress or the part taken in that matter by any person, I desire to record now my opinion of it, although it may condemn my own action in the matter.

The three following sessions of the Fortieth Congress each passed a supplemental bill for the purpose of carrying into effect, at the earliest period, the desired object. The most prompt and decided efforts were put forth by the people in all these States to meet the demands made by Congress upon them. All the conditions but one have been complied with. They have not yet ratified the amendment of the Constitution known as the fourteenth article.

That they will do so at an early period is manifest. Virtually all the conditions have been fulfilled by a determined act of the people.

Why then delay to comply with the promise held out to them? Why break the faith of the nation? Why postpone this measure until these States feel the sting of disgrace? Why delay this duty until its discharge becomes more odious than open prompt rejection? What good can result either to the State or the nation? What profit or statesmanship in distrust, suspicion, in calculations of party advantage or mere political results?

Why again seek to impose new conditions? What good can result from imposing new burdens? Have they not actually done the very thing demanded to be made a perpetual covenant by the amendment of the Senator from Missouri? Is it not enough that these people have made a constitution embodying all that the amendment asks? Will it be any better to call it a compact? On the part of Congress it is a legislative enactment and nothing more. On the part of the State in accepting it it is a legislative enactment and nothing more. A subsequent Congress can repeal the act. A subsequent Legislature can do the same. Neither Congress nor any State Legislature have any warrant from the people to make any such perpetual covenant that shall bind the people from generation to generation. If the Legislature of Arkansas should ratify the condition it would last just as long as the people there might choose to retain it on their statute-books and observe it, and not one hour more. The action of the Legislature would be entitled to no respect, and it would receive none. The whole is unauthorized and unreasonable. If adopted it cannot fail to become mischievous.

What is the object of this perpetual condition that they shall never abridge the right of franchise or change it as announced in their constitution? Does not the fourteenth article concede to the State the right and power over the qualification? Is it proposed now, in the face of that article, to bind a State by a perpetual condition never to alter, abridge, or change, or enjoy the privilege of that constitutional amendment?

What is the end? To secure the citizen in the enjoyment of equal rights and privileges? They have that already or the classes sought to be profited by the amendment. Is not a public opinion that gave a constitutional guarantee of these rights a better security than an act of Congress made by the representatives of States that neither now sanction the principle nor would be at this time induced to accept it themselves? Is not the public opinion of Arkansas quite as good a guarantee for the preservation of this principle as that of Missouri or Ohio? Is it not rather presumptuous for such States to be dictating conditions to Arkansas? Who commissioned them to bind burdens and lay them on other people's backs, which they will not touch with their own little fingers? Who authorized them to pick the motes out of other people's eyes, while their own are filled with great beams? Who sent forth these physicians all sick unto death, to heal the sound and healthy?

The admission of the Senators and Representatives from these States is a solemn duty imposed not only by the Constitution, but by solemn promise. Why not fulfill it? The first reason assigned by some is the irregularity and frauds in the election by which the constitution was adopted and the State officers were chosen.

To this I would reply, How can you hope under the present system of government to have one conducted in a more honest way? How can you hope by future elections to correct these irregularities? I see no prospect of obtaining a fairer expression under the present machinery.

The constitution is said to be anti-republican in some of its features.

It is not perfect; far from it. What work of human hands is? I would have had it more liberal in some respects, but it is not my will, but that of the convention that framed it and those who adopted it. They are satisfied with it. If not, it is their province to altar and amend it to conform to their desires and wants. A few months or years will demonstrate its imperfections and point out to the people the changes that should be made.

There is a great unwritten law that molds and modifies all written constitutions. It is that ever active and all-pervading spirit that moves the national mind and heart. Under its authoritative influences old frames of government are put off and new put on like flowers that give way to the coming fruit.

It has been significantly asked who are these States to send here? May they not be traitors as they have been before? I think I can answer the first, if not the second. They will send just such men as the people choose to select. The people have not all the virtues in the world, nor all the vices known to humanity. They are in many respects like their neighbors. Their virtues quite as high, their frailties quite as many and as great. I have some knowledge of them, have lived among them, and can trust to their entire competency to control their own interests and select the men who can express their wishes. They are American citizens. They know no superiority. They ask no privileges and dictate no advantages. They ask the rights and acknowledged equality that is the common inheritance of every man that claims the protection of the flag. He is a bold man, indeed, that presumes to call in question their capacity, their integrity, or their rights. Who will they send here? Men who will be the peers of the proudest, who will claim to be neither the highest nor the humblest, but the equals of each and all. The second question is not quite so easily answered. Who will pretend to foretell what he may himself become? I shall receive them openly, joyfully, and trust with fondest hope to their fidelity to the cause of universal liberty and devoted attachment to the principles of the American Government. If in them there be not inherent loveliness sufficient to command the respect and adoration of men, then I shall tremble for the perpetuity of my country. The generous and enlightened patriot who has faith in American institutions as a grain of mustard seed cannot distrust his fellow-citizens who have shown equal devotion and made equal sacrifices with himself. Generous confidence is less likely to be betrayed than mean suspicion.

The admission of the Senators and Representatives from Arkansas is not the admission of a new State into the Union in any sense whatever; but I will not dwell on this question.

The Constitution gives to Congress the right to admit new States. When these States are admitted they have just such rights and are subject to such limitations as the Constitution grants. Congress has no power to change or abridge in any manner the relations of a State to the Union. They can make no treaty, compact, or ordinance not common to all the States, and none that has any more force, or that is of any higher or more enduring obligation than a law of Congress.

If Congress should impose a condition on a conquered territory it could not be of any force after its admission to the Union. The admission of a new State by Congress is not a compact or of the nature of a compact. The Government is a national Government ordained by the people. When a new State asks admission it is the adoption of the national Government by the people of the State as their own whereby they become a unit of the nation. They assume all the obligations and become subject to the same limitations that other States are. These and no more. The Constitution then becomes the sole guide to their rights and their duties. This subject has been too long the theme of debate to justify a continued repetition here.

I may be pardoned for a remark relative to the fourteenth article and the constitution of Arkansas. There are five sections in what is known as the fourteenth article of the Constitution, and but one of these, and that the first, that can survive the criticism of the future. It is the only one that has arisen from the sentiments of benevolence and faith in humanity. All the others are so many monuments of fear, distrust, and selfishness. I may say of the second that it was dictated by prudence; but not from a generous devotion to the principles of eternal justice to all men. The rest can scarcely claim the respect of exalted statesmanship, and will never gain it. They are the mere expression of passions aroused by the disjointed time that called them forth. The first is as distinct in spirit from the rest as heaven is from earth. It is the brightest jewel in the casket of its author's treasures. It is a generous, manly expression of the love of a great soul lifted above the storms of passion, prejudice, and petty distrust.

I would have been more pleased with the constitution of Arkansas if the framers had placed in it no monuments to perpetuate the unhappy animosities that arose out of a sad and wasting war, and which now mar the peace and quiet of the nation. Prudence, indeed, dictates some restraints upon the unfaithful and vicious, some barriers against the discontented and disaffected, who, having failed in their revolution, still seek to thwart the advent of a new and better era to the State. Prudence also dictates that as few restraints on the full enjoyment of civil rights as is compatible with the safety of the citizen, can be incorporated into the constitution of a State. Bitter social and political animosities are not to be reconciled by constitutional enactments and laws to perpetuate and keep them in constant activity. After all, the intellect, the virtue, and charity of the community must rule. For a day passion may hush the voice of reason, but that day will have its end. Time and the good genius of humanity will soon triumph over our weaknesses and consign them to their merited oblivion. I do not envy the man that legislates from passion, prejudice, or self-interest. Happy is the State whose law-givers trust to the divinity of truth, and rely on justice and generous forbearance.

This was, however, the work of the people of Arkansas. It was their right to do as they thought would best promote their own happiness and interest; and I am satisfied. They have accomplished their object by great labor under great disadvantages. They have wrested their victory from their opponents without aid from either the acts of Congress or from other sources. I am unwilling longer to delay the admission of their Senators and Representatives to their places. In my judgment it should be done by a simple resolution, not claiming their admission as a new State, but declaring the restoration of the former relations of the State to the General Government. I shall, however, vote for the admission of the members under any bill that may be proposed; at the same time I shall spurn all conditions that may seem to reflect upon the State, and all invidious distinctions and limitations. I shall do this because I consider them violative of good faith and the constitutional rights of the States.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have an adjournment.

Mr. HOWE. No; the Senate will not agree to it. I know the Senate want to vote, and I am not going to prevent them from voting but a very short time. I hope they will indulge me in saying a few words upon this question, for it happens to be one upon which I have had fixed convictions for a great many years. I once took occasion to express those convictions to the Senate at great length. I shall not repeat them now. From that time up to this I have scarcely said a word on the subject of what we call reconstruction. Under laws which have been adopted from time to time, the work has gone on, and now the people of Arkansas come here and ask to have committed to them the prerogatives of a State. I feel it due to truth to declare here that I have never believed the policy pursued by Congress was dictated by the truest or the highest wisdom. I am here now to say that I have not the most unlimited confidence in the result which you have produced in this one community. But Arkansas is here "the first fruits of them that slept;" and in reference to the propriety of now committing to that people the great prerogatives which, under the Constitution of the United States belong to a State, I have two or three words to say.

The first is to express the opinion that there are not ten men in this Senate who believe it is a safe thing to do at this time. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] appealed to us on Saturday almost in passionate terms to do it whether or no; the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL], a few days earlier, made a similar appeal; and what was the ground of it? That these people were dying for the want of these prerogatives, of this new character, of this rehabilitation; that their lives were not safe and that their property was not protected. I believe those Senators were right. Why are they not protected? Because of these two facts: first, when the Legislature of the United States undertook to deal with this question at all, they found civil governments down there manufactured by the President; you took a long time to examine them, to inspect the material out of which they were made, and you came to the conclusion that under those governments life and property were not safe and would not be safe, and thereupon you undertook to say that they should not possess the prerogatives of States; you declared them to be provisional governments only, and you subjected them by an act of the national Legislature to military control; so that from that time to this there has been the most complex machine running down there that I think was ever set up in this world and employed in the work of human government—civil tribunals supervised by military agents. If property and life have not been protected under those governments, as I believe is the fact, I do not think any one of us ought to be very much disappointed: it is not in the nature of such a government to enforce justice between man and man, and as I have just remarked property and life are not safe.

But the reason why you discarded the governments which were built by the President was because they did not furnish protection to life and property. The reason why the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Illinois appeal to us so vehemently now to discard those governments is the same; I admit the force of it, and I want to discover those governments' laws. But to commit those people to the government of what we call a State irrevocably seems to me a procedure fraught with quite as much danger as threatened that people and as has fallen upon that people by the employment of these other contrivances.

It is said, sir, that the government organized for Arkansas to-day is distinguished from that which the President made in 1865 in this radical particular, that the governments he made were animated by a spirit of hostility to the national authority, and represented a hostile population; whereas it is said that this government recently created for the people of Arkansas is made of loyal material, material friendly to the national authority, and represents a people which is friendly to the national authority. I guess the distinction is rightly taken. I believe such to have been the character of that first government, and I believe such to be the character of this government which claims recognition now.

But that is not the only question for us to determine. It would be very insane to send a grand old ship to sea simply because you had found a loyal crew to put on her decks if you did not know that they had the capacity to sail the ship, let the winds blow as they would. And I wish the Senate to answer the question to themselves whether they are entirely satisfied that this loyal constituency, which seems to-day to have taken the lead in the fashioning of this government, is a constituency combining those numbers and that intelligence and that influence which will enable them to maintain this government in loyal hands; I do not say in Republican or Democratic hands, or in the hands of any political party, but will maintain it in its allegiance to the national authority, maintain it in hands friendly to the national authority, and, more than that, will maintain it in hands which are friendly to that cause which we have professed to have so much at heart, the cause of equal justice and equal political rights between man and man; because if that is not the fact, what is the use of all the labor we have gone through?

Well, sir, what are the evidences upon that point? This constitution, this framework of government was submitted to a vote of the people of Arkansas, the people being defined in this very constitution, and I am told to-day that there was a majority of thirteen hundred only given for the adoption of the constitution. That, I believe, is the most that is claimed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] That, I believe, is all that is claimed by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.] On the other hand, I believe it is vehemently denied that there was any thirteen hundred majority, or any majority at all given for this constitution. Suppose there were such a majority, is it safe to commit this government to the hands of that population upon that small margin? For myself, sir, I have not been able to believe that it was prudent either to the national interest or to any portion of the people in Arkansas, that this should be done. That is but a very small number to be charged with the protection and security of that great machine which we know as an American State.

Is there, then, any way of avoiding this necessity, and yet of relieving this people from the burdens and grievances which it is said they suffer under the existing Government? I think there is; and I cannot pass this point without calling the attention of the Senate to the interpretation which has been placed upon the act of admission throughout this debate. After years of toil and struggle, you have enabled the people of Arkansas to produce here a constitution which, having been inspected, you say is satisfactory; and upon that constitution Senators say they are willing to admit the State. But what significance do they give to the act of admission? It has been advertised from the beginning to the end of this debate that by the act of admission you clothe that very people with the power to transform, to transfigure that constitution next week, or next month, or whenever they please, and make it as unlike that as it is possible for two constitutions to be; and it is assented to to-day, upon the claim of its friends, by only a majority of thirteen hundred. I am sorry to hear this doctrine asserted in the American Senate; and yet it has been asserted, not on one side of this Chamber alone, but upon both, and from the mouths of able lawyers on both sides of this Chamber, and upon the motion of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FESSAY,] I believe, the Senate came within one vote of declaring that doctrine in the face of the bill which is now on your table, sir.

I am bound to say, in passing—I do not propose to argue the question—that the argument which has been made here as to the effect of the admission of a State is not satisfactory to me. I do not believe that the Constitution of the United States clothes the national Legislature with discretionary power to look into the organic law of a people proposing to be a State, and inspect it carefully and critically, and pass upon it on the question whether it is a safe constitution for the people of an American State or not, and that then they necessarily remit to that people the power to utterly abrogate that Constitution and put something in the place of it radically contradicting every feature of it. I do not believe that is the true interpretation of the American Constitution; but I am not going to argue that question. I know how impatient the Senate is for a vote. That, however, is what the Senate almost declares to be the true interpretation of the American Constitution; and yet, advised that there are a voting majority of thirteen hundred that have assented to this constitution as it stands, and advised that there are those who deny that there was one hundred or one majority—nay, advised that there are those who assert that there were hundreds of a majority the other way at that very election, hundreds that did not assent to this Constitution, but who protested against it—I am not settling the question of fact; I do not know how it is; this is the way it is presented to us; these are the rival claims; and yet, sir, we are told we must commit this perilous power to this people and trust to their disposition.

Well, sir, I am bound to say with all candor, that, dangerous as I think the experiment is, I shall make it; I shall vote to make it rather than consent to leave these communities under the governments now existing within them. I have never liked those governments from the beginning, and I do not like them much better to-day than I did in the beginning; and yet I must, in justice to them, say that I think they have discharged the very delicate duty imposed upon them better than we had a right to expect, and better than, for one, I did expect; but I yet am not so much in love with them as that I would not prefer to trust these people to themselves with this constitution they present here if such was the only alternative; but I think it is not the only alternative; and I propose to close my remarks by submitting a motion, not in the hope of securing for it the assent of the Senate, but a motion which will at least express my own view of the way to meet the exigency—a motion to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report a bill which shall adopt the constitution recently framed by the people of Arkansas as the organic act of a provisional government, and to report a bill which shall enable the government already elected down there to assume the functions of governing this people provisionally, and which shall admit to the Senate and the House the Representatives of this people upon the footing of Delegates. That is the motion I shall submit.

This is novel; the like of it never was known before in the course of our legislation. Mr. President, it is rather too late in the history of our legislation for the American Congress to turn pale at a novelty. We ought to be familiar with novelties already. But, Mr. President, let me say, as a lawyer—no; I have heard so much of the law lately, that I dare not put on any such character, [laughter,] let me say, as a representative, not as a lawyer, but as a man whose understanding has not been sharpened nor enlarged either by the study of the law, [laughter,] that there is not a principle in these instructions that you have not recognized over and over again.

Of course these instructions deny to that people the character of a State. We have denied that all along. It then adopts the organic act for the government of this people. You have had an organic act for them all along. You always framed an organic act for the government of every people who are outside of a State. When they come into a State you allow the people to frame the organic act for themselves. All the difference there is between my proposition, so far as that is concerned, and what you have done over and over again, is this: that you take, ready made, the organic act; it is an organic act on which the people have been consulted and to which they have assented. It is none the worse for the fact that the people of Arkansas have assented to it. That does not make it any the worse nor any the less valid; but it will derive its authority, not from the fact that they have assented, but from the fact that Congress assents to it, and declares it to be the organic law for the government of this people in lieu of your reconstruction acts heretofore assented to.

Then, Mr. President, these instructions ask the committee to report a bill which shall enable that government selected by the people to take upon themselves the duty of discharging the functions prescribed in this organic act. There is no difficulty in principle about that. If you could make those tribunals built by the President in 1865, rebel as they were, do the work of civil government, and do it in subordination to the authority of the United States, simply by calling them provisional governments, you may make these tribunals do the same work, may you not? If you could employ your major generals and your brigadiers in the work of exercising civil control down there, you may take these very tribunals which have been selected by the people and charge them with the same duty, may you not?

There is one step further. I propose to instruct the committee to report a bill which shall admit to the floor of the Senate and of the House of Representatives the representatives of these people, not as Senators and Representatives in Congress, but as Delegates, having a voice here but not having a vote; here to consult with us, here to advise, here to express their views in reference to their own local interests, but for the present without a vote; differing from the representation you have always provided for Territories in this respect: you have only provided for a representation in one House, and here you provide for a representation in both Houses. The authority which does one can do the other. It differs from that representation in another respect: there you have uniformly confined the representation to one individual, and here you will give a representation equal to the population in one House and equal to any State of the Union in the other House. The principle I do submit is precisely the same. The authority which can do one can do the other.

If there is no difficulty in principle—and I cannot stop to dwell on these points, I am under contract to occupy only a few minutes—then what advantages will you gain by this? I do not understand that we can admit to the right to vote in Congress anybody but Representatives and Senators. We never have given, I think, to the representative of any Territory the right to vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. We never have had any in the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. But I take it in whatever House they sit, they would sit clothed with the same character, the same power. Now, Mr. President, if there is no difficulty in principle, what are the advantages you are to secure by this?

First, this advantage would be secured to the people of Arkansas, that they would have the work of civil government committed to the very tribunals, the very men they have selected themselves for that purpose, with just as much authority as they propose to give them in their constitution. Every authority which in that constitution is delegated to any one of those tribunals they would have under this proposition of mine. They would choose their Legislature, and the Legislature would make the laws; they would choose their Governors, and the Governors would perform precisely the duties in reference to that local government they would if the constitution was ratified as the constitution of a State, doing all this by the assent of the Congress of the United States; and the laws would be administered and justice would be measured out between man and man by the tribunals of their own selection. That is the first advantage.

If that constitution, or the government created under that constitution, can protect life and property, and liberty, if it be once recognized as a State, it can do it when the same authority is committed to them provisionally. There would be just two restrictions upon their power: first, they could not appoint Senators and Representatives in Congress as they could if admitted as a State; and second, they could not pass a law which would operate injuriously upon the national interest, or a law which would operate oppressively on one class of the people or another without giving to Congress the power to interpose by its veto, and prevent that law from going into effect.

This would be the advantage which the people of Arkansas would derive—every conceivable advantage which they hope to obtain from admission into the Union. On the other hand, what advantage should we derive? This: we should have Representatives chosen by that people here in both of these Houses, with whom we could confer, from whom we could hear, to whose advice we could listen; and, Mr. President, I think you know and will concede that that has been a desideratum for years. Since we have undertaken to exercise civil control down there we have felt the want of just such accredited agents here, with whom we might confer and from whom we might receive advice. That we should get; and we should get thus every single advantage that we could get from admitting them into the Union, except the advantage of their votes. I am sorry to do without the votes of the Representatives of Arkansas, but those votes are not a necessity to the nation. I believe those votes are Republican. So I understand. That is the kind of vote I like, let it come from what quarter of the Union it will; but we are not dying for the want of Republican votes just at this present speaking. We are getting along pretty well with what we have; at least our side of the House is, and I take it our friends on the other side will not insist upon our taking in any more immediately.

Mr. President, perhaps this proposition of mine does not strike any single man here as so good as some he could present himself. I am quite satisfied that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] believes his own proposition is the best; and yet I do not understand what advantage he claims from his proposition, which is the proposition to admit nakedly just as they stand this people to the full prerogatives of a State. I only propose to continue this until the fourteenth article of amendment is made a part of the Constitution, because when that is made part of the Constitution, then the national authority will be to an extent to which it is not now adequate to the protection of every class of the people in these communities.

The Senator from Pennsylvania who spoke to us the other day [Mr. BUCKALEW] would like his theory better than this. His theory is to wipe out these provisional governments, which were made by your reconstruction acts a year ago, and recognize the governments created by the President in 1865 as the governments of these States. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania does not expect to secure the assent of the Senate to that proposition, and this is certainly better, or ought to be deemed better, I think, in the judgment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and, I should think, more satisfactory to my friend, the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. McCREERY,] than to let these provisional governments, which have been operating for the last year and a half, still remain, and better in his view of the subject than to commit to this people the full prerogatives of a State at once.

One other advantage we gain, and that is if experience should demonstrate that the crew which you have now mustered on the deck of this young ship is not able to sail her, you could without difficulty change the crew; you could repair the mistake; you could remedy the difficulty.

Now, Mr. President, if I have made my proposition intelligible, I have succeeded in exposing to the Senate just the difficulties I have in the way of giving a hearty support to this act of admission; and I shall conclude by submitting my motion to the Senate and asking a vote upon it, and then I shall stand the consequences with as much fortitude as I can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is moved that the bill be recommended to the Committee on the Judiciary, "with instructions to report a bill adopting the constitution framed by the convention in Arkansas, with such amendments as may be necessary for the organic act of Arkansas, and enabling the government recently chosen for that State to discharge provisionally the several duties prescribed by such organic act, and to admit the Senators and Representatives to Congress upon the footing of delegates until the fourteenth article shall be ratified and become a part of the Constitution of the United States, or until Congress shall otherwise order."

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I had intended to speak upon this bill, but I have made up my mind to defer speaking until some other occasion when it will be quite as pertinent as it is now to discuss the subject of suffrage and the power of Congress over the question of suffrage. I rise now simply to make a remark or two upon the question of the power to impose the fundamental condition which has come to us in the bill of the House of Representatives, and I promise to detain the Senate not over five minutes.

I wish to say upon that point that I understand various Senators, the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] my colleague, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] to contend, as I admit, that the States have primarily the power as to suffrage to decide who shall vote, subject, however, to the proposition that Congress has the power to decide whether the constitution is republican in form. I have stated the gentlemen fairly. I have their remarks, which I shall read from hereafter.

The question, then, is who is to decide whether a government is republican in form? You answer Congress. All those gentlemen have answered that Congress is to decide whether the Government is republican in form. Then, sir, I understand the proposition to be that the States have exclusive power over the question of suffrage, with the exception that Congress may intervene when the constitution of a State government is not republican in form. When the question arises whether a constitution is republican in form, who decides it? Congress. May not Congress say that no constitution is republican in form which excludes any large class of the people from voting? Then, sir, where is the power? The revisory power is in Congress, is it not? And may not Congress exercise that power by imposing a condition in the first instance, or by declaring the constitution of any State which does exclude a large portion of its population from the right of suffrage to be null and void?

Take an illustration; it is a supposable case: suppose the colored people in the State of South Carolina, having a majority, should, by their constitution or by their legislative enactments, undertake to exclude from the polls the white people, to deny them the right of suffrage, would not that be a case in which Congress would have the right to intervene? Then, suppose the white people of New York should exclude a large class of colored citizens from the right to vote, could not Congress intervene under the altered state of the Constitution, slavery being abolished, every man, without regard to color, being the equal of every other man, entitled to the same rights? That being so, I say New York would have the same right to exclude from the polls the Senator from New York that she would have to exclude Frederick Douglass—precisely the same right under the Constitution as amended.

Here is a test of whether a government is republican in form, the crucial test, equality of rights. That is the basis of all republican governments; and if the constitution of any State or the laws of any State interfere with the equal rights of the citizen, its government is not republican in form. Who decides it? The State or Congress? You say the time has not come. Time always exists; it is always at hand. If New York excludes any portion of her citizens who bear arms and pay taxes, or whether they bear arms and are taxed or not, if she excludes any large class of her citizens from the right of suffrage, hers is not, according to our republican theory, a government republican in form. Congress, not the States, decide that question. There is an exception to the power and the authority of the States.

But, sir, I intend to argue this question fully hereafter; I now merely throw out these ideas. I am for this condition, and I would not give a snap for the bill without this condition. If it be admitted that the people in Arkansas have the right at the first election to decide whether they will change this constitution, I apprehend they will change it. The rebel leaders have the power there; they own the lands; they have the money; they have the disposition to do it, by fraud, by force, by murder, by assassination, by bribery, by starvation, by intimidation and threats; and, holding out the hope of reward, they will come up with a majority on their side instead of there being thirteen hundred majority on ours. I want this fundamental condition to be a part of the law upon which the State is admitted. Then she is bound by it. Congress has the power to impose this condition either in the formation of the State or in the recognition of it after it is formed.

I deemed it important that I should say this much to justify my vote in favor of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, or some similar bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say but one word.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If the Senator will allow me, I will make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No; I do not ask the Senate to adjourn.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I agreed to wait here until six o'clock. It is getting past that, and there seems to be no prospect of getting a vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we shall get the vote now in a very few minutes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not propose to occupy more than five minutes, and I do not ask the Senate to adjourn on my account. I am willing that the Senate should dispose of the bill this evening. I simply desire to say that my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] as it seems to me, did not meet the points which I made in my argument on Saturday: first, that the constitution which is sought to be recognized establishes a test by an oath which is to be administered to every man that goes to the polls to vote in Arkansas, which disfranchises a majority of the American people even in the free States. If they were to go to Arkansas they could not vote at all. Why, sir, the honorable Senator himself could not vote in Arkansas if he believes now as he did a few years ago, because a few years ago on the floor of the Senate he declared:

"I know that there is a distinction between the two races, because the Almighty himself has marked it upon their very faces, and, in my judgment, man cannot, by legislation or otherwise, produce a perfect equality between those races so that they will live happily together."

Why, sir, Thomas Jefferson would be disfranchised in Arkansas under this constitution. He said:

"Nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate than that these people [the negroes] are to be free. Nor is it less certain that the two races equally free cannot live in the same Government. Nature, habit, opinion have drawn indelible lines of distinction between them."

My honorable friend [Mr. TRUMBULL] also, in language equally strong, on another occasion said:

"There is a distinction between the white and black races made by Omnipotence himself. I do not believe these two races can live happily and pleasantly together and enjoy equal rights without one domineering over the other."

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator need not understand me as having changed that opinion. I think the misfortune to-day is that the two races are together. I do not believe they will live as happily and pleasantly together as if they were one. That is no reason, however, why we should not allow them rights as freemen.

Mr. POMEROY rose.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall come to my honorable friend from Kansas in a few minutes, if he will allow me. I have got something here that will suit his case exactly.

Mr. POMEROY. The man who talks about the division of races among American citizens is in the gall of bitterness and under the bonds of iniquity.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The man who does not open his eyes to see the difference between a white man and a negro or an Indian is blind. In their physical natures, in their moral natures, their intellectual natures, there is a distinction stamped by the Almighty himself, and the Congress of the United States cannot repeal the law He has made. I do not hesitate to say it. Now, Mr. President, I am not entering into a discussion of that question, whether the opinion be right or wrong. What I say is this: a majority of all the male citizens of the States of New York, Ohio, Kansas—my honorable friend will not forget that—New Jersey, Michigan, and all the States that have had any votes on this question, believe, whether right or wrong in their belief, that there is a distinction between these two races which should forbid their being placed upon a footing of political equality; and this constitution of Arkansas puts it to every man when he approaches the polls, that he must swear upon his oath that he accepts this political equality and will forever act upon it, and never undertake to recognize the distinction between the two races at all. My honorable friend from Illinois did not answer that point.

Now, I come to the other point; and here I am coming to my honorable friend from Kansas. It is a good thing to have a good memory sometimes, and sometimes it is very inconvenient. My honorable friend from Kansas, when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] moved this fundamental condition on the bill for the recognition of the State of Louisiana, certainly has not forgotten what he said on that occasion. What did he say? He was a State-rights man then. He believed in the right of a State to fix the qualifications of its own voters, and that you had no right or constitutional power to impose upon these States these fundamental conditions. He said on precisely such an amendment as this, for it originated with the Senator from Massachusetts:

"Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment. I usually vote for everything that the Senator from Massachusetts brings forward on the anti-slavery question, but I am opposed to this amendment in the first place because I do not suppose we have a right to say what shall be the qualifications of voters in any State of the Union. The people of my own State are supposed to be loyal."

Of course they are.

"They are as radical as the citizens of Massachusetts, but they are not loyal enough to allow Congress to dictate to them what kind of qualifications for voting they shall have."

This is the speech of my honorable friend from Kansas fresh from the fields of young Kansas, glorious in her own strength. ["Bleeding Kansas."] Yes, from "bleeding Kansas."

"For one, sir, I am for leaving this question of suffrage to the citizens of the States, and I claim it is their right to admit whoever they choose to the ballot box. I am not loyal enough myself to allow my own rights as a citizen of a State to be trampled upon in that way. I would not be dictated to as a citizen of a sovereign State by Congress or any other power as to what kind of citizens of my State should be allowed to vote. If they choose to let all the citizens, including the women, vote, it is not a matter for Congress to interfere with."

That was the talk of the Senator representing the young State of Kansas, standing up for the rights of the State which the Constitution guarantees, and first of all, and essential to the republican form of government, is the right of the State to fix for itself the qualifications of its voters. But, as I promised that I would not take more than five minutes, I now conclude. Those two points are to me unanswerable.

Mr. POMEROY. I reply in a single word that that is the theory and doctrine of the loyal Republican party to-day, that in States which have not been in rebellion the right of suffrage shall be regulated by the States, and in regard to States which have forfeited all their rights by rebellion Congress may dictate to them the terms upon which they shall be received.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the Chicago platform.

Mr. POMEROY. As my friend says, that is precisely the Chicago platform.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This was Louisiana my friend was talking about.

Mr. POMEROY. I was going to say that when I am for the passage of a bill, as I am for this, I would not vote to put on it the Ten Commandments. I do not care how good a measure is, if I am for the passage of a bill as it comes from the House of Representatives I say distinctly I will vote down all amendments, and that was the ground on which I acted then. I would not vote for any amendment on that bill because I was for passing it, as I am for passing this, as it came from the House of Representatives. I say now in regard to my own State and in regard to all the loyal States that I believe they should regulate the suffrage, subject to such provisions as may be in the national Constitution either now or when the fourteenth article is adopted. But as to States that have forfeited their rights by rebellion you may impose what conditions you please.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. A single word in reply. My honorable friend has fallen into two mistakes. The first is, that the bill in relation to Louisiana did not originate in the other House at all. It came from our Committee on the Judiciary, of which the honorable Senator from Illinois was chairman; and it was when that was pending that the Senator from Massachusetts moved this fundamental condition as a distinct proposition to the original bill as an amendment. That is the first mistake. The second mistake is, that my honorable friend from Kansas did not oppose it for any such reason at all. He opposed it for the simple, naked truth, which he believed in then just as I believe in it now, and the argument he made then I repeat now; it was unanswerable then, and is now, to wit: that it belongs to each State for itself to fix the qualifications of its voters, and all attempts by Congress to break down that right by a State are unconstitutional.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] recommending the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the instructions moved by him.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE,] by striking out all after the word "taxed," and I ask the Secretary to report it to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment and the amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri is to strike out all of the bill after the word "condition," and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That there shall never be in said State any denial or abridgment of the elective franchise, or of any other right to any person by reason or on account of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and that any such denial or abridgment shall authorize the exclusion, while it continues, from representation in either House of Congress.

The Senator from New Jersey proposes to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "taxed."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, as it stands, is to fix what the penalty shall be in case of a violation of the fundamental condition, and we are called upon to vote that the penalty or the consequence of that violation shall be the exclusion of the Representatives from that State. It seems to me wiser for the Senate not to express at this time what the consequence will be of a violation of that condition. I can see that Congress, instead of excluding the representatives from that State, might prefer to regulate the suffrage, and take measures to enforce that condition by its power, by legislation, so as to continue representation here, and yet have both races and all colors represented. Therefore, I think it much wiser, if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, simply to adopt the fundamental condition, without saying what measures Congress will take to enforce the fundamental condition in case of a breach of it.

Mr. DRAKE. I will simply say, in reply to the remarks made by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, that I regard those words which he now moves to strike out as being simply a declaration of a power that will inure in Congress without those words being embodied in an act of Congress; in other words, that we shall be no further advanced probably as to our real power in the premises with these words in than with them out. Therefore, if it be the pleasure of the Senate to strike out these words, I do not feel disposed to make a contest over them, the main object of my amendment being the other clause, and believing that the power to exclude the Senators and Representatives of that State from representation here if the fundamental condition be broken would be just the same without this declaration in the act as with it.

Mr. CATTELL. Then I ask the Senator from Missouri why not accept the amendment of my colleague, and thus save the time of the Senate in voting?

Mr. DRAKE. Well, sir, if it will be any gratification to the distinguished State of New Jersey, as it appears to be, both of her Senators appealing in this matter to me, I do not know but that I will accept it.

Mr. CATTELL. I am afraid the Senator from Missouri has put the State of New Jersey under such obligations that she will never be able to repay them. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification suggested by the Senator from New Jersey is accepted, and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri as modified.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask that the fundamental condition of the original bill be first read, and then the substitute for it that I proposed.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out of the original bill the following words:

That the constitution of Arkansas shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are entitled to vote by the constitution herein recognized, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That there shall never be in said State any denial or abridgment of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason or on account of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe it is now in order to offer an amendment to the amendment. I move the amendment I offered on Saturday. I have nothing to say in regard to it. I merely ask the Clerk to read it. I prefer the condition in this form if it is to be adopted at all.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment, which was to strike out all of the amendment of Mr. DRAKE after the word "That" in the first line, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Said State, in fixing the qualifications of electors therein, shall not be authorized to discriminate against any person on account of race, color, or previous condition; and, also, on the further condition that no person on account of race or color shall be excluded from the benefits of education, or be deprived of an equal share of the moneys or other funds created or used by public authority to promote education in said State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment to the amendment, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that all that is contained in this amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] is contained in the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand not. To what provision in the fourteenth amendment does the Senator refer?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That there shall be no discrimination in civil rights on account of race or color; and the only thing we want to provide for now is to prevent that discrimination in political rights, and that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri does.

Mr. HENDERSON. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri does not refer to political rights at all.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I mean the amendment of your colleague, [Mr. DRAKE.]

Mr. HENDERSON. It says they shall not be denied any right.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The exercise of the elective franchise. That is a political right, I believe.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to have the amendment of my colleague read again.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment of Mr. DRAKE, as follows:

That there shall never be in said State any denial or abridgment of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason or on account of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

Mr. HENDERSON. "Any other right." It does not mean a political right. The language is, shall not be denied "the elective franchise or any other right." I think that includes civil rights. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey whether, upon the adoption of this amendment of my colleague, in his judgment the State is permitted to provide separate schools for whites and blacks, or whether they must not be educated in the same schools?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I cannot answer that question, for I do not think that either the constitutional amendment or the proposition of the Senator's colleague touches that question, as to what school they shall be educated in; but I think that the amendment as proposed, as well as the constitutional amendment, prevents a discrimination in civil or political rights on account of race or color.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I can state in a few words my view in offering this amendment. I desire that the negroes shall have an equal right in the school moneys, but that the State may require them to be educated in different schools from the whites. I propose that their rights shall be the same in the public funds, just as we have provided in the District of Columbia. Further, I do not desire to take away the right from the States to say who shall hold offices in the States. If they desire to say that the whites shall hold the offices, let them do so. I do not fear any provision of that sort ever being adopted in one of the States, provided this is a valid condition, because the negroes being entitled to the suffrage on equal terms with the whites, of course can protect themselves in that behalf. But I would not provide here by a condition that the States should extend the same rights to the negroes in regard to office-holding, marrying, or anything else, that they do to the whites; and I think if we adopt a condition at all, we had better adopt it in the form in which I have presented it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 5, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Doolittle, Henderson, Hendricks, and Ross—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, Johnson, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Yates—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Howard, Morgan, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, and Wilson—19.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I offer an amendment to strike out all of the bill and to insert the following.

Mr. DRAKE. I suppose that the amendment which the honorable Senator from Indiana now offers cannot precede my amendment which is pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not unless it is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mine is an amendment to the amendment. I propose to strike out more.

Mr. DRAKE. I understood the honorable Senator to move to strike out the whole bill and insert a substitute.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; after the title.

Mr. DRAKE. Well, sir, I had the rule applied to me two or three days ago that an amendment to the bill takes precedence of a motion to amend it by way of substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is with the Senator from Missouri. It is in order to perfect the bill before it can be stricken out.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, suppose the words proposed by the Senator from Missouri are adopted, can they be stricken out?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly they can.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You can move to strike out the whole bill. A substitute will then be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE.]

Mr. DRAKE. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire simply to say that I think the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is preferable to the condition imposed by the House bill; it is less objectionable certainly; and I shall therefore vote for it.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the amendment read as it now stands.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all of the bill after the word "condition" in the fifth line, and to insert:

That there shall never be in said State any denial or abridgment of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason or on account of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

Mr. STEWART. I simply wish to say that I prefer that to the condition in the original bill, and shall vote for it. I think the improvement sufficient to warrant us in amending the bill as it came from the House.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Drake, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Corbett, Doolittle, Ferry, Fowler, Hendricks, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Van Winkle, Vickers, Willey, and Williams—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Grimes, Howard, Morgan, Morton, Norton, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Sprague—14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I now offer the amendment which I proposed a few minutes since.

Mr. DRAKE. I will state, for the information of the Senator from Indiana, that there is another amendment of mine on the table, which is yet to be acted upon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe the Senator can offer but one amendment at a time.

Mr. DRAKE. It was offered some days since.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I cannot help that. There cannot be two amendments offered at the same time. Let us now try one on this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the amendment of the Senator from Missouri propose to amend the original bill before a vote is taken on striking out?

Mr. DRAKE. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is first in order. The Senator from Missouri has a right to perfect the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When he gets the floor.

Mr. DRAKE. This comes under the very same principle decided by the Chair just now, that it is in order to perfect the original bill before the question is taken on striking out.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not until I have proposed my amendment and suggested what I wish to suggest to the Senate upon it.

Mr. DRAKE. I beg pardon of the Senator for interrupting him, if that is all he desires.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask that my amendment be read, to strike out all of the bill after the title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The preamble comes last.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not care where it comes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment is a substitute for preamble and all?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. HENDRICKS, which was to strike out all of the preamble, and also all of the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert the following:

That the State of Arkansas is hereby declared restored to her former proper practical relations to the Union, and is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the amendment which I have proposed is the section of the bill restoring the State of Tennessee to her practical relations to the Union, with the exception that I have inserted the word "declared." The language of the Tennessee bill is:

"That the State of Tennessee is hereby restored to her former proper practical relations to the Union, and is again entitled to representation."

Inasmuch as Congress has adopted this phraseology in regard to one of these States, there seems to be a propriety in continuing that language, unless experience has shown that in some respect it is not right. I have not adopted the preamble that is found in the Tennessee bill, for it is not applicable to this case; nor would I be for adopting any preamble. Preambles to laws are not useful. They serve no purpose whatever. They do not even aid in construction, especially when they are merely recitals of historical events known to the country which need not be perpetuated in the form of laws.

My proposition excludes all fundamental conditions. It is very evident that the Senate is nearly equally divided upon the propriety of having any fundamental condition. My mind is as clear as possible on that subject. A fundamental condition could do no good, but might do harm. After the State comes to act as one of the States of the Union, in her legislation, in any modification of her constitution, she acts without any reference to the pleasure of Congress, and it is not competent for Congress, in my judgment, to impose any restraint upon her right of amending her own constitution. It would be nugatory after the State were admitted, if this were a case of admission; but is vicious, as my colleague so forcibly expressed it, as a precedent. Therefore I have omitted all fundamental conditions.

I have omitted the preamble, as it is simply of no service in legislation, and may become embarrassing afterward. Senators of the majority know that the preamble to the Tennessee bill they would not now adopt. They would not give as the reasons for the restoration of Tennessee to her practical relations to the Union the reasons that are found in that preamble, because they are inconsistent with the position now occupied by the majority. The preamble to the Tennessee bill recognized the lawfulness, the legality of the form of government that existed in the State of Tennessee prior to the enactment of that law. It stands, then, upon the very opposite doctrine to that upon which reconstruction is now being pressed. It is one of the strongest arguments to be found in the history of this whole question against your present position in law.

Mr. WILSON. You are mistaken in that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, I am not mistaken. I have had occasion to examine the question with a great deal of care. I am referring to that now simply as an illustration of the folly of preambles. What do you want? What is wanted now? You say that the State of Arkansas has adopted a State constitution which is agreeable to you; you say that she has ratified the constitutional amendment, which is agreeable to you. That may be a reason governing your votes; but is it necessary to recite that in a preamble? Is not that known in the history of the country? Does the validity of the constitution of Arkansas depend upon your recognition of it? If the State is a State of the Union, and in proper form has adopted this new constitution, it stands as her constitution, not because Congress has given it validity and vitality, but because the people of the State have adopted it.

Mr. President, I now propose, as the solution of all the questions that are before the Senate, as a settlement of the differences of opinion, the language contained in the Tennessee law which you adopted two years ago. Why object to it? It declares that the State of Arkansas is now restored to her proper practical relations to the Union, and that therefore she is entitled to representation; that because she stands in proper attitude in regard to the other States and to the Union, she is entitled to representation. This legislation that you are now proposing is not with a view of ratifying what she has done, but of declaring her right of representation. Then I submit to Senators that it is proper and right to adopt the very language which you adopted in regard to Tennessee. Is it proper that in regard to one State we shall have one sort of legislation, and in regard to another State a different legislation? That is not desirable. I have, as I stated to the Senate, inserted one word—is hereby “declared” restored. It is not the act of Congress that restores her to her practical relations, but the act of Congress declares her restored and therefore she is entitled to representation. She is in practical relations; therefore she must be represented in the Senate and in the House. My amendment, in my judgment, stands upon the right doctrine; and upon that, if it be the pleasure of the Senate to give the yeas and nays, I shall be glad of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] and on this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Corbett, Doolittle, Ferry, Fowler, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Willey—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Drake, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Morgan, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, and Sprague—13.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no further amendment be offered—

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Missouri, I believe, has another amendment to offer.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No; it is to the preamble.

Mr. DRAKE. The amendment I wish to offer is to the preamble, and I understand the question is not taken on the preamble until after the bill is finally passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Missouri proposes to amend the preamble, now is the time to do it.

Mr. DRAKE. I understood that the time for an amendment to the preamble was after the passage of the bill.

Mr. POMEROY. No; it should be amended now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment to be proposed to the bill, it is in order to amend the preamble.

Mr. DRAKE. Then I move to strike out of the preamble the words “in form” after the word “republican,” so that it shall read:

Whereas the people of Arkansas, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled “An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States,” passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, have framed and adopted a constitution of State government, which is republican, and the Legislature of said State has duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen: Therefore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore having put the question, a division was called for.

Mr. DRAKE. I beg leave to offer a word in explanation of this amendment, as it seems gentlemen are going to vote against it. It has never been the practice of Congress in admitting States into this Union until very recently to use that expression “republican in form” in reference to the constitution of the State to be admitted; and it is, in my opinion, an utterly vicious expression that ought not to be tolerated in an act of Congress. In the acts admitting Alabama, Illinois, Indiana, and Mississippi, and in the act enabling the people of Nevada to form a State government the expression was used that the constitution of the first four of those States was “republican,” and in the last that the constitution of Nevada should be “republican.” In the acts admitting Kansas, Minnesota, Oregon, and West Virginia, that phrase “republican in form” has crept in, in my opinion, without any justification. The Constitution says that the United States shall guaranty to each State in this Union a republican form of government, not a government republican in form, which may be republican in form without a single republican principle in it except as so form. I wish to have the preamble to this bill conform with the Constitution of the United States and with the old acts of Congress, and just let it say that this constitution is “republican,” not republican in form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. FERRY. Is it in order now, or after the vote has been taken on the amendments made in committee, to renew the amendment which I offered in committee. I propose to offer the same amendment that I offered in committee, and which was there voted down, to strike out all of the bill after the word “Union” in the fourth line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to have the bill reported as it now stands. The printed amendment has been varied.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill now reads as follows:

That the State of Arkansas is entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as one of the States of the Union upon the following fundamental condition: that there shall never be in said State any denial or abridgement of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person, by reason or on account of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut is to strike out all of the bill after the word “Union” in the fourth line.

Mr. BUCKALEW. How will it read then?

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill, if amended as proposed, will read:

That the State of Arkansas is entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as one of the States of the Union.

Mr. FERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays upon my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think my colleague [Mr. MORRIS] would certainly desire to vote upon this important question; and as it is impossible for him to remain here to so late an hour as this, and it is certain there will be no further debate, I would venture to move an adjournment. We could take the vote without any delay whatever, I suppose, to-morrow.

Mr. HENDERSON. Fix the time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move, then, that the further vote, which will be a short one unquestionably, take place at one o'clock to-morrow, and let there be unanimous consent to that proposition.

Mr. CONKLING. And without debate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Without any further debate. I did not see my colleague when he left, but I suppose he could not remain any longer, as his health would not permit him to do so. The Senate is thin, indeed, to take a vote on so important a question as this, and I move that the vote be taken to-morrow at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have paired off on this question with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who has left the Chamber.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 18, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Conkling, Corbett, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Hendricks, McCreery, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Willey, and Williams—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Cragin, Drake, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Merrill of Vermont, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—22.
ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, and Sprague—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read the third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Doolittle, Hendricks, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, and Vickers—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Davis, Dixon, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morton, Norton, and Sprague—12.

So the bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up Senate bill No. 440, providing for the amendment of the national banking law, so that it may be left as the regular order for to-morrow.

Mr. CAMERON. I think we had better not take up that bill until we have time to consider it.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope we shall proceed with the reconstruction bills.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. That leaves this bill—

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to any debate on the motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, June 1, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

CALL OF STATES FOR BILLS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States for bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

UNLAWFUL CLAIMS.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1131) regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases for the protection of officers and agents of the Government, and for the better defense of the Treasury against unlawful claims; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON AND CLEVELAND RAILROAD.

Mr. GETZ introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1132) to authorize the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the city of Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of Cleveland, in the State of Ohio, by the nearest direct line; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

MARY JACKSON.

Mr. WELKER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1133) for the relief of Mrs. Mary Jackson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812.

TRIAL OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Mr. EGGLESTON introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 282) in relation to the trial of Jefferson Davis; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolution, which was read in full, instructs the Secretary of War to procure the services of Hon. JOHN A. BINGHAM and Hon. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER to conduct the prosecution against Jefferson Davis, who is indicted for treason against the Government of the United States.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Ohio, protesting against efforts to tamper with members of the high court of impeachment. I wish to say, in explanation, that this resolution was passed on the 16th ultimo, and yet it was not received from the Governor of Ohio till yesterday.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CEMETERY IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. NUNN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1134) to construct a road to the national cemetery of West Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

PORTAGE AND LAKE SUPERIOR CANAL.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1135) extending the Portage lake and Lake Superior ship-canal to Keweenaw bay, providing for the right of way, and making a grant of land in the construction of said extension; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

FRONT PROPRIETORS ON MEMONONIE RIVER.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1136) to authorize front proprietors on the Menomonee river, in Michigan and Wisconsin, to have a survey and enter the fast lands in said river; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. PAINE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1137) to relieve certain citizens of Mississippi of disabilities; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROOKS. How many persons does that bill relieve?

The CLERK. About twenty.

Mr. BROOKS. We can stand that.

JACOB LEVIT.

Mr. PAINE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1138) to grant an additional bounty to Jacob Levit, of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EMIGRATION TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1139) to establish, under the direction of the Secretary of State, agencies in Great Britain, Germany, Sweden, and Norway, for the promotion of emigration to the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD FROM KANSAS TO NEW MEXICO.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1140) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Irving, Kansas, to Albuquerque and Santa Fé, New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID BELL.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1141) for the relief of David Bell; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FRANCISCO ARMIGO.

Mr. CLEVER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1142) for the relief of Francisco Armigo, of Albuquerque, New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

PABLA MONTAYA.

Mr. CLEVER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1143) for the relief of Pabla Montaya; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

HEIRS OF MRS. DE LEON.

Mr. CLEVER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1144) for the relief of the heirs-at-law of Mrs. R. L. De Leon, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

IMMIGRATION AGENCIES.

Mr. FLANDERS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1145) to establish unpaid immigration agencies at Liverpool, Glasgow, and Dublin, in Great Britain and Ireland; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SAFETY OF STEAMBOAT TRAVEL.

Mr. COBURN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1146) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or part by steam, and for other purposes,'" approved August 30, 1852; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MAIL ROUTE IN NEW JERSEY.

Mr. HAIGHT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1147) to establish a mail route from Bricksborough, in the county of Ocean and State of New Jersey, to Point Pleasant, in said county and State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CARE OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1148) to repeal the act approved March 2, 1867, abolishing the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings, and vesting the care and custody of the same in a superintendent appointed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

MARINE INCENDIARISM, ETC.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1149) in addition to an act passed March 26, 1804, entitled "An act in addition to an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF WASHINGTON CANAL.

Mr. INGERSOLL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1150) for the improvement of the Washington canal; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

LEWIS J. CONDIFF.

Mr. McCORMICK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1151) for the relief of Lewis J. Condiff, of St. Francis county, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order during the morning hour is the call of States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Ohio, where the call rested at the expiration of the morning hour on the 25th of May, Monday last.

Mr. BARNES. I ask unanimous consent to report back a House bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot ask unanimous consent during the morning hour of Monday for any purpose whatever.

COMPENSATION OF HOUSE COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I submit the following resolution, and upon it I call the previous question :

Resolved, That the clerks of the standing committees of the House of Representatives, receiving per diem compensation, shall be paid during the sessions of the Fortieth Congress the same amount per diem that is now paid to the clerks of the standing committees of the Senate who are receiving per diem compensation.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to have the gentleman who offered this resolution explain the effect of it?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It places the compensation of the clerks of the standing committees of the House of Representatives upon an equal footing with the clerks of corresponding committees of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does it increase or diminish their compensation?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I do not understand the remark of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman inquires if this resolution diminishes the compensation of the clerks?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I think it does not.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much is the increase?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I am not able to say exactly; but a small amount, however. It proposes to put the House clerks upon an equal footing with the Senate clerks.

Mr. RAUM. As the resolution does not appear to fix the compensation of the clerks, and we cannot vote intelligently upon it, I move to lay it upon the table.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 64, noes 22; no quorum voting.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I call for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes sixty-six, noes not counted.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; and the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 786) declaring St. George, Boothbay, Bucksport, Vinalhaven, and North Haven, in the State of Maine, and San Antonio, Texas, ports of delivery; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 279) in relation to the breakwater at Portland, Maine.

ROOM "A" UNITED STATES CAPITOL.

Mr. MORGAN. I send to the Clerk to be read a preamble and resolution which I submit, and upon them I call the previous question.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas room "A" in the Capitol has for a considerable time past been in the possession of Miss Vinnie Ream, and occupied by her as a studio by the consent of the House, and she has for more than a year been engaged in modeling her statue of Mr. Lincoln, under an order made for that purpose by Congress; and whereas said statue is now in such condition that it cannot be removed at this time without the destruction thereof, as appears by the following copy of a letter addressed by her to the Sergeant-at-Arms:

STUDIO, UNITED STATES CAPITOL.
May 29, 1868.

N. G. ORDWAY,
Sergeant-at-Arms House of Representatives:

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your note—

Mr. COBB. I rise to a point of order. The Clerk seems to be reading a communication. I object to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman who submitted the preamble and resolution now being read has a right to incorporate anything germane to the resolution. This appears to be germane to the resolution.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading, as follows:

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your note of the 28th instant, transmitting copy of House resolution directing you to take possession of a room now occupied by me as a studio. I would very cheerfully vacate the room at once, in obedience to the command of the House, were it possible to do so; but it would simply be to destroy the statue of Mr. Lincoln, and that I cannot think the gentlemen of the House desire after having watched its progress with great interest and seemed pleased with the results of my work. I have been, since my occupancy of the room, and am now, engaged upon this statue of Mr. Lincoln; the order for which they kindly intrusted to me. It would be impossible to move it without destroying the labor of the past year, and subjecting me to very great expense and delay in the completion of the work.

When the order for this work was given me a room was also given me in which to mold this statue. No conditions or limitations were attached, and I naturally supposed that I would be permitted to occupy it until the work was completed. I submit to you and to the gentlemen of the House whether this treatment is fair and just, or at all consistent with that kindness and generosity which have heretofore been uniformly extended to me by the members of both Houses of Congress.

Respectfully,
VINNIE REAM.

Resolved, That the execution of the resolution, passed by the House on the 28th instant in regard to setting apart rooms A and B, in the Capitol, as guard rooms for the use of the Capitol police, be suspended as far as it refers to room A, until hereafter otherwise ordered by the House, and that in the meantime said room be left in possession of Miss Ream.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. To what question does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MORGAN] rise?

Mr. COBB. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is on the floor at present.

Mr. MORGAN. Will it be in order for me to submit a few remarks explanatory of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. If the resolution gives rise to debate, it must go over under the rules.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I move the previous question.

Mr. COBB. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COBB] withdraw his motion for a moment that I may ask a question?

Mr. COBB. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. A call for the previous question is pending; also a motion to lay on the table; both propositions being undebatable.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion of Mr. COBB to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 61, nays 47, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Bromwell, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cornell, Covode, Dixon, Ekeley, Eggleston, Eia, Ferriss, Fields, Halsey, Harding, Higby, Hill, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kitchin, Koonz, George V. Lawrence, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pike, Polesley, Pomeroy, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron E. Stevens, Stokes, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Bart Van Horn, Welker, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Arnell, Barnes, Beck, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Churchill, Farnsworth, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gravely, Griswold, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Jencks, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Knott, Laffin, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, Mercour, Moorhead, Morgan, Newcomb, Niblack, Nunn, Phelps, Plants, Robertson, Sitgreaves, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stone, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Woodward—47.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Areher, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Barnum, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Butler, Cake, Cary, Charles Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Haight, Hawkins, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Humphrey, Kelsey, Ketcham, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Morrill, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Nicholson, O'Neill, Peters, Poland, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robinson, Ross, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Taber, Taffe, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Aukun, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—81.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

KEY OF THE BASTILLE.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I submit the following resolution:

Whereas by a former order of this House certain rooms in the basement of the Capitol are now being fitted up as a prison-house or bastille for the incarceration of free born but deluded American citizens, who yet have the unparalleled audacity to dare to claim the absolute privileges of constitutional guarantees and laws; and whereas also, it is essentially important that said legislative prison-house should be strong and well secured in order to prevent the escape of such contumacious and dangerous state prisoners; and whereas also, it is the duty of the public lawgivers to preserve the consistency and symmetry of history, and to adopt kindred means to sustain the public order and insure the public weal, in accordance with the precedents and practices of former and coincident periods in the history of popular liberty: Therefore,

Be it hereby resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to enter into negotiations with the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association for the purchase of a well-known historical key, now in the possession of said association at Mount Vernon, and formerly used in turning the bolts of the French bastille in Paris during the mild and humanitarian administration of French affairs in 1793, and that the same, if so purchased, shall be used in the said "new Capitol prison," now being fitted up as aforesaid.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I object to the reception of this resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. POMEROY.) Objection being made to the reception of the resolution, the question is, Shall the resolution be received?

The question was decided in the negative.

REMAILING NEWSPAPERS FREE.

Mr. WILSON, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the postal laws as to allow newspapers, upon which the regular rate of postage has been paid, to be remailed within the period of twenty days from the date of publication without further charge, similar to the mode adopted in England; and to report by bill or otherwise.

IMPRISONMENT OF CITIZENS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. BECK. I submit the following preamble and resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is asserted by William D. Chipley and others, citizens and residents of Columbus, Georgia, that they have been arrested and imprisoned without cause by order of General George G. Meade, commanding the third military district, and that the cause of their arrest and imprisonment has been withheld and refused, as shown by the following letter:

OFFICE OF BLOUNT & CHIPLEY,
COTTON FACTORS,
GROCERS, AND COMMISSION MERCHANTS,
COLUMBUS, GEORGIA, May 18, 1868.

DEAR SIR: I may be presuming in troubling you with the facts which I will herein relate, and if so can only offer our utter want of representation as my apology. And yet it may be that you will think that such outrages concerns every citizen of the country, whether he lives North or South. As long as such acts can be committed with impunity no man can feel safe. It will not do for one to expect his character to protect him from such attacks, for virtue is the favorite target of such marksmen. On the 9th day of March ten white citizens of this place, and three colored, were arrested by order of one Captain Mills, commanding this post, and placed in confinement at the court-house, where they were detained under guard until dusk on the evening of the 13th ultimo. At the expiration of that time we were released under bond, the amount and conditions of which are fully stated in the printed slips which I inclose. From these clippings you will find that I was numbered among the prisoners. Were I writing to a stranger it might be prudent and proper to offer some testimonial of character, but you have known me from my earliest youth, and on that fact I rest my case. My companions in this arrest, as far as my personal knowledge goes, are as far above the suspicion of any implication in crime as any citizen in this or any other community. What I want is to arrive at the cause of my arrest. During the arrest, nor upon our release under bond, could we obtain any information concerning the evidence which led to our incarceration. It was entirely ex parte, and no clue to its character or the names of our accusers has been given us. If you consider it proper I would like for you to offer a resolution calling for the facts in the case.

Regretting the circumstances which force me to trouble you in this matter, I remain, sir, yours very truly,
W. D. CHIPLEY.

In stating that we were arrested by order of Captain Mills, commanding post, I should have added his statement, that he was acting under orders from his superiors.

W. D. C.
Hon. JAMES B. BECK, Washington.
Therefore,
Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed to report forthwith to the House upon what charge or charges, and by what authority, General George G. Meade, commander of the third military district, embracing the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, arrested and imprisoned William R. Bedell, Christopher C. Bedell, James W.

Barber, Alva C. Roper, William L. Cash, William R. Chipley, Robert A. Ennis, Elisha J. Kirksey, Thomas W. Grimes, Wash H. Stephens, John Wells, (colored,) John Stephen (colored,) and James McHenry, (colored,) citizens and residents of Columbus, Georgia, on or about the 9th day of April, 1868, and why he required said persons to execute to him the following bond.

Georgia, Muscogee County:

Know all men by these presents, that we, whose names are hereunder signed, are held and bound unto General George G. Meade, or his successor in office, in the penal sum of $50,000, for the payment whereof well and truly to be made to the said General George G. Meade, or his successor in office, we hereby bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators, firmly by these presents.

Witness our hands and seals this 10th day of April, 1868.

The condition of the above obligation is such that, whereas, General George G. Meade has arrested and confined William R. Bedell, Christopher C. Bedell, James W. Barber, Alva C. Roper, William L. Cash, William D. Chipley, Robert A. Ennis, Elisha J. Kirksey, Thomas W. Grimes, Wade H. Stephens, John Wells, (colored,) John Stapler, (colored,) and James McHenry, (colored,) who have been released by order of General George G. Meade, on condition that they would each give security in the sum of $2,500 that they would each report and appear before the military authorities of the United States, at such time and place as the commanding officer of the third military district may direct. Now, then, if any of the said parties, so released, shall fail to appear and report to the military authorities of the United States, at such time and place as the commanding officer of the third military district may direct, and the parties to this bond shall pay the sum of $2,500 for each and every one of said persons so released who may fail to appear and report as aforesaid, then this bond to be null and void; else, to remain in full force and virtue.

Witnessed by

R. J. MOSES,
Notary Public.

COLUMBUS, GEORGIA, April 10, 1868.

DEAR SIR: I would have returned the bond sooner, but the citizens of Columbus, confident of the innocence of the parties in confinement of any offense against either the civil or military authorities, insist on going on the bond, as an assurance to the parties arrested that they have the entire confidence of their fellow citizens, and are above any well-founded suspicion of criminal conduct. It is with difficulty that I am enabled to close the signatures, even at this point.

With thanks for your courtesy in my intercourse with you in this unpleasant business, I remain your obedient servant, R. J. MOSES.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM MILLS.

During the reading of the preamble and resolution,

Mr. DRIGGS said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, in the chair.) The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. DRIGGS. I understand that debate is not in order on this resolution, and that being so, I wish to ask whether it is in order for the gentleman to make an argument in favor of the resolution in the preamble with no opportunity on our part to reply to it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in order to recite papers as part of the resolution.

The reading of the preamble and resolution was then concluded.

Mr. BECK. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Resolutions calling for executive information under the rules must lie over for one day unless there be unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY and Mr. UPSON objected.

So the preamble and resolution were laid over.

MURDER OF EX-FEDERAL SOLDIERS.

Mr. ARNELL submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Treatment of Union Prisoners be instructed to investigate into all the facts and circumstances connected with the recent murder of two ex-Federal soldiers, Henry Fitzpatrick and Mr. Lincoln, in the county of Maury, State of Tennessee; and report to this House by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ARNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT CLERKS.

Mr. MULLINS. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to furnish to this House information as to how many removals of clerks and other employees of said Department have been made since the 1st day of January, 1868, and for what cause; also, how many persons have been appointed to office or employed in the Treasury Department since said 1st day of January, 1868; and by whom the removals and appointments were made, and the names of those removed and of those appointed or employed; also, the reasons for the same and by whom said reasons have been furnished, if any.

The SPEAKER. That resolution, calling for executive information, if objection be made, must lie over for one day.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

The resolution was accordingly laid over.

CLOCKS IN THE HALLS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. NIBLACK offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the practicability and expediency of connecting the clocks of the Hall of the House and the Chamber of the Senate by telegraph with the regulating clock in the astronomical Observatory, and report by bill or otherwise.

CONGRESSMEN AS ATTORNEYS.

Mr. KERR offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law any member of the Senate or House of Representatives from appearing as attorney before any committee of either House in the District of Columbia holding sessions, for compensation or without it, in any cause, matter, or business pending before either House of Congress or before any committee of Congress in either House or in any court in the District aforesaid or in the Supreme Court of the United States involving interests of a public or political nature, which may become the subject of legislation by Congress or consideration or action in either House thereof.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think that is the law now.

INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. JULIAN offered the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the Indian tribes of the United States have no power by treaty to dispose of their lands except the power of cession to the United States; and whereas a treaty is now being negotiated between the Great and Little Osage Indians and a special Indian commission, acting on the part of the United States, by which eight million acres of land, belonging to those Indians, are to be transferred to the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Galveston Railroad Company in contravention of the laws and policy of the United States, affecting the public domain: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House by what authority and for what reason the said lands are to be disposed of as above recited, and not ceded to the United States and made subject to their disposition.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will modify the second preamble by inserting the words "it is alleged that." I dislike to vote for it as it is.

Mr. JULIAN. I will make that modification.

The preamble and resolution were agreed to.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAXING GOVERNMENT BONDS.

Mr. HOLMAN offered the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House the bonds and other securities issued by the United States which are exempt by law from State and municipal taxation ought to be taxed for national purposes in amounts substantially equal to the average tax imposed on property in the several States for local purposes in such manner as may substantially equalize taxation, the tax to be deducted from the coupons as they become due; and that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill for the purpose above expressed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the previous question will be voted down, and the resolution referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask my friend to modify his proposition. If the gentleman will introduce a bill accomplishing the object which he specifies in this resolution, and have it either referred to the Committee of Ways and Means or brought before the House in some other way, I will coöperate with him in its passage. The difficulty is in doing the thing by a bill which the resolution specifies ought to be done and directs to be done.

Mr. BURR. I object to debate.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does not an objection carry it over?

The SPEAKER. It does not, unless the previous question is not seconded.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it be in order to move to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the previous question is voted down.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It would be better if the gentleman will say "inquire into the expediency." This is absolute. We never pass such resolutions as this.

Mr. HOLMAN. That amounts to nothing. I decline to modify it.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 29, noes 60; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. ALLISON and GARFIELD.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 37, noes 68.

So the previous question was not seconded.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

SEIZURE OF PRIVATE PAPERS.

The SPEAKER. On Monday last, at the close of the session, a motion to suspend the rules, made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] was pending. That motion now comes up as the regular order in preference to any other business until disposed of. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That it was not the purpose or intention of this House to authorize the committee of managers, and it hereby denies the power or authority of said managers, under the Constitution, to require persons called before them as witnesses to produce or give evidence with reference to their personal and private papers; and that, in the opinion of this House, private and personal telegrams are within the provision of article four of the amendments to the Constitution, which provides that—

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

And that any violation of the rights intended to be secured by said article is an outrage upon personal liberty which no free people can tolerate or submit to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 27, nays 95, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Burr, Cary, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Gulladay, Haight, Holman, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, Niblack, Phelps, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, and Woodward—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Bromwell, Buckland, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Griswold, Harding, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Jencks, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koonz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughridge, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Poland, Polsley, Pomerooy, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, John T. Wilson, and Windom—95.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Barnum, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Brooks, Broomall, Butler, Calk, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Dodge, Eliot, Finney, Fox, Gravelly, Grover, Halsey, Hawkins, Asahel H. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Kelsey, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Mercer, Morgan, Morrill, Morrissey, Mungen, Nicholson, Peters, Pile, Plants, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spaulding, Stewart, Taber, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Aiken, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—67.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. KELLEY, on account of sickness.

DAILY RECESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before moving to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill, I ask unanimous consent that after to-day, during the pendency of the bill in the Committee of the Whole, the committee shall take a recess each day from half past four to half past seven o'clock.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had excused Mr. GRIMES from service as a member of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869, and has appointed Mr. NYE in his place.

The message also announced that the Senate had adopted a resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Hon. Edwin M. Stanton for the ability, purity, and fidelity with which he has discharged the duties of Secretary of the Department of War; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1000) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House the first reading of the bill has been dispensed with.

Mr. SCHENCK then addressed the committee for two hours and a half. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

At the conclusion of his remarks, explanatory of the bill,

Mr. SCHENCK said: I thank the committee for the attention they have given to me during this very long explanation of what we now lay before them. I hope that with as little delay as possible we shall proceed to the consideration of the bill now before the committee. As some half dozen or more gentlemen desire to be heard at length upon this bill, and upon the various matters connected with the internal taxes, and which are to be considered in connection with this bill, I propose to allow an opportunity for general debate for the rest of to-day, if we continue our session; to-morrow if we have any time, and to-morrow evening. And I trust that by Wednesday morning at least, when we get into Committee of the Whole, we shall be enabled to take up the bill section by section and consider it with a view to amendments, and its final passage in such shape as may be determined upon by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] has given notice that to-morrow morning he proposes to take up the contested-election case of Delano vs. Morgan.

Mr. SCHENCK. That case, I understand, will come up as a question of privilege immediately after the reading of the Journal. I do not know whether it is likely to take all day or not; I hope not. We cannot, of course, contend with a question of privilege. But if that case should occupy the morning session we will have the evening session left, during which gentlemen will be enabled to make their speeches of half an hour or an hour each, as the case may be, before the bill is considered by sections for amendment.

I give notice now that by Wednesday morning I shall endeavor to begin action upon the bill in Committee of the Whole, with a view to amendment and final passage.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would be unwilling to trouble the committee upon this most important bill without more special preparation than I have been able to make, were it possible for me to remain in the city and participate in its discussion at a later day. But the condition of my health requires that I should seek repose in the quiet of my home. I must therefore avail myself of the present opportunity to offer some general suggestions, the pertinence and importance of which will, I hope, justify the seeming temerity of following the elaborate and well-digested remarks of the able chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in an extempore discussion of the general character of the bill.

First, permit me to thank the Committee of Ways and Means for the method and industry exhibited in the preparation of this bill. They have done a great work for the country in reducing to order and system the internal revenue laws. And I hope that before Congress rises their bill will, with such amendments as the Committee of the Whole and the House may determine to make, be adopted. It will be a great relief to the industry and enterprise of the country, and I may say a great stimulant to the morals of the people. Our law is now in such a condition that it is a fountain of demoralization. The revenue service is becoming discreditable, and honorable men dislike to admit that they belong to it. Many of the taxes it imposes are worse than injudicious; and that on distilled spirits has been demonstrated to be not only excessive but unnatural. It is not only not adapted to the condition of our country, which is too broad for the surveillance of a metropolitan police, but was adopted and is in entire disregard of the infirmities of average human nature. The wisest prayer uttered by men is that they may not be led into temptation! But our Government has overwhelmed its agents by subjecting them to the irresistible temptations the whisky ring are able to present under existing laws.

Few well-informed men will assert that less than one hundred million gallons of whisky have been distilled in this country during the last year. The legal tax on this amount would be $200,000,000. Yet our receipts have been only about thirteen million dollars, as we have just been told by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SCHENCK,] to whom I tender my thanks for his able exposition of the provisions of the bill and the condition of the internal revenue service. Last year more than twenty-nine million dollars were collected from whisky—this year, less than one half of that sum, and by the collection of this insignificant amount we have enabled swindlers to extract from the honest consumers of the country not less than $100,000,000.

And yet those to whom the execution of your laws for the collection of this tax is confided are sealed and bound by oaths at all points, and there is not one of your revenue officers who has connived at any part of this immense and wide-spread robbing of the Government, who has not clothed his soul with perjury as with a garment. There is not a man connected with the business who is not steeped in that terrible crime, because our law makes it inevitable, that he must commit it if he is not prepared to abandon the capital he has invested and the business he once pursued with honor. You cannot impose restraints, and couple them with temptations which average men cannot resist, and enforce your restraints by law, one whit more than you can by your statutes reverse the laws of gravitation. And experience proves that in this matter of a tax of two dollars per gallon on whisky we have undertaken an experiment not more plausible than that of regulating gravitation or the course of the stars by statute.

Sir, our legislation has diverted the production of distilled spirits from its natural locality—the grain-fields of the West and the Southwest—and concentrated it in the cities of the seaboard. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means tells us that the frauds are chiefly perpetrated in Philadelphia and Chicago. I hope, sir, that they are; for I am told by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that one house in Philadelphia has, within the knowledge of the Department, sold more whisky than the aggregate amount for which the Government has received tax in the whole State of Pennsylvania; but, differing from the chairman of the committee, he said that in this bad eminence Philadelphia is overshadowed by New York. Sir, it is affirmed by common rumor that one of the New York agents of the Revenue Bureau, whose name has recently become distinguished in another connection, has saved from his little salary more than two million of well-invested dollars in the brief period of about two years.

Our legislation has not only transferred the seat of the manufacture of whisky and high wines, but it has changed the substances from which we produce them. The whisky of America is no longer distilled from the grain of our fields, but we import, we buy with gold from foreign lands, the material with which to make an inferior article; and the money which should go West is carried in foreign bottoms, paying freight to foreign ship-owners, to buy foreign material from which to make of inferior quality that which naturally, under a reasonable system of laws, would be made of far superior quality amid the green fields of Illinois, Wisconsin, Kansas, and the other grain-growing States.

More than this, sir; our legislation on this subject has changed the personnel of the whole trade. Go into whichever of the cities you please, and you will no longer find the names of the old-established distillers and rectifiers, or if you find their names you will also find that the personnel of the establishment has changed; and it has come to pass that a business requiring large capital and broad premises is in the hands of strangers and men who are unknown to their neighbors, many of whom, as I was assured within a fortnight by a distinguished officer of the revenue department, would be engaged in burglary or highway robbery, or expiating such crimes in penitentiaries, but that they find it safer and vastly more profitable to deal in illicit whisky and swindle the Government and honest traders. Let gentlemen consult their constituents and ask who have taken the places of honorable men who years ago added to the wealth of the community by their industry and integrity in the distilling and rectifying business. Few gentlemen will, I apprehend, be willing to exhibit the names and aliases of the men now engaged in either trade in their respective districts and endorse the list as a roll of honor. Victims of black mailing and illicit but protected competition, honorable men have abandoned or are preparing to abandon the business.

By defying the limitations of human nature we have reversed the course of the carrying trade in this matter, and instead of whisky coming over the railroads from the West—whisky made from grain and within proper limits nutritious—your roads are freighted westward with whisky distilled from molasses, and bound to kill at forty rods. Were whisky used only as a beverage, I would not deplore this fact; but its chief consumption is in the arts of general production. And what effect is it having upon the general industry of the country? It is closing manufactures of chemical establishments for the production of perfumery, and for the manufacture of varnish, and a large number of other articles. It is diminishing the general production of the country, and lessening the wages of large classes of skilled laboring people. Sir, there is within my district one chemical works which has been largely engaged in the production among others of alcoholic drugs, such as chloroform, and using alcohol as a solvent for ingredients in other drugs, such as quinine. From a small beginning the gentlemen conducting this establishment had increased their consumption of alcohol to about one hundred and forty thousand gallons per annum. But, sir, being conscientious men, who are unwilling to violate the laws, though they might do so with impunity, and who abide by their pledge to the Philadelphia Drug Exchange to consume no alcohol that has not paid its tax, their consumption has been reduced to fifteen thousand gallons per annum, and their skilled workmen are being scattered or earning the poor wages of unskilled laborers in employments to which they are unused. But, sir, this is not all the harm done the community in this behalf, for men who will make contracts with fraudulent distillers are stocking the market with inferior drugs, or the finer articles my constituents formerly produced are being imported in foreign bottoms and paid for in gold, freight being paid to foreign ship-owners in each direction on the importation of the commodity, and the export voyage of the gold we so much need.

The people of the Northwest, it seems to me, are specially interested in this question. They will find that they cannot afford to expel from their inland section of the country any branch of manufactures. They need the opportunity to export their grain concentrated in the form of whisky, high wines, or other manufactures. I am no Cassandra and they will not believe me, but I tell them they are entering upon a competition that will exclude them from the markets of the world, if they depend upon the export of their grain in bulk as food or mere raw material. Do you mark, gentlemen of Missouri, Illinois, and Wisconsin, that California is loud in the expression of her gratitude for the fact that one hundred and thirty vessels have been added to the fleet for carrying her grain to New York and transatlantic ports? They can send grain in bulk twenty-three thousand miles to the seaboard of New England or Old England at less cost for transportation than you can send yours to the seaboard by rail. Oregon is groaning under her crop of wheat, and her people are fearing that means of its transportation to market may not be at hand. But this distant competition is not what you have most cause to dread. The South, no longer your customer for food for man and beast, looms up your competitor. Her advantages over you are manifold as they are manifest. She lies between you and the ocean. Her grain fields are upon the banks of navigable rivers which flow to the Gulf or the ocean, and at or near the mouth of each is a seaport. From Norfolk around to Galveston, Texas, the grain of the farmers of the several States may be floated to the sea-board upon rafts and there find shipping. England and western Europe are not the countries to which we chiefly export grain and flour. Our chief markets for these are Central and South America, and the islands to which the southern States are neighbors; and I tell you that if the people of the far Northwest do not take heed, and by diversifying their industry convert their raw materials into more compact productions, the day is not three years distant when their crops will waste in the fields for the want of a market to which they will pay the cost of transportation.

These may seem to be idle statements. But you, gentlemen from the upper Mississippi and the Missouri, know that arrangements are making for carrying your grain in barges to New Orleans for shipment thence. The rivers of the South are never ice bound as yours are through a long winter. Sir, the ablest pamphlet upon the resources of this county I have read in many years is that from the pen of Hon. John B. Robertson, of Louisiana, who tells the people of that State that on four million acres of her soil which are yet unbroken by the plow experiment has demonstrated the fact that sixty bushels of wheat to the acre may be raised—sixty bushels of southern wheat that will bear transportation through the tropics, as spring-sown northern wheat will not. Gentlemen laugh and shake their heads: but when I tell them that six hundred bushels of sweet potatoes to the acre is not in that region more than a fair average crop, they may imagine that the land is somewhat more fertile than that they have been accustomed to manage. Seven hundred bushels of that esculent are frequently produced from the acre. But if each acre will yield but twenty bushels near a seaport the competition will be disastrous to the grain-grower of the remote interior. But, sir, I have wandered into a digression, but shall esteem myself fortunate in having rendered the country a service if some few gentlemen note the facts I have suggested and ponder them. To return to the subject—I say to gentlemen that they need the distillery and the rectifying establishment, that whisky, high wines, lard, and oil, rather than grain in bulk, shall seek a market from their region. It will be better for all if we of the East consume your productions than it can be if your constituents are to continue to consume whisky concocted in enlarged tea and coffee-pots in cellars and garrets from imported molasses.

Entertaining the views I have expressed, I rejoiced to hear the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means suggest a reason why the tax of two dollars had been but nominally retained, and express the hope that the House would not sustain it. But, Mr. Chairman, he proposes in the name of the committee that the tax shall be fixed at seventy-five cents. It is an immense reduction, but it does not go quite low enough to check the fraud or to restore this immense trade to its natural channels. While sick at my home last week, I took the liberty of inviting to my bedside some of the best distillers and chemists of Philadelphia; and separately and apart as they came interrogated them as to the cost of molasses whisky and the point at which the tax might safely be placed; and there was unanimity among them in saying that at seventy-five cents molasses whisky in the hands of men with some capital, could incur the risks of the law, and make a fair profit. The reduction would doubtless diminish the production of whisky from molasses and thus reduce the price of molasses to such a point as to enable skillful men to operate with the certainty of large gains. They also agreed that at sixty cents the ground would be debatable, but if Congress wanted to shut molasses whisky out from competition and to contend only with such fraud as might be effected at regular distilleries, and rectifying establishments the tax should be put at the maximum of fifty cents; and that every cent below that until it reached twenty-five would be a guard of the revenue, an additional guard thrown round the revenue and a diminution of the temptation the Government is now offering for perjury, conspiracy, and fraud. I hope, therefore, the tax will be reduced to at most fifty cents; and if I am able to be in my seat and find my vote will be effective in bringing it to forty cents, I will cast it with the belief that while it will save the revenues of the Government, still better, it will save the morals of the people by diminishing the temptations to which they are subjected.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that when I feared that two dollars might be adhered to as the tax by the committee, and that the industries of the country would be taxed $200,000,000 in order that the infamous "whisky ring" might continue to riot in fat living and amass colossal fortunes, and that the Government, except in special taxes, as provided for in the bill, would receive no more revenue from this source than it has been getting, I was of the opinion that the taxes proposed in the bill were inordinate. The estimates, as we get them from the present Secretary of the Treasury, have always been vastly in excess of expenditures, and vastly below the actual receipts of revenue. The Secretary's estimates have not been candid. Under the pretense of a desire to extinguish the principal of the debt it has seemed to be his policy to reduce the rewards of labor and prevent the development of the natural wealth of the country. Misled by his false estimates, at fault hundreds of millions of dollars each year, we have burdened the industry and restrained the progress of the country in wealth and power. I am unwilling to be longer thus deluded by that system. For my own part I am determined to vote for the lowest possible amount of taxation that will provide with certainty for the payment of the current expenses of the Government and the interest on the public debt.

I find in the report of the Special Commissioner of Revenue, Mr. Wells, made in January, 1868, a passage which I will read as illustrative of the truth of my assertion and the correctness of my theory:

"That the United States is the only one of the leading nations of the world which is at present materially diminishing its debt and reducing its taxes; and the only one, moreover, which offers any substantial evidence of its ability to pay its debt within any definite period, or even anticipates the probability of any such occurrence. In proof of which we submit the following statements and statistics:

"The figures already presented demonstrate that the United States, from the 31st of August, 1865, to the 31st October, 1867, substantially reduced its liabilities by the sum of over two hundred and sixty-six million dollars, or at an average rate of over ten millions per month for the whole included period; and that during the year ending June 30, 1867, taxation was reduced by law to an estimated amount of from eighty to one hundred million dollars per annum."

Sir, the Commissioner also informs us that our revenues do not diminish proportionately with the reduction of taxation.

After presenting a tabular statement of the revenues of the Government for the years 1866 and 1867, he says:

"A comparison of the figures above presented indicates a falling off in the receipts of internal revenue for the fiscal year 1867, as compared with those of 1866, $14,986,509. Such a falling off, however, is apparent and not real, as will be evident when the great reduction of internal revenue taxes, made by Congress during the last fiscal year, is taken into the account. To what extent this reduction has actually amounted cannot be precisely stated, but the taxes abated or repealed at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress were estimated as sufficient to occasion an annual loss of revenue, taking the returns of the preceding fiscal year as a precedent, of about sixty million dollars; while the further abatement at the second session of the same Congress was likewise estimated, including the reduction of the income tax, at from thirty to forty million dollars. It would, therefore, have been nothing but reasonable to infer that the revenues for the last fiscal year (1866-67) would have fallen short of the aggregate of the preceding year (1865-66) by an amount equal to the reduction of the taxes, the effect of which was fully experienced during the period referred to; which reduction may be prudently estimated at from sixty to seventy million dollars. In addition to this, it should be remembered that the last fiscal year in the United States was a year of great commercial and mercantile depression—a year in which the crops in all sections of the country were much below an average, and in which manufacturing operations were extensively interfered with by disagreements between employers and their operatives; and yet, notwithstanding all this, the internal revenue did not fall off to an extent commensurate with the amount of taxes abated or repealed; but, on the contrary, exhibited a comparative net gain of from fifteen to twenty-five million dollars."

Sir, this is not miraculous or even wonderful, for our country is expanding in resources and taxable population beyond the degree in which any country or people ever before expanded. Six hundred miles, said the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] into the Indian territory your Pacific railroad now runs. Yes, sir; in the midst of what but last year were plains and hills, to which civilization was a stranger, is now the flourishing city of Cheyenne, with its tax-paying population thriving and prospering, and along the whole six hundred miles of that road beyond the infant city of Omaha are people who, two years ago, were citizens of other lands or among the landless laborers of this country, who this year, in their new and independent homes, will contribute to the revenues of the country through the various departments of the internal tax law and by the generous consumption of dutiable goods.

"Three-fifths of all other persons," is the language with which the Constitution refers to four million of our people—those four millions who hitherto lived without the use of money, and were habitually clad in such garments as you give the pauper and prisoner, where these unfortunates receive least sympathy—to-day walk erect in man and womanhood. They handle money which their labor earns. They occupy homes. Many thousands of them own lands, and standing up under their own vine and fig tree acknowledge no man as master, and asking no man to supply their wants, contribute to the revenues of the Government. Four million additional consumers of taxable and dutiable goods. They are using the matches which pay to the Government a penny a box; and no longer going barefoot they contribute to the income of the Government when they buy the blacking with which to polish their boots. And, sir, there are another four million dwelling among them, the poor whites of the South, who were as innocent as they of matches and blacking, and imported silks or ribbons, through which they now, or soon will, contribute to the support of the Government which has enfranchised them also.

Three hundred thousand emigrants a year are coming in steady flowing streams to swell the taxable resources of the country! Eight million of people elevated from a condition little above that of the brute into tax-paying and dutiable goods-consuming people! And can we in view of these facts estimate the future from data furnished by the past? No, sir, we cannot from any one year calculate the resources of the country in the next unless we impose upon our industry such burdens as will prevent its profitable employment, check immigration, and restrain the development of our wondrously varied resources.

Three years ago the vast coal-bed of the West, underlying an area of one hundred and twenty-six thousand square miles; embracing a part of Kentucky, five thousand miles; a part of Indiana, fifteen thousand; the greater part of Illinois, thirty-five thousand; and stretching under the Mississippi river and underlying nearly the whole State of Missouri and a large part of Kansas, together with that other wonderful coal formation additional to that to which I have referred, and separated from it by narrow rocky strata, which underlies nearly the whole State of Iowa, were scarcely recognized except at Covington, Kentucky, as among the material resources of the country. But the ore of Iron mountain, in Missouri, as I have hitherto suggested to the House, is now carried on trains to the interior of Indiana, where, by the use of native coal, purer than has been known on the other side of the Atlantic, purer than I had ever seen before, it is being converted into every form of utility to which iron may be applied, and supplying the whole West with better and cheaper iron and steel than it has hitherto been able to purchase; and the train that brings the rich ore to Indiana carries back to Missouri coal superior even to that of the Big Muddy, thus demonstrating the possibility of building up at either point an iron and steel industry before which those of England, France, Belgium, and even Prussia, justly famous as is her Krup, will sink into comparative insignificance.

The true policy of this country, in view of its vast resources, and of the rapid and steady aggregation and exaltation of its people, is for the present to reduce taxation to the minimum, to relieve its industry and its resources from every burden possible, to see to it that all just demands on the Government are amply provided for, and to leave the principal of the debt to be liquidated by express provision when the people of the South shall have recovered from the ravages of war, and when, enlightened by experience, the Northwest shall have adjusted itself to the competition it is to endure from the grain-growing capacity of the South, and the determination of her people to revenge themselves so far as they can upon their conquerors by growing grain and monopolizing the markets open to American grain. I hope, therefore, that though I may be absent during the consideration of this bill, others will see to it that every tax that can with safety be reduced which touches the industry of the country or annoys the people by its impertinent exaction will be reduced.

And in this connection I turn to schedule A, which imposes a tax upon a $300 carriage, upon a gold watch, upon the piano you have provided for your daughter, and which requires citizens to account for the spoons and forks in use in their houses, whether given to them as a wedding present or preserved as a little memorial of the fact that they had distant ancestors.

A MEMBER. It is not taxed unless kept for use.

MR. KELLEY. When it comes into use it becomes taxable. After the baby is born the pap-spoon is taxable, until then it may, as a present, escape the tax collector's inquisition. The whole amount of taxes collected under schedule A during the last year, when it yielded more than ever before, was $2,116,000. Now, the chairman of the committee has shown you that under his bill at the very lowest possible estimates of income you are to have a surplus of $46,000,000. Hitherto you were to have no surplus, and you raised an excess of $120,000,000 each year. Start out with aiming at $46,000,000 of surplus and during the year with the incoming tide of prosperity you will find that you have needlessly assessed $146,000,000 of taxes. I will not enumerate the provisions of that section. You will find them on page 171 embraced in section one hundred and sixteen.

I have been told by collectors of internal revenue that more penalties are incurred by the tax on gold watches than on any other article. More men are made to feel that your laws inflict unjust penalties on this subject than on any other. I have heard of an instance of a conscientious widow who, learning subsequent to the day on which the tax should have been paid, that there was such a tax, went and reported that she had five daughters, each of whom had a gold watch, and had a special penalty imposed on each by reason of her conscientiousness. The taxes are frequently collected in a manner to make the law as odious as possible; and if a Republican, or the wife or daughter of a Republican complains, the answer is, "My party is not responsible for it; we did not make the law. Why do you not get the Republicans to remedy the annoyance of which you complain?" And I trust the Republican majority in this Congress will remove all these fruitless but annoying taxes. Sir, all the taxes named in schedule A have in no one year paid one per cent. of the income; they have never reached more than eight tenths of one per cent. of the income. In the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to which I have referred, you will find the figures set out, and the nearest they have ever come was seven and ninety-six thousandths of one per cent. of the annual revenue. Why make our taxes so odious for the sake of swelling in so slight a degree the surplus revenue by penetrating inquisitorially into the secrets of every maiden lady and widow woman in the land, and inquiring whether she can conscientiously swear that her old carryall is not worth $300?

Again, sir, it occurred to me that the committee, believing many of these taxes to be unduly heavy, have hoped to enforce them by extreme penalties. Thus in section sixty-nine it is provided:

"That if any distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, compounder of liquors, distiller of oil, brewer, or manufacturer of tobacco or cigars shall omit, neglect, or refuse to do or cause to be done any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting of his business, or shall do anything by this act prohibited, if there be no specific penalty or punishment imposed by any other section of this act for the neglecting, omitting, or refusing to do, or for the doing or causing to be done, the thing required or prohibited, he shall pay a penalty of $1,000; and, if the person so offending be a distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, or compounder of liquors, all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him, or in which he has any interest as owner, if he be a distiller of oil all oil found in his distillery, and if he be a manufacturer of tobacco or cigars all tobacco or cigars found in his manufactory, shall be forfeited to the United States."

What, sir! if his youngest errand-boy commits an error of that kind, if some of his servants be suborned, if any of his agents do what ought not to be done, or omit to do what the law requires, are you to forfeit his whole stock? I trust the committee will at least insert the words "willfully and designedly," so that for a mere accident the entire stock and business of a man may not be confiscated, or he be subjected to litigation.

Would my strength permit I would gladly consider some other provisions of the bill. But, sir, I have presented the main views that impress me. They are, in the first place, that the bill, even as modified by the suggestions of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the reduction of the tax on whisky to seventy-five cents, offers a bribe of many million dollars to a ring organized throughout the country and knowing its men in every city, county, and State—a bribe of enormous amount to tempt bad men to perjury, conspiracy, and fraud; and I trust that the tax will be reduced to a point which will make it certain that molasses whisky cannot be made with profit.

Preclude the use of that imported ingredient, which may be distilled in any cellar or attic, and compel distillers to use grain, and you will secure to the officers of the revenue a chance to discover frauds, punish swindlers, and confiscate illegal goods. And I ask gentlemen while considering this bill to carry with them the proposition that the true standard of estimate for the receipts of the next year, and the true object at which to aim in making assessments, is simply to provide for the payment of the interest on the public debt and the current expenses. They may be assured that if they will make ample provision for these objects, they will provide the means to pay from forty to seventy millions of the principal of the public debt, as our receipts always largely exceed the Commissioner's estimates.

I have not the strength to stand while I analyze the figures I noted as they fell from the lips of the chairman of the committee. If I had I could, I think, make a perfect demonstration of my proposition from the materials he has furnished. But, thanking the members of the committee for the attention they have given me, I leave the work in their hands, with confidence that it will be faithfully done.

Mr. ALLISON obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. CULLOM, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1152) to restore the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the Department of War; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas it has been published in the newspapers that John C. Breckinridge has had assurances from the Administration which induced him to return to the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be, and is hereby, directed to inform the House if any such assurance has been given to that notorious traitor John C. Breckinridge, or any inducement that he will escape the due punishment for his treason.

Mr. BLAINE. The resolution should read "requested" and not "directed."

Mr. MILLER. I will modify it in that way.

Mr. GETZ. I object to the resolution, for I do not think there is anything in it. [Cries of "Oh, no!" and "Let it go!"] Well, I withdraw the objection.

No further objection being made, the resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. BAKER on account of the sickness of his child.

CHARGES AGAINST A MEMBER.

Mr. POLAND. I rise to a question of privilege, and submit a report from a select committee, and move that it be printed.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The select committee appointed under a resolution of the House of May 4, 1868, to investigate certain charges made by Mr. ELIhu B. WASHBURN, a member of the House from the State of Illinois, against Mr. IGNATIUS DONNELLY, a member of the House from the State of Minnesota, as set forth in the preamble of said resolution, submit the following report:

The committee gave due notice to Mr. WASHBURN and Mr. DONNELLY that they would meet on the 14th of May to enter upon the investigation directed by said resolution and requested their attendance. The committee met on said 14th of May, and were attended by Mr. WASHBURN and by Mr. DONNELLY and his counsel. The committee met on several subsequent days by adjournment from time to time.

It was conceded by both the above-named gentlemen that the charges made by Mr. WASHBURN against Mr. DONNELLY upon the floor of the House, as set forth in the preamble, were withdrawn in the House by Mr. WASHBURN in a manner satisfactory to Mr. DONNELLY, so that the only remaining duty of the committee was to investigate the charges contained in Mr. WASHBURN's letter, which is copied at length in said preamble. At a meeting of the committee, held on the 27th of May, Mr. WASHBURN submitted a communication in writing to the committee of that date, which is hereto appended. In said communication Mr. WASHBURN claimed that in his published letter there was not intended to be, and was not, contained any charge against the official character or conduct of Mr. DONNELLY as a member of the House, and that the deduction from the language of his letter that he charged Mr. DONNELLY with bribery and corruption, stated in the preamble, was unwarranted.

This avowal on the part of Mr. WASHBURN was accepted as satisfactory by Mr. DONNELLY as to all the statements in Mr. WASHBURN's letter bearing upon his character and conduct as a member of the House, so far as not to require an investigation by the committee. There remained, then, for the consideration of the committee only that portion of Mr. WASHBURN's letter charging Mr. DONNELLY with disreputable conduct many years ago, and prior to his election as a member of the House.

In the preamble to the resolution directing this investigation it is said that Mr. WASHBURN charged Mr. DONNELLY with being a fugitive from justice, which implies that he fled to avoid arrest and punishment for some crime. In the opinion of the committee this deduction of the preamble is hardly warranted by the language of the letter that "he left Philadelphia under suspicious circumstances between two days." We spend no time, however, upon this, as it is not material to our conclusion. The charge is opprobrious and imputes to Mr. DONNELLY disreputable and dishonorable conduct, so that the use of such language upon the floor of the House would be disorderly and a breach of the privileges of the House and of Mr. DONNELLY as a member. Mr. WASHBURN, in his written communication above referred to, and also verbally before the committee, stated that he did not appear before the committee as a prosecutor, and declined to assume the affirmative of attempting to substantiate his charge against Mr. DONNELLY by proof.

On behalf of Mr. WASHBURN it was claimed that the charges or statements in the letter having reference to the conduct and character of Mr. DONNELLY anterior to his election to Congress were no breach of the privileges of the House or of Mr. DONNELLY as a member, and that therefore the House had no proper jurisdiction to direct an investigation as to their truth or falsity. Mr. DONNELLY constantly and persistently urged upon the committee that they should proceed to investigate the truth or falsity of the allegations against him, and avowed his entire willingness to assume the affirmative, and to disprove them, and to pay the expense of witnesses for that purpose, and in reply to the argument of Mr. WASHBURN, that there was no such case of breach of privilege as would justify the House in ordering such investigation, both Mr. DONNELLY and his counsel urged that that question had already been settled by the House in the passage of the resolution, and that the committee were bound to proceed and hear his evidence; and that whether in strictness the letter of Mr. WASHBURN was a breach of privilege or not, he was entitled to the opportunity to vindicate his reputation and character from unjust attacks upon it.

Mr. WASHBURN further stated to the committee that though he declined to appear to sustain the affirmation of the charges against Mr. DONNELLY, and claimed that they furnished no sufficient ground of jurisdiction for such an investigation, still he did not withdraw his charges, and if the committee decided to go forward he should claim the right to produce evidence in reply to Mr. DONNELLY, and endeavor to establish the truth of all he had alleged. The committee have endeavored to give the subject such careful and considerate attention as it deserves, and while anxious to do exact and equal justice to both the gentlemen interested in it they have been equally anxious not to establish a precedent that should go beyond the proper legal and parliamentary jurisdiction and authority of this House in sustaining and protecting its own privileges and that of its members.

And especially have your committee desired not to go beyond the true line of privilege in a case where a precedent once established would necessarily furnish occasion for frequent and perplexing appeals for the exercise of the power of the House for the defense and protection of the reputations of its members from attacks having no reference to their official character. Upon such consideration and examination as your committee have been able to give this question they are unanimously of opinion that the charges of disreputable conduct (or of criminal conduct, if the language will bear that interpretation) made by Mr. WASHBURN against Mr. DONNELLY NELLY anterior to his becoming a member of the House, are not a breach of the privileges of the House or of Mr. DONNELLY as a member, and therefore furnish no proper ground for an investigation with a view to protect and defend the privileges of the House or its members by punishing the person violating them.

Libelous publications in reference to the parliamentary body itself are a breach of its privileges which may be punished, and so a libelous publication against a single member of such body in his capacity of a member, or affecting his conduct or character as such, is equally so, as casting discredit upon the body.

But a libelous publication concerning a member in his private character and capacity only has never been regarded as a breach of privilege, either of the body of which he is a member or of the member himself, and he must seek redress for such private injury in the same manner other citizens do, by vindication through the public press, or by resort to the legal tribunals. The principle is much the same as that applicable to the person of the member. If an assault be made or other personal injury be done to a member while in attendance upon the House, or while going to or returning from such attendance, it is a breach of privilege, but an assault upon the person of a member not in attendance, and in no way affecting his attendance as a member, is not.

As has been already stated, if the words of this letter had been used by Mr. WASHBURN upon the floor of the House they would have been disorderly, a breach of the privileges of the House, and of Mr. DONNELLY as a member, and he could properly have been punished therefor. This is upon the ground that the use of any language upon the floor, derogatory to the personal character of a member, is calculated to provoke disturbance and disorder in the proceedings, and bring the body itself into contempt and disgrace. These reasons do not apply to the publication of the same words in a newspaper a thousand miles distant.

In relation to the binding force of the passage of the resolution by the House, as urged by Mr. DONNELLY, we would observe, that upon the introduction and passage of the resolution the power of the House and the extent of its proper jurisdiction does not appear to have been at all debated, and was not probably to any considerable extent considered. The resolution also assumed that the letter of Mr. WASHBURN charged Mr. DONNELLY with bribery and corruption as a member, which, if true, was clearly a proper question of privilege for the action of the House.

Your committee have not, therefore, felt themselves at all embarrassed by the language of the resolution, or thereby compelled to go forward in the investigation of what remains of this case, which, in our judgment, is of a private and personal character only, involving no question of privilege. If the judgment of the House should not concur with that of the committee, no delay will have occurred by reason of our now presenting our report to the House in its present form.

Your committee, therefore, ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, and recommend that the same be laid upon the table.

The question was upon ordering the report to be printed.

Mr. DONNELLY. Will the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] yield to me for two or three minutes?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I cannot refer to this very remarkable report or to the remarkable state of facts it details, in the manner I would desire, in consequence of the absence, from this Hall at this time of the gentleman alluded to in the report, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

I will, however, call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that that gentleman has unequivocally retracted so much of his charges as he would be compelled either to retract or to prove, and that he has raised the question that the committee had no right to investigate the remainder of his charges. He has been willing neither to prove them, retract them, nor to permit me to disprove them at my own expense. On some future occasion—

Mr. POLAND. I hardly expected when I yielded to the gentleman from Minnesota that he was going very much into this subject.

Mr. DONNELLY. I am not.

Mr. POLAND. And as the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] who is concerned, is absent, I think any debate on the report should be deferred.

Mr. DONNELLY. I do not propose to animadvert upon the report, except to state what I think the House and the country would consider to be—

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to inquire whether there is any way in which this whole matter can be withdrawn for the present?

Mr. POLAND. I submitted the report for the purpose of having it ordered to be printed. I intended, after that order had been made, to move that it be laid on the table, and not to call it up for any action until the gentleman from Illinois is present.

Mr. DONNELLY. I trust I have said nothing I should not have said.

Mr. BURR. I object to any debate until my colleague [Mr. E. B. WASHBURN] is here.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the report be printed.

Mr. DONNELLY. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. POLAND. I think I had better not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] will be allowed to proceed. I do not think there is anybody who can understand that report from its reading, or tell which side the committee are on, or how they have decided.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the report be printed and laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the liberty to suggest to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] that perhaps the better way would be for him to move that the report be printed and recommitted.

Mr. POLAND. I supposed that this might be treated like a report from the Committee of Elections. When such reports are presented they are laid on the table, and can be called up at any time.

The SPEAKER. A question of privilege affecting the right of a member to his seat can be called up at any time. This is near enough to such a question to take the same course; but probably the better course would be to order the report to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. POLAND. I move, then, that the report be ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN LINE OF OCEAN STEAMERS.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads a bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. HILL also, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of several New York merchants on the same subject; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider the various votes by which bills have just been referred to committees; and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN M. PALMER.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table joint resolution (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of John M. Palmer, in order that I may move non-concurrence with the Senate's amendment, and the appointment of a committee of conference.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of F. Cordes, of Laporte county, and others, and Henry Reckart, of Miami county, Indiana, and others, relative to the tax on cigars and tobacco.

By Mr. BLAIR: The petition of D. Keeler and others, citizens of Battle Creek, Michigan, in opposition to any increase of tax upon cigars, and in favor of revenue stamps thereon.

By Mr. BOYER: The petition of 69 cigar manufacturers and growers of and dealers in seed leaf tobacco against any change of the rate of taxation on cigars.

Also, the petitions of 35 manufacturing companies and firms of Montgomery and Lehigh counties, Pennsylvania, employing when in full operation 3,612 workmen, now employing 2,583 workmen, signed also by citizens of said counties, representing that the industry of the country is paralyzed for want of sufficient protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries; that the manufacturing population cannot continue to pay prices for provisions even approaching those now realized by agriculturists while exposed to competition with the Old World under a tariff which, owing to the decline of the premium upon gold, has become inadequate, and which, in prospect of a continued decline, must shortly prove ruinous; that much of the distress now prevalent would be relieved by the passage of the tariff bill which failed in the House of Representatives, March, 1867, for want of time; and praying that Congress will resume consideration of that measure, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. DRIGGS: The petition of Francis Otto, and 10 others, citizens of East Saginaw, Michigan, cigar manufacturers, setting forth the fact that they regard the present tax of five dollars per thousand as just, equitable, and proper, and protesting against an increased tax of five dollars per thousand as unjust and calculated to ruin the trade, and throw thousands of poor men out of employment.

By Mr. ECKLEY: The petition of the cigar-makers of Steubenville, Ohio, in opposition to the proposed change in the tax on cigars.

By Mr. GETZ: A memorial from cigar manufacturers, journeymen cigar-makers, dealers in cigars, and growers of tobacco, in the city of Reading and county of Berks, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the proposed change of the rate of internal revenue tax on cigars from five to ten dollars per thousand, and praying for the substitution of the system of collecting the revenue on cigars by revenue stamps, instead of inspectors' stamps.

By Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts: The petition of 142 printers and binders of Cambridge, Massachusetts, representing that the productive interests of the country are suffering for want of efficient protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries; that the customs duties, which were sufficient under a high gold premium to create and foster manufactures, have become inadequate, and must shortly prove ruinous; that much of the distress now prevalent and daily increasing would be relieved by the legislation suggested in special Commissioner Wells's report of last year, and perfected in the tariff bill (as passed by the Senate) which failed in the House, March, 1867, for want of time, and praying Congress to resume consideration of that measure and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut: The remonstrance of Ira W. Porter and others, of Hartford county, Connecticut, against the proposed increase of tax on cigars.

By Mr. HUNTER: A memorial of 156 coopers, residing in the city of Terre Haute, Indiana, asking that the tax on whisky be reduced to twenty-five cents on the gallon, so as to stop the frauds in the manufacture and sale of that article.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of Henry C. Semple, charging Hon. Richard Busted, United States district judge of Alabama, with official incompetency and corruption, and praying that an investigation of the charges be ordered.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: The petition of 6 manufacturing firms of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, representing that for want of efficient protection against pauper labor of foreign countries industry is paralyzed, and praying for legislation to meet the exigencies of the case.

By Mr. MERCUR: The petitions of iron manufacturers of Bradford and Columbia counties, Pennsylvania, employing, when in full operation, 212 workmen, and now employing 110 workmen, setting forth that the productive interests of the country are suffering and its industry paralyzed for want of efficient protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries; that much of the distress now prevalent and daily increasing would be relieved by the legislation suggested in Special Commissioner Wells's report of last year, perfected in the tariff bill (as passed by the Senate) which failed in the House, March, 1867, and praying Congress to resume consideration of that measure, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. MILLER: The memorials of 6 iron manufacturing firms and companies of Dauphin county, Pennsylvania, employing when in full operation 1,196 workmen, setting forth that the industry of the country is paralyzed for want of efficient protection against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries; that in prospect of a continued decline in gold, customs duties—at present inadequate—must shortly prove ruinous; that much of the prevalent and increasing distress would be relieved by the legislation suggested in Special Commissioner Wells's report of last year, and reported in the tariff bill (as passed by the Senate) which failed in the House, March, 1867, for want of time; and praying Congress to resume consideration of that measure, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. PAINE: A memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, for a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Wisconsin River Valley railroad.

Also, a memorial of Blanchard & Arnold, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in opposition to the extension of Anson Atwood's patent for his improvement in cast-iron car-wheels.

Also, a memorial of Charles V. Kelley, praying compensation for services rendered as post chaplain at Camp Reno, in the city of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin.

Also, the application for relief of disabilities of James R. Berry, of Arkansas.

Also, the application for relief of disabilities of William M. Harrison, of Arkansas.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of A. B. Crandall and others, praying for the enactment of a law placing soldiers who enlisted in the Army for a term of five years prior to 1861, and served for three years during such enlistment on an equal footing in respect to bounties, with volunteers who served three years during the war.

Also, the petition of Michael Herberster, of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, for back pension from July 3, 1863.

Also, the petition of S. B. Swann and 10 others, citizens of Albany, New York, praying for reduction of tax on cigars.

Also, the petition of Charles Rodmann and 88 others, of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for reduction of tax on cigars.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts: The petition of J. D. Brown and 71 others, legal voters in the town of Hatfield, Massachusetts, against raising the tax on cigars.

Also, the petition of Andrew Dowd and 12 others, cigar manufacturers in Richmond, Virginia, against any increase of the tax on cigars.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 2, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

ELECTION IN ARKANSAS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the General of the Army, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 29th of May, reports and papers received since the 4th of May in relation to the late election in Arkansas; which was ordered to lie on the table.

EDUCATION REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Commissioner of Education, transmitting his annual report; which was ordered to be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That three thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education be printed for the use of the Senate, and two thousand copies for the use of the Commissioner.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of William G. McEwan, praying a removal of disability, so that he may be enabled to receive the benefit of the act declaring that officers of the Navy shall not be deprived of their regular promotion on account of wounds received in battle; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, praying the passage of a law giving aid to the Kansas Pacific railway; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

He also presented the memorial of members of the tobacco trade of Philadelphia, praying a uniform tax upon all kinds of manufactured tobacco and snuff, excepting cigars, and that the tax of five dollars per thousand be retained upon domestic cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of Little & Dana, woolen manufacturers, praying to be relieved from internal revenue taxes now charged against them and remaining due and unpaid; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Kentucky praying compensation to Dr. J. M. Best for property destroyed by the military forces of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Rebecca C. Meeker, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOWARD presented a memorial under oath, of Simon Srackengast and Henry Beachman, late of first regiment of Michigan cavalry, with exhibits, asking for themselves and fellow-soldiers an amendment or supplement to the act of 1866, providing for payment for transportation from Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of William M. Haley, praying a removal of the civil disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a memorial of citizens of Jones, Fayette, and Marion counties, Alabama, praying Congress to pass a law setting aside and declaring null and void the ordinance of the late convention of that State abolishing the county of Jones; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CORBETT presented the petition of Theodore J. Eckerson, captain and assistant quartermaster and brevet major United States Army, praying the passage of a bill refunding to him the amount paid for grain to make up the difference in his accounts occasioned by an error of his clerk; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented a petition of citizens of Evansville, Indiana, praying for a change in the system of collecting the tax on cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 492) to extend the time for the construction of the Southern Pacific railroad, in the State of California, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred the message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to any application by any party for exclusive privileges in connection with hunting, trading, and the fisheries in Alaska, and resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota in relation to the purchase of Alaska and the transfer of the Territories between Minnesota and Alaska to the dominion of Canada, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. The same committee, to whom was referred the resolution giving consent of Congress to the acceptance by Mr. Burlingame of appointment under the Chinese Government, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back to the Senate and ask to be discharged from the further consideration thereof. I will state, in connection with this report, that at the time this resolution was introduced it was supposed that Mr. Burlingame was actually holding an office under the Government of the United States, so that he could not receive any foreign appointment except by permission of Congress. Mr. Burlingame is now no longer in the service of the United States, and therefore there is no occasion for any action of Congress on the subject. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of William F. Schwilk, pastor, and others, asking for the adoption of measures to secure for citizens of this country in Palestine the same rights and privileges as the "International Association for Colonizing the Orient" have asked from the Sublime Porte, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of New York, praying the passage of a bill to provide for sending a large quantity of grain and flour to be distributed among the starving population of Sweden, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of W. G. Dix, protesting against the recognition of the Ottoman empire as a right and lawful Government, asked to be discharged from its further consideration.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States in relation to the alleged interference of our consul at Rome in the late difficulties in Italy, asked to be discharged from its further consideration.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, communicating correspondence with Mr. Motley, lately minister of the United States at Vienna, relative to his removal from his post, asked to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask that the question be put on discharging the committee from the consideration of these papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged, unless objection be made.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to make, but I avail myself of this opportunity to inquire of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations whether we are soon to have a report from his committee on the House bill for the protection of naturalized citizens abroad. I will state that there is a great deal of interest felt in the subject, and I have been requested by a great many parties to call attention to it. I should like to know, for the benefit of the country, of the chairman of the committee at this time the condition of that bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I have just this moment come from the committee-room, which has had under consideration business that has been accumulating, as the Senator must bear in mind, during the last few weeks. Before leaving the committee-room, the last matters under consideration were the various bills and propositions relating to the rights of American citizens abroad, first among which is the act that has recently passed the House of Representatives on that subject. On our adjournment it was understood that that was to be the subject of special consideration at the next meeting of the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. I am very glad to hear it. Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 481) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Nebraska, have directed me to report it back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute; and as this is a matter of considerable interest to the citizens of the city of Omaha, and is a very short bill, the committee thought it proper that I should ask that it be put on its passage now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill reported by him at this time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall get through the morning business before any bill is taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no personal interest in the bill in the world. The committee thought it so important to some titles at Omaha that they directed me to ask for its present consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to make some reports. I shall have no objection to the bill after the morning business is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reports will be received. The Chair understands that to be an objection to the present consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 36) for the relief of George W. Ashburn, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of E. M. Chaffee, praying an extension of his patent for his discovery of a process for grinding India-rubber, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph Nock, praying the passage of a law requiring all patentees and assignees of patents to cause to be stamped or engraved on every patented article offered for sale the date of the patent, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom were referred the following petitions and memorials, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to:

Two petitions of late officers in the volunteer service, in relation to the three months' pay proper;

A petition of Levi Ferguson and others, in relation to the three months' pay proper;

A memorial of Gottlieb Oesterle, in relation to the payment of bounty;

A memorial of John Potts, chief clerk of the War Department, praying compensation for services rendered as disbursing agent;

A petition of John O'Dwyer, late captain in Veteran Reserve corps, in relation to the three months' pay proper; and

A petition of John Dean, late a lieutenant in the Army, in relation to the three months' pay proper.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of commissioners in behalf of the State of Illinois in relation to the Illinois and Michigan canal and river improvements, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills and joint resolutions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to:

A bill (H. R. No. 425) for the relief of Mary A. Filler;

A bill (H. R. No. 553) for the relief of A. W. Ballard;

A bill (H. R. No. 1128) for the relief of Isaac Watts;

A bill (H. R. No. 1129) for the relief of the widow and children of Colonel James A. Mulligan, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 1130) for the relief of H. G. Auken, late captain fourth Iowa infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1077) for the relief of O. P. Shiras;

A bill (H. R. No. 1081) for the relief of John A. Neustaeter;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 256) for the relief of Martha E. King; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 280) for the relief of Miss Ella E. Hobart.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment.

Mr. WILSON. What is the amendment?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It will have to be printed; and I have no time to explain it. The same committee, to whom were referred the constitutions of these States, report them back for the consideration of the Senate.

The same committee, to whom was referred the resolution (S. R. No. 135) to restore Alabama, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, and Florida to representation in Congress, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its indefinite postponement, the subject being embraced by the bill just reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be indefinitely postponed if no objection be made, and the bill will go on the Calendar.

Mr. CORBETT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 215) to vacate and sell the Umatilla reservation in the State of Oregon, reported it with an amendment.

DOCUMENTS FOR NATIONAL ASYLUMS.

Mr. MORTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 278) to supply books and public documents to the national asylum for disabled volunteer soldiers, to report it back to the Senate with an amendment and recommend its passage, and I should like the present consideration of it, if there be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to cause to be sent to the national asylum for disabled volunteer soldiers, at Dayton, Ohio, and to the branches at Augusta, Maine, and Milwaukee, Wisconsin, each, one copy each of the following documents, namely, the Journals of each House of Congress at each and every session; all laws of Congress; the annual messages of the President, with accompanying documents; and all other documents or books which may be printed and bound by order of either House of Congress, including the Congressional Globe, beginning with the Thirty-Seventh Congress.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia was to insert after the word "Wisconsin," in the sixth line, the following words, "and the Soldiers' Home at Knightstown Springs, near Knightstown, Indiana."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time. The resolution was read the third time, and passed.

LAND TITLES IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. THAYER. I ask that the Senate will now take up the bill reported by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.] It will occupy but a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to taking up the bill for consideration at this time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we had better go through with the morning business.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say to the honorable Senator from Vermont that he certainly is not in favor by his objection of doing the invidious thing of acting upon a report made by one of the Senators from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] and refusing to do it on the report just now made by the other Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.] I hope the bill will be taken up. I do not think the attention of the Senator from Vermont was called to this circumstance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not in favor of doing any invidious thing at any time to anybody. But I am really in favor—although I should undoubtedly make a martyr of myself if I stuck to it—of doing the business of the Senate according to its rules, because in that way we get on a great deal faster on the whole. The Calendar is full of bills of importance that have been reported from committees that we can only get up in the morning hour, and the time runs by on account of doing things by unanimous consent, Senators hating to object, which override the regular order of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at this time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill must go over.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In connection with the remarks of the Senator from Vermont, I desire to say that the bill I reported was not a bill in which the State that I represent had any interest. It is not one in which I take any personal interest in the world except to discharge a public duty; and it settles some titles that are giving the people trouble. That is all there is in the bill; and at the request of the committee, as well as of the Senator from Nebraska, I asked for its consideration. It is not my personal request at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will vote to help take it up the moment we get through with reports and bills.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no favor to ask of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection carries the bill over, and it is not subject to argument.

CLAIMS AGAINST AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CAMERON. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture to report back House bill No. 1068, to provide for certain claims against the Department of Agriculture, and I beg the indulgence of the Senate to put this bill upon its passage. It is to pay debts due to persons who have furnished articles to the Agricultural Department; articles ordered by the former head of that bureau. The money is due a long while, and the parties ought to have their pay. Therefore I desire to have the bill put upon its passage now. I hope there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent of the Senate to take up for consideration the bill reported by him at this time. Is there any objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I must object, as I promised to do, until we get through with the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie over under the rule.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 507) supplementary to an act to incorporate a Newsboys' Home; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 508) to incorporate the America Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 509) in addition to an act passed March 26, 1804, entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States;'" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 510) in relation to insolvent banks; which was read twice by its title, ordered to be printed, and to lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 139) excluding from the Electoral College the votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LAND TITLES IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be taken up.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 481) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Nebraska was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That in all cases in which the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior has finally decided in favor of preemption settlers or the locations of Indian or half-breed scrip and issued patents to them for lands within the corporate limits of the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, the right and title of the patentee or patentees shall not be defeated or impaired because such land was within the said corporate limits; but if good in every other respect, the title shall be good and valid, notwithstanding such lands may have been within the said corporate limits, and notwithstanding the entry thereof by any preceptor or locator of Indian or half-breed scrip was forbidden by the tenth section of the act of September 4, 1841, because so within said limits.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not propose to object to this bill if it has been duly considered by the Committee on Public Lands, and they have decided it to be a necessary and a proper bill; but before it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands it was sent to the Committee on Private Land Claims—

Mr. THAYER. No, sir.

Mr. POMEROY. That was another bill.

Mr. THAYER. Another case entirely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This, on the reading of it, sounded to me very much like a case that was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and my impression then was rather unfavorable. It looked to me as though it was a sort of special legislation for the benefit of some individuals.

Mr. THAYER. This has nothing to do with that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will state in a word or two what is the question involved in this matter. The corporate limits of the city of Omaha, as established by the Legislature of the Territory, were very extensive, including a large amount of land. The town-site authorities located, under the law of Congress, three hundred and twenty acres, and located no more. Farmers settled on the lands outside of the real city, and their rights have been established under the act of 1841. The Commissioner of the General Land Office has adjudicated their rights and has issued to them patents, and they have been in possession ever since, and sold out large portions of the land now to other persons in smaller lots. The city has extended over a portion of it, so that large numbers of the people have become interested. Mr. Justice Miller last year decided that, because the corporate limits, as established by the Legislature, included these lands, the title was not good under the act of 1841. This bill simply waives the objection to the title upon that particular ground, not undertaking to settle any other question connected with the title.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was mistaken as to the bill, and the explanation is satisfactory to me.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was not ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL BANK ACT.

Mr. CAMERON. I beg now that the Senate will put on its passage House bill No. 1068, to pay deficiencies in the Agricultural Department. I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That bill was reported to-day.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object; and I move—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish the Senator would not object, and I hope he will hear me for a moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. When I get up this other bill I will look at the Senator's bill, and if I have no further objection, let it pass so far as I am concerned. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 440, making certain amendments to the banking law.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 440) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864.

Mr. SHERMAN. Since the bill was last before the Senate, the Committee on Finance have reported some amendments. I wish them to be acted on separately.

The Chief Clerk read the first amendment, which was after the word "deposits" in line twelve of the bill to insert the following words:

And the limitation prescribed in section twenty-nine of said act, which restricts the liabilities of individuals, companies, corporations, or firms, for money borrowed of national banking associations to one tenth of the capital of such associations is hereby made applicable to all deposits made by such associations with private bankers, or brokers, or banking associations not organized under the national currency act.

Mr. CONKLING. I inquire whether that amendment is printed?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is.

Mr. CONKLING. I have the printed bill, but there is no such amendment in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments have been printed separately.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a copy here.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to know before I vote upon this amendment, as it is legislation by relation, what it refers to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will explain to the Senator so that with the bill and amendment before him he will at once see the effect. The twenty-ninth section of the national bank act provides—

"That the total liabilities to any association of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm, for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such association actually paid in."

Under this provision national banks cannot loan to any individual or any firm or corporation over one tenth of their capital stock. It was intended to protect the capital stock against great losses by individual borrowers. But a practice has grown up of late of banks depositing with brokers by their side, probably brokers who own the bulk of the bank stock, a great amount of their deposits. Thus the actual debts of brokers to a bank may be several times the limit authorized by the twenty-ninth section. The result is that several banks have failed on account of the failure of brokers interested in the banks by reason of the deposits made with brokers, and as these deposits are made in the ordinary course of business, they are not considered, in the language of the act, loans to the brokers. A result of this practice has been many failures. This was the cause of the failure of a bank here in Washington some time ago. Brokers alongside borrowed the money of the bank in the form of deposits. This amendment is for the purpose of extending the limitation of the twenty-ninth section to brokers with whom money is deposited by banks. That is the whole of it.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope we shall not take up so important a bill as this without some time to reflect upon it. I thought I understood the Senator from Ohio to say that he intended to let it pass over informally, so that the bill which I reported this morning might be taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said that I should have no objection to the Senator's bill being passed now, but I certainly desire the action of the Senate on this bill. It has been lying on the table for a long time. I will state that we propose to add to this bill all the provisions that are indispensably necessary now in regard to banks and banking, so that we shall not trouble the Senate with any other bill on that subject during the session, and I believe that all the amendments which are now proposed are moved by the unanimous assent of the Committee on Finance, or nearly so. In regard to some of the amendments the committee are unanimous; in regard to others they may not be quite so. The amendments are to correct abuses that have grown up in the administration of the banking system. I desire to have the bill acted on to-day.

Mr. CAMERON. This measure involves matters of detail which may have been agreed upon by the committee in a manner agreeable to the Senator from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Finance, but not to other Senators. For my part I have not had time to examine the bill yet, and so far as I understand it I shall disapprove of several of these amendments. It is an important question, and one which I think had better be let alone. The currency and finances of the country are righting themselves. Every day they are getting better. Every day we are approaching nearer a condition of things in which we can resume specie payments. I think this should warn us not to begin to tamper and tinker with the currency and finances. I see that within the last two or three weeks our loans have increased in value at the stock board some ten or fifteen per cent. If we let them alone I think they will go on increasing, but I think the moment we begin to legislate upon them we shall depress them. If I were a stock speculator I should want to pass this bill to-day if I had no interest beyond my personal interest in that respect; but I know it will be harmful to the country. It is going to interfere with the country banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot hear a word my friend says. I should like to hear him.

Mr. CAMERON. I know that this is not a good place for hearing. I will content myself with moving that this bill be postponed for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will state again in regard to this bill, so as to avoid further discussion, that in its different sections it is simply intended to correct certain abuses in the working of the banking system. It makes no radical change, no important change. It simply corrects abuses that have sprung up in the working of the system. This is all the legislation that the Committee on Finance propose in regard to banks or banking. It does not materially affect the framework of the banking system, or any interest involved in it. This particular amendment is intended to correct a gross abuse that has sprung up by a misconception, I think, of the banking act. I could not hear what my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] said, and therefore I do not know that I am answering him. I understand he wants more delay. No delay ought to be granted.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that I only desire to have these amendments printed, so that I can read and reflect upon them.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are all printed. The original bill was reported on the 16th of March, 1868, and these amendments were reported and printed on the 29th of May, so that the Senator can see them all in print, and the amendments all refer to the sections of the banking act, so that he can understand them in a moment. I doubt very much, if the bill should be postponed now for the convenience of the Senator, whether he would have time, in the midst of the multiplicity of his other duties, to examine the amendments. At any rate, the public interest demands that the bill should now be disposed of. I do not suppose that so favorable an opportunity will present itself this session to have the matter calmly discussed.

Mr. CAMERON. I understood that this bill was not to be brought up immediately, and therefore I am not prepared to consider it. I desire that it shall go over for the present. I do not care to postpone it for any length of time. I move that it be postponed for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am informed that three months ago this bill was put over on the suggestion of my friend from Pennsylvania. I did not happen to be present at the time, but I am so informed.

Mr. CATTELL. I am very sorry that my friend from Pennsylvania did not succeed in getting up the little bill in regard to the Agricultural Department, of which I am quite as much in favor as he is, and which might have been passed in a very few minutes. Nevertheless, I cannot vote to postpone the consideration of the bill now before the Senate. The original bill, covering, I think, an important subject, was laid on the table nearly three months ago, March 16. At the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania its consideration was then postponed. After a week or two I proposed to call up the bill again, as I felt a great degree of interest in it, believing it to be an important bill. I then received a note from the Senator from Pennsylvania that he was obliged to leave the city for a day or two, and asking me not to have the bill called up, and, of course, I acquiesced in that request cheerfully and at once. If it had not been for that, this bill would have been considered prior to the commencement of the impeachment trial. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania ought not to object now to its consideration. The amendments proposed are unimportant, compared with the body of the bill, and I therefore hope that it will now be taken up and considered.

Mr. CAMERON. It is hardly fair to put the postponement of this bill on my shoulders. It is true, I objected to its passage when it was first brought here. It is also true that I went home for a couple of days, and I wrote a friendly note to my friend, the Senator from New Jersey, asking him not to call up the bill in my absence; but that was more than two months ago, and since that time I have never said a word on the subject. And the Senate will bear in mind that only a day or two ago, in a consultation among gentlemen who are interested in the legislation here, it was understood that this bill would not be brought up. Now, I tell Senators that this is a subject which will probably provoke a great deal of discussion. It is a question which involves the destruction of the interests of the country banks in favor of the interests of the city banks. My friend, the Senator from New Jersey, lives in the city of Philadelphia; all his commercial interests are connected there; I live in the country, and mine are not altogether city interests. A very large proportion of the banking capital of the country is not in the commercial towns of the Union. I desire only to have the bill postponed for the present. If the Senators put it forward I assure them they will not get it through to-day.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the entire morning hour will not be spent by the Senator from Philadelphia—the Senator will excuse me; I mean the Senator from New Jersey, of course—and the other two Senators in discussing the mere precedence of business. We have bills here—I have—that have been acted on in part by the Senate, and I am exceedingly anxious to get them before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill is before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing it until to-morrow.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, the amendments proposed to this bill, which are four or five in number, adding four or five sections, were only reported on the 29th of May, a few days ago. I think it is but a reasonable request which my colleague makes, that he and others in his situation, interested in this subject of banking, shall have the opportunity of considering not only the original bill, but these amendments which the committee have reported to the Senate. I supposed that this original bill would not be called up again during the present session. It was up, and the Senator from New Jersey, who represented the interests of the city banks, the moneyed circles of the cities, addressed the Senate at length upon it. I am aware that the views he then expressed were not received, with favor by all those concerned in this new system of banking, especially in the interior.

Now, sir, I desire that this whole question, if we are to pass upon it, shall come up under such circumstances that we can have a fair debate upon it. I should be very much gratified, and no doubt I should also be informed, by hearing my colleague speak on this subject, because he is much better informed upon it than I am. I am desirous of voting for any amendment to the banking system which may be proposed by the committee; but I should like to be right sure that they were amendments, that none of them would operate to the advantage of city against country, or of one interest against another.

Besides, sir, upon general grounds I think it is a convenient practice in the Senate that there should be a little notice of bills before we are asked to vote upon them, and vote finally.

Mr. SHERMAN. I gave it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I was not aware that this subject was coming up again. Although these amendments were printed two or three days ago they escaped my attention. We are so crowded with other employments, other business, that we cannot know what the printers are doing. When, then, my colleague proposes that this bill shall go over for a day or two before we consider it, it seems to me very extraordinary that there should be objection in any quarter. I know very well that the Senator from Ohio can get up a bill of this description, a bill upon the general policy of the country, more readily than almost any member in this Chamber. We almost always agree to anything which he proposes with reference to the order of business, and there is no doubt in my mind that he will be able to get up his bill within a day or two without any difficulty.

Mr. SHERMAN. In regard to the order of business, I say to the Senate that there is no prospect of acting upon this important bill unless we act upon it now. It is a question in which persons take but very little interest, and it is very difficult to get the attention of the Senate to it. I believe there is no objection, even in the mind of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] to the amendments proposed. His objection is to the body of the bill, which, in my judgment, is a wise and just provision, without which the banking system is wrong. This bill is not presented in the interest of the city banks or of the country banks. I am from the country; but I say that the whole system and its vitality depend upon the prohibition of the payment of interest on the bank reserve. The country banks are more interested in it than the city banks. The objection of the Senator from Pennsylvania is to the original bill, not to the amendments, and he has had three months to brood over it. Let him present his objections to the original bill if he chooses, and they will be answered; and I have no doubt they will be answered successfully. This is not in the interest of city banks or country banks. It is a bill of vital importance to the safety of the national banking system, now under a pressure, or which will soon be under a pressure as we gradually approach specie payments. It simply proposes to correct glaring abuses that have actually occurred in the administration of the bank department. I hope, therefore, the Senate will not postpone the bill, because if it does that will be a substantial postponement of it for this session.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator from Ohio did not hear me, I believe, when I was standing at my proper seat. My objections are to the whole bill, to the discussion of the question now, or to the passage of any amendments to the banking law at present. I want the whole system of currency and finance to lie over until next year. I think we are getting along very well by doing nothing on that subject, and I think every day the country is becoming more healthy and in better condition to meet all its demands in gold. I think we shall do so sooner if we say nothing about it; and I think the more we legislate on the subject the further we shall put off the day of payment in gold.

I am not prepared to make a speech on this subject. I am not prepared at any time to speak very well; but I am not prepared now to discuss this question. If, however, it is postponed I shall try to show hereafter that the whole measure is wrong. Our loans in England are rising constantly, and whenever they get near par we shall be able to resume specie payments here. I think the great reason of the increased value of our funds abroad and at home is that we have done nothing on this subject.

There is no subject in the world so little understood as that of finance. I do not pretend to understand it; nor have I ever seen anybody that did properly; and yet everybody, no matter how ignorant he may be, thinks he understands the question of money better than anybody else. I do not suppose you could pick up a hundred men in the streets anywhere who would not get up and make you a speech without a moment's reflection on the subject of currency and finance, and every man would be satisfied himself that he ought to convince the whole world. It is very much so here among the men who are selected, of course, for their intelligence and general information upon that subject, as well as others.

Sir, I want this subject to go before the people, and let them mature something in regard to it, if any matured bill may be necessary. I want Senators to go home, and as soon as possible. I should like them to go home this month, and reflect at home on the subject of the currency. There can be no prosperity in finance unless the country itself is peaceable and prosperous, and whenever that comes we shall have prosperity in our finances. To-day our five-twenty bonds are within about twenty per cent. of par in gold. I believe they are selling at above fifteen above par in currency now, and I have no doubt, if we do nothing here on the subject, our five-twenty bonds will be twenty per cent. above our currency par, which will bring them within some fifteen or sixteen per cent. of gold par. All that will be done if we let it alone. I think our country is now very much in the condition of a person convalescent, who has been taking a great deal of medicine. If he continues to employ the doctor, the doctor kills him. If he is suffered to be in the hands of nature, nature, without any medicine, will restore his health, because his constitution will take care of it. I do not want to act on this question now, and therefore I hope the Senate will consent to postpone it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope that this bill will not be taken up at this session—

Mr. SHERMAN. It is pending before the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think it is a bill which will very injuriously affect the country. I have looked at it somewhat, and have received a great many communications from different parts of the country in reference to it. I think it is a bill which is calculated to destroy the country banks.

Mr. WILSON. It is evident after what has been said this morning that we are not in a condition to proceed to the consideration of this bill to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon the postponement, and I shall insist upon it as a final test vote on the passage of this bill. I do not care what is done with it, but I will not call it up again if it is now postponed. It is three months since it was reported, and if it is postponed now it is postponed for good. If Senators look upon this as a mere formal matter, I will state the merits of the bill on the motion to postpone, and the absolute necessity that rests upon us to pass the bill at this session. It would be utterly idle to call it up again if it be postponed now after having been reported three months ago.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that I am perfectly willing to take it up and consider it; but, after the expressions which have been made this morning, it seems to me we are hardly prepared to go on with it. I am very desirous to get up, at the earliest possible moment, the bill which has passed the House of Representatives to continue the Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes. We ought to pass it this week without fail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the bill under consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, I desire to say a few words on the question of postponement.

The Senate thus far have refused to act upon financial legislation at this session. It is manifest that the Senate is disposed, or has been disposed, to avoid action upon it. I have no complaint to make of that. The Committee on Finance have endeavored, if possible, to conform their action to the imperative necessity of the public business, and to gratify, as far as could be done, consistently with their sense of duty, this disposition of the Senate to avoid discussion on financial questions, or action upon them. That is all I desire to state on that point.

Now, in regard to the banking act, there were various propositions sent to the committee, some of which were revolutionary in their character, some to abolish the system entirely, some to extend it into a free banking system; but the committee laid aside those propositions, or, at least, do not propose to ask any final action upon them. There were, however, certain abuses now practiced by the banks, gross and palpable abuses, which endangered the safety of the system, which we thought it our duty, at the urgent request both of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Comptroller of the Currency, and after a most careful examination, to bring to the attention of the Senate.

It is perfectly certain that if this bill is postponed now it will not be taken up again, because a postponement to-day, when we have nothing pending before us, after notice had been given that the bill would be brought up to-day, when these amendments have been fully considered, is a substantial defeat of the bill, and I, as a matter of course, will take the judgment of the Senate in favor of the postponement of this bill as a condemnation of the bill, and will not call it up again during the present session.

Let us see what is in this bill so that Senators may judge whether there is any ground of opposition to it. The first section simply provides that banks shall not pay interest on deposits or balances to each other, or offer any inducement other than the prompt and correct transaction of business, in order to secure such deposits. Now, what is the abuse of the system? The whole money from the West is now drawn into the city of New York. It is drawn out of its ordinary channel to defeat the ordinary purposes of local banks, to defeat the benefits of such local organizations, into the cities, and there is made the basis of stock speculations. The very money which by the law is required to be kept in the vaults of the bank, or on deposit at some other deposit bank, is now drawing interest for the benefit of the banks, and is loaned out in the city of New York on stock speculations. The very safety of the system depends on the reserve which is required by the law to be kept in the banks, and every dollar of this reserve is now loaned out to other deposit banks, and in this way there is no limit and no restraint upon the banks. Not only do they loan out the money given to them for circulation, but they loan out their entire reserve by depositing it in deposit banks in the cities, and there it is made the basis of speculation. Sir, if we were anywhere near specie payments, that very fact would blow up the whole system, because the whole safety of the system depends upon its wise management and upon the safety of that reserve. And yet the objection which the Senator from Pennsylvania makes is to this section of the bill. It is all there is in the bill of consequence, as it originally stood.

The second section of the bill, I wish Senators to understand, simply prohibits the Government of the United States from depositing in these banks more money than it takes security for. It does happen, now, that in some cases millions of dollars are deposited in some of the national banks by the United States Government without adequate security. There is no law which requires more than a certain amount of security. The second section provides that in every case the amount of security shall be ten per cent. more than the amount of deposit; and this is the only safety for the deposits made by the Government of the United States. Why, sir, a violation of this second section of the bill has broken several banks and lost the Government large sums of money. In the face of this fact will the Senate refuse to guard the Treasury of the United States? Upon the motion of the Committee on Finance you have already refused to change your deposit system, because the change was revolutionary in its character. We have yielded to the sentiment of the Senate so far; and now the second section of this bill merely provides that a bank receiving deposits of the Government shall give security for those deposits, and that the amount of bonds filed in the Treasury as security for deposits shall be ten per cent. more than the amount of the deposits. Can there be any objection to that section?

Those two sections constituted the bill as originally reported. Some amendments have since been reported, which I will proceed to state the provisions of.

The first amendment offered simply provides that a bank shall not deposit with a broker more than ten per cent. of its capital. Under the present system large deposits are made with irresponsible brokers interested in the bank, and these brokers failing, the bank fails, and all is swept away. That is contrary to the spirit and letter and meaning of the banking act. It seems to me for the Senate to refuse to correct this palpable error or this palpable weakness of the system at this time, for any reason whatever, is wrong.

The next amendment provides that a banking association which is winding up shall redeem its circulation. Why, sir, one of the most palpable abuses that now grow out of the system is that many of the national banks are winding up. What for? To avoid liability under the banking act. They give notice of their intention to wind up, and then they never pay one dollar of their circulation. The circulation is out. They do not carry on any business of a bank. They do not loan money. They keep a little cubby of an office, loan no money, render no facilities, and yet draw interest on their circulation. They loan the money to themselves, divide the circulation among themselves, and draw interest on that circulation. That thing is going on; and I have here a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency, making the remarkable statement that banks are now pretending to wind up in order to avoid liability under the banking act, and then they do not redeem their circulation. That floats all over the country. They are drawing interest on the circulation; and draw gold interest on their bonds; and you refuse to correct that! Why, Mr. President, it is palpable, gross, shameful; and for the Senate to refuse to do its duty in correcting these gross and scandalous abuses for any political reason would be an abandonment of a great public duty, in which I, for one, will not share. This thing is going on here from day to day. We have several statements of that fact. These banks are drawing interest in gold on their bonds, they are making interest on their circulation, and they are not carrying on the proper business of banks or loaning any money whatever to the people. This is intended to correct that abuse.

There is another thing which requires careful correction. The next amendment provides for the fees of receivers of national banks. In the city of New York the courts have allowed $60,000 in fees to a single receiver, and the whole has been earned in nine months. They have allowed $16,000 attorneys' fees for nine months' services.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Has that been done in the United States courts?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; in the State courts. Under the law as it now stands the court before which a receiver's report comes regulates the fees of the receiver and the fees of attorney; there is no limit to the costs; and under that provision, in the city of New York, lawyers and receivers are sweeping up the assets of the banks to the injury of the creditors of the banks by these extortionate fees. In the case of a bank with $1,200,000 assets they allowed to the receiver five per cent. on the gross amount, although it is in United States bonds; and they allowed in that case to attorneys enormous sums. I would rather be the attorney of a broken bank in the city of New York than hold any office in the United States.

The Comptroller of the Currency reports these facts to us, and comes here and says "Give me some relief." We provide in the fourth section that the fees allowed to receivers shall not be more than are allowed to collectors of internal revenue, and that the bills of attorneys shall be fixed by the judge of the court of the United States, and not by a local State court. Can we refuse to pass amendments of that kind to the banking law on any pretense that to talk about finance or act about finance may injure us in any way? It is shameful to confess that, in my judgment.

A word now in regard to another amendment which is reported as the fifth section. There are States in this Union that have not a single national bank. There are other States in this Union, both loyal and rebel States, that have scarce any. Several States in the Union now want banking facilities. Massachusetts and Rhode Island and Connecticut have from fifty to seventy dollars of banking circulation per inhabitant, while there are other States that have none whatever, and are now demanding facilities to move their crops. That is the case especially in the South. Will you give them no relief? Will you allow this inequality to prevail? Will you allow certain States to absorb the banking capital of this country, and other States, poor and demanding help and aid from your national banking associations, to have none whatever? If you refuse to do it when the case is so palpable and gross as this, instead of avoiding public clamor I think you will excite public clamor against the whole system. We provide in section five, without changing the national bank act at all, for an expansion of the limit, so that banks with a very limited amount of capital, not to exceed $20,000,000, and probably the amount will even be reduced below that, may be organized in States and Territories where the banking circulation is less than five dollars to an inhabitant. Some of the States have fifty or sixty dollars per inhabitant.

Now, will the Senate refuse to give to other States that have no circulation the small pittance of five dollars' circulation for each inhabitant in order that they may share fairly in the benefit of the national circulation? If you refuse to do that for political reasons, and leave that duty undone, it seems to me you will excite public clamor against your refusal to legislate much more than you will by taking any responsibility.

I now desire, once for all, utterly to repudiate all disposition to avoid or evade these financial questions. I am willing to take up the banking subject and consider it fairly and vote upon it, and not avoid it for fear that it may do harm. In regard to the great problem of finance involved in the funding of the public debt, the issue of new bonds, and the rate of interest, I think it would be well enough and not unwise to consider that great question at a time when there is no political excitement, when there is no pending election. But, sir, we cannot, as a Congress, refuse to correct these gross and palpable abuses in any portion of our financial system that are made known to us, properly called to our attention, without assuming a responsibility that I, for one, will not. Such is the state of public business that if this bill is now postponed it cannot be taken up again. There are the reconstruction bills and a thousand other bills that are pressing upon us. The tax bill and many others will crowd it aside. This is a bill of wise, judicious, restrictive legislation. Every provision is restrictive of the system, tends to fortify it, to increase the confidence of the people in it. I say that under these circumstances we ought not to postpone the consideration of this bill but to meet it fairly. If any of these amendments are not proper in themselves, as a matter of course the Senate is here to correct them. They have been fully considered by the Committee on Finance, and, I believe, are reported unanimously with but a single exception, and as to that there is a difference of opinion rather in regard to amount than to principle, and the very section to which my friend from Pennsylvania objects is one that, in my judgment, is vital; one that will protect country banks, that will protect the country people and the country merchant. Why, sir, I know now banks in the State of Ohio that loan every dollar of their surplus capital in the city of New York, because they can deposit it there at their call and receive four or five per cent. interest for the deposit, while they refuse to the merchant, to the farmer, and to the produce dealer any accommodation whatever.

Do you say that that is for the benefit of the countryman? When my friend from Pennsylvania talks about the country as against the city, he appeals to a weak principle in our nature. I am disposed to go with him for the protection of the country against the city; but it is for the protection of the country that all banking capital should be drawn from the country and deposited in the city merely to enable bankers that own the banks in Ohio and western Pennsylvania to draw interest on their surplus capital? Not at all. It is a dodge which ought to be corrected, and which the country banks themselves desire to correct. It is not for the interest of city banks to pass this part of the bill. They are perfectly willing to receive these deposits and pay interest on them. They do not want this bill except as the abuse itself tends to injure the system.

Sir, the adoption of this bill would restore the banking system to its legitimate purpose of distributing the circulation all over the country by requiring the banks to loan their money in the ordinary way to their people at home, and not excite them by large profits, by the payment of interest on their reserve, and by such unnatural means drain the money from the country into the city where it may be made the sport of the stock gambler. At one time last winter money in New York was worth three or four per cent., owing to the accumulation of the deposits in banks, while in the West it was worth ten per cent. The great object of the national bank system was to distribute the circulation over the country so that every State and every community might have its fair share. The operation of this bill will be simply restrictive upon the abuses carried on by country and city banks in drawing interest upon their reserve, and thus defeating the very purpose and policy of the banking act.

I ask Senators, therefore, to consider this bill. I do not intend to debate it. I did not intend to say this much about it. It is up, and I hope the Senate will not postpone it. Let us act on what amendments are vitally necessary, and if in the opinion of the Senate any amendment is not vitally necessary lay it aside; but let us correct some of these glaring abuses that have arisen in the administration of the banking department, and then send the bill to the House of Representatives, where, I have no doubt, it will meet with the hearty and prompt assent of the House. This bill does not involve any change in our system, any radical change in our finances, any change in our banks. It simply corrects gross and palpable abuses that have come to light in the actual administration of the banks, and every change it makes is now demanded by the head of the banking department, and I think ought at once to be assented to by the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio said in a part of his remarks that my objection to the first part of the bill was "a dodge." I do not know exactly what is meant by "a dodge," but I desire to say to him that if he means that I have any stock speculations he does great injustice to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I assure the Senator I did not—

Mr. CAMERON. Let me go on. I have heard it rumored that the Senator himself deals in stocks; but I have nothing to do with them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I feel bound to say to the Senator that he is totally unauthorized in that statement. I do not like, to a gentleman of his character and position, to use the language I feel inclined to use in regard to such a charge. I meant nothing unkind. I said this was a dodge, not by the Senator, but by some of the banks.

Mr. CAMERON. To me that word does not sound very polite. But I desire to say that in regard to the first part of the bill—I have spoken before on that subject—I think it is an amendment to the law for the purpose of benefiting the city banks in this way: by the banking law the country banks are compelled to deposit a certain amount of their capital in the city for the purpose of redeeming their notes. While that deposit is there it is but fair that it should be paid for. They cannot use it at home among their customers, because the law compels them to send it away from home. Besides that, the natural course of trade takes all the capital of the country into the cities at particular periods of the year. Men in the country borrow money for the purpose of forwarding the products of the country. At certain periods of the year, in an agricultural district, the crops are to be moved; at other portions of the year the flocks and herds are to be sent to market, and, in the mining districts, the products of the mines. In Pennsylvania our coal is the great product which we send abroad, and from which we get our capital to carry on our trade. The money which the country banks use for these purposes is wanted at home only during certain portions of the year. At other periods of the year, while it is lying idle to them and is deposited in New York or Philadelphia or Boston or other places, it is but fair that they should have a fair price for the use of it.

The Senator said that money could be had in New York at four per cent., while in the country the people had to pay ten. I think he is mistaken in that. I heard him once before say that he or I could borrow money in New York at four per cent. That is not correct. In New York men borrow money by the day at four or five or six per cent., as it may happen, to place it in stock or other speculations; but that is not a loan; it is a mere deposit on call, for the security of which those who obtain the money put up Government or other bonds or stocks equally good as collateral. That is not a regular loan, but a mere handing over of money for a price, out of which the person who borrows it expects to make a very large profit. In the country it is not so; the customers are regular there, and they get their money from their bank at the legal interest, whatever it may be; in New York seven, in Pennsylvania six per cent.

The greater portion of the Senator's speech was a patriotic display of words in favor of States which have no banks, and he provides for them $20,000,000 of banking capital. I will go with him as far as he desires, or anybody else may desire, to furnish the States which have been in rebellion with banks as soon as they wish to have them. As soon as they are brought into the Union I shall be one of the first to give them the banking facilities they may require. At present they do not need much; but if they did, how far would his $20,000,000 go? It would scarcely furnish one State of all these unreconstructed States. I think if the Secretary of the Treasury would turn his attention to using the money he now has in the Treasury—his $100,000,000, which, I believe, is the sum he constantly keeps there in gold—to pay off the public debt or to buy the Government loans as they are offered at a low price he would do a great deal more service to the country than by agitating it upon the subject of banking just now.

I thought I had taken notes of what the Senator said, but I have mislaid some of them. I did wish to answer him on another point, but it has escaped my mind. For the present, I only desire that this bill shall lie over. It is not the time to discuss it, and I do not think the Senate are prepared to act on it. At least I am not. I certainly hope it will be postponed for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to postpone the bill until to-morrow, upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, this bill is certainly a very important one. I have not been able to examine the amendments myself, and I should like to have the opportunity of examining some of them carefully. I should like to ask whether the bill cannot be informally laid aside so as to be called up at any time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let it be made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it be made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, I shall not object.

Mr. CORBETT. I move that it be made the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only objection I have to that is that it may be affected by unfinished business. If the Senate really desire to look into the bill, and are willing to take it up to-morrow, I shall interpose no objection, for I think the more they will examine it the more they will approve it. If it can be made the special order so as to be taken up at one o'clock to-morrow, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. CAMERON. I am not in favor of making it the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. CORBETT. I will make that motion, that it be made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of this bill be postponed, and that it be made the special order for one o'clock to-morrow. This branch of the motion requires a two-thirds vote.

Mr. CONKLING. I think there is other business for to-morrow, and I was about to state what it was, but I see that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee is now here, and perhaps he can make a statement as to the probability of business for to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator from Oregon had better withdraw his request and let us go on now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I certainly hope no special order will be made for to-morrow. I think it very important that we should go on with the bills to admit the lately rebel States to representation. There are five of them now in which constitutions have been adopted and which are ready to be represented in Congress as soon as Congress takes action.

Mr. CORBETT. I withdraw the motion to make the bill a special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to postpone the bill until to-morrow, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, McCreery, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, and Yates—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Cattell, Cole, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Henderson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Davis, Dixon, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Pomeroy, Sprague, and Thayer—15.

So the consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill providing for appeals from the Court of Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 164) to provide for appeals from the judgments of the Court of Claims, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, as amended, to insert the following as section four:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no plaintiff or claimant, or any person from or through whom any such plaintiff or claimant derives his alleged title, claim, or right against the United States, or any person interested in any such title, claim, or right shall be a competent witness in the Court of Claims in supporting any such title, claim, or right, and no testimony given by such plaintiff, claimant, or person, shall be used: Provided, That the United States shall, if they see cause, have the right to examine such plaintiff, claimant, or person as a witness, under the regulations and with the privileges provided in section eight of the act passed March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to amend an act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States, approved February 24, 1855."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to insert as section five:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of May, 1868, the Attorney General of the United States for the time being, shall, with his assistants, attend to the prosecution and defense of all matters and suits in the Court of Claims, on behalf of the United States. There shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two Assistant Attorneys General, who shall hold their offices for four years respectively, unless sooner lawfully removed, and whose salaries shall be $—each per year, payable quarterly, and who shall be in lieu of the solicitor and assistant solicitor of the Court of Claims, and of the Assistant Attorney General now provided for by law: and the existing offices of solicitor and assistant solicitors of the Court of Claims, and of Assistant Attorney General, are hereby abolished from and after the 1st day of May, 1868. The Attorney General shall have power to appoint two additional clerks of the fourth class, and one clerk at a salary not exceeding $2,000, in his office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move, in the first place, in the twelfth line of that amendment, after the word "solicitor," to insert the words "and deputy solicitor," and to strike out at the end of the eleventh line the word "and," so as to read: "shall be in lieu of the solicitor, assistant solicitor, and deputy solicitor," that being the legal designation of these officers. This is a merely verbal alteration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This verbal amendment to the amendment will be agreed to if there be no objection. It is agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the fourteenth line I move to strike out the word "and" before "assistant" and the letter "s" from "solicitors," so as to make it read "solicitor," and to insert the words "and deputy solicitor," so as to read, "offices of solicitor, assistant solicitor, and deputy solicitor." That is a mere verbal correction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be considered agreed to unless objected to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I had not paid any attention to this subject; I was absent, I suppose, when it was up for consideration before, and I was not aware that it was coming up to-day. This is a very important change proposed in this fifth section, and I think the Senator from Vermont should give to the Senate the benefit of his reflections on the proposed change. From a hurried perusal, I understand it is to abolish our present legal organization for the defense of the United States before the Court of Claims, and to turn the business now performed by the solicitor, and assistant solicitor and deputy solicitor over to the Attorney General. It seems to me that this is a very inopportune time to make this change, at the close of the war, when by reason of the war a vast amount of business has accumulated which it will be necessary to dispose of within the next year or two. I take it for granted that the force of the Attorney General's office and the force already organized in behalf of the Government in the Court of Claims will both be necessary for the transaction of the public business. If at any time a change of this sort should be introduced, it would be most appropriate a few years hence, when this business that has grown out of the war, as we well know, has been disposed of, when there is nothing to transact except the ordinary business that arises in time of peace. I hope, sir, the Senator from Vermont will explain to us the reason for this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will do that so far as I can, with the greatest pleasure. The very fact that there is a great deal of business in the Court of Claims growing out of the war and out of other subjects, is one of the reasons which induced the Judiciary Committee to believe that this change ought to be made. It is not a new subject with that committee. At a former session, a year ago or more—I forget the precise time—the chairman of that committee reported a bill which was substantially like this fifth section, I believe by the unanimous concurrence of the committee, in order to produce what the committee believe to be a salutary reform. That bill is on the Calendar yet. In the press of affairs it was not reached or acted upon. The subject again came to our attention this year, when we came to consider a bill offered for the purpose of providing appeals from that court, so that the law which should affect claims to the amount of millions against the Treasury Department might be finally settled by the highest tribunal if the United States chose to carry up those cases to the Supreme Court, it having been the opinion of the Court of Claims that what are called the cotton claims were not the subjects of appeal under the old law. We thought, therefore, when the subject was brought to our attention again, that it was desirable to so reorganize the operations in that court, so far as the interests of the United States went, as to defending it against unjust claims, as to have a responsible head who should have the control and who should be responsible for the proper administration of the interests of the United States in that court and on appeal from it.

It appeared to us that the office of Attorney General was the true office to which should be committed the law interests of the United States; and I may go further and say that I believe, and I think the committee believe, but I am not authorized to state that for them, that one of the greatest reforms that could now be made would be to so reorganize the Attorney General's office and the law business of the Government as to put that office at the head of all the law business of the Government, to get rid of solicitors of departments and all sorts of special appointments over the country, from one end of it to the other, that are now a great drain upon the Treasury, and which, on account of great diversity and multifariousness and want of connection and coherence between the management in one part of the country and the management in another, produce endless contention and very great expense. To be sure, it is not the fault of the Departments that it is so; it is the fault of the condition of the law which has not made sufficient provision to meet all these exigencies. Therefore it appeared to us that one of the wisest things we could do as a beginning upon this species of reform would be to put the Attorney General, who presumably is a man of the highest character and of the highest legal ability, above all reproach and all temptation, at the head of the defense of these cases in the Court of Claims, and to make him responsible for them not only there but in the Supreme Court of the United States. It so seemed to us, and I think it will commend itself to the good sense of the Senate; and that, without intending to imply any reflection upon the character or fidelity of the gentlemen who have so far had charge of these matters in the Court of Claims; but the trouble is now, as the law stands, that the whole business is out of joint.

When cases of any kind go up from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court, as the law now stands, it is the business of the solicitor of the Court of Claims, and not of the Attorney General, no matter how vast may be the interests that are at stake, no matter how extensive the application of principles to be decided may be, to attend to those causes, and the Attorney General is left to have his Department and the general interests of the Government affected by those decisions.

If we are to have an Attorney General according to the original theory and spirit of the law that provided for one, he certainly ought to be the responsible executive head of the defense of all the law claims that are brought against the United States. It seemed so to me; it seemed so to the committee. We thought, therefore, without intending to be invidious in the matter, that the true interests of the Government required us to turn over to that office, with a sufficient force to execute it, the labor and the responsibility of conducting these causes from beginning to end.

These are the reasons, in brief, that affect that part of the bill. The previous portion of the bill, providing for appeals, providing for the granting of new trials and the staying of payment upon an order of any one of the judges, and providing for a rule of evidence as to claimants who had been rebels, I dare say will commend itself, without my occupying any time on the points, to the good opinion of the Senate. This, briefly, is the reason why we recommend this change which is proposed in the fifth section.

As I am up, I will move, as the time has been running along, to strike out the word

"May" in the second line, and insert "July." This is as to the time when this change shall go into effect; and the same modification, substituting "July" for "May" should be made in the sixteenth line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move to fill the blank in the tenth line, which provides for the salaries of these Assistant Attorneys General, with the words, "four thousand dollars." I do not know myself whether that is the proper sum, but I suggest that for the consideration of the Senate as perhaps a fair and proper compensation for these two Assistant Attorneys General, $4,000 a year. I shall yield cheerfully to any wish the Senate may have about it to insert some other sum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to fill the blank.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will suggest to the Senator from Vermont, that by omitting the fifth and sixth sections of the bill it will be entirely unobjectionable, and I suppose will create no debate. Now, sir, here in this fifth section we are to establish two new offices. It provides for the nomination and appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of two Assistant Attorneys General. We know that there is no regular Attorney General now in office, and here will be thrown upon the Senate at once the business of confirming an Attorney General and two Assistant Attorneys General.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is only to take effect on the 1st of July, by which time it is supposed there will be an Attorney General.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The bill says, "the 1st of May."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That time has gone by, and I have changed it already to July.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator has made a change to the 1st of July. Suppose the bill were passed in that form, would it authorize the President to appoint in the vacation? I am not entirely sure, under a proper construction of the tenure-of-office law, whether he could appoint then or not. That raises an old question, discussed in former times. How it is to be determined now, under our new system established by our tenure-of-office law, I do not know; whether these offices are to remain open and unfilled until Congress shall meet in December next, or whether they shall be considered as vacancies happening in the recess and thus to be filled by temporary commissions, to expire at the end of the next session of Congress. You will have a question, perhaps, of considerable difficulty, and if you abolish the offices of the solicitors of the Court of Claims and charge these duties upon Assistant Attorneys General, and have no such assistants in office, the public business is to be delayed until the next winter. But if they are to be appointed, and can be appointed by the President in the recess after the adjournment of the Senate, you have a question of confirmation coming up next winter, on which there is prospect of disagreement between the President and the Senate as to the selection of individuals.

It looks to me that this is an untimely bill, that this is not the occasion to attempt the introduction of this change. We shall have extreme difficulty in filling these offices, and in filling the office of Attorney General, by the way, who is intended by this bill to be the very officer to represent the United States before this Court of Claims. There is now an ad interim service going on in that office by the head of another Department who is charged with laborious duties of his own; and we do not know that we shall be able to fill that office by a permanent appointment before the adjournment of the Senate. Much less likely does it appear that we shall be able to fill these Assistant Attorney Generalships which are established by the bill. Meantime, the present legal force engaged in defending the United States before that court is turned out of office, as I understand the bill.

The Senator says that he is in favor of establishing a law department under the Attorney General of the United States, which shall have charge of all the duties which are now performed not only by the solicitors in the Court of Claims, but by solicitors in the Treasury Department and by other law officers in the other Departments. Well, sir, when the Senator himself, or some one for him, has matured a bill, a new bill which shall reorganize the law business of the Government, when a project for this new department shall be presented to us in the form of a bill, it will be time enough to call upon us to enact it. I suggest, therefore, to the Senator, that by omitting this fifth and a part of the sixth section we can pass the remainder of his bill without difficulty, and this question of the reorganization of the Attorney General's office can come up next winter, when we shall be much better prepared to approach it, and when we can settle the principles upon which it shall be organized for the future much better than we can now.

While I am up I will ask for an explanation of the third section. As I understand, that requires any person who has a claim in the Court of Claims to prove his loyalty. It provides—

That whenever it shall be material in any suit or claim before any court to ascertain whether any person did or did not give any aid or comfort to the late rebellion, the claimant or party ascertaining the loyalty of any such person to the United States during such rebellion, shall be required to prove affirmatively that such person did, during said rebellion, consistently adhere to the United States.

Under our legislation it is provided, with reference to large classes of claims, that the applicant shall have been a loyal person during the late war; but I think it would be very unreasonable to require claimants from the central and northern States to go into proof of this kind. I think that this affirmative to be made in cases covered by this third section should be only required of persons who were during the war citizens of the revolted States. You are requiring here a party to prove a negative; to prove that he did not render aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States during the late war. That is a burden which ought not to be imposed upon suitors unless they come from a State which was engaged in rebellion, and where, legitimately and properly, the presumption of disloyalty arises. However, sir, that is a mere matter of detail. The first four sections of the Senator's bill, and the seventh, are, in my judgment, proper and useful. I am in favor of the bill to that extent; and I hope the Senator will leave this question of the organization of a law department until the next session of Congress, and let us pass the other parts of the bill immediately, which we can do without debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if the Senate are dissatisfied with this fifth section, of course they will disagree to the amendment which the committee reported, which is to insert this as the fifth section, and that will settle the question. The Judiciary Committee have been satisfied for a long time, as is shown by what I have already stated, that this is a change which ought to be made; and my friend from Pennsylvania does not seem to be in possession of any facts or reasons now which lead him to believe that the change is not in substance a meritorious one, although he thinks it is unwise to enter upon it now. It appears to me that if, after consideration, this seems to be a correct and wise thing to do, the best time to do it is now when we are treating of the subject of the Court of Claims. It seems to be perfectly appropriate to make this provision in this bill, if it is a right provision to make at all. I do not wish to repeat what I said before as to the propriety of making this change. It seemed to be obvious to the committee from the facts that are within their knowledge, and from the reasons that I have suggested to the Senate, that it is one which will save the Government a great deal of money, will save the state of the law a great deal of confusion, and will work advantageously on all sides.

It is said, to be sure, by my friend from Pennsylvania that if there should not be a nomination and a confirmation before we adjourn, a difficult and vexed question will be presented. Such questions are presented, Mr. President, at all times; we cannot avoid difficult and vexed questions by postponing them until next December; and this will not be a question of any very great degree of difficulty, as I think. Let us presume that if this bill passes and receives the approval of the President, he will nominate some competent and skillful persons, either those who are now discharging these functions or such other persons as he may select, such as my friend from Pennsylvania would be willing to recommend to him, which I have no doubt would settle the question of their nomination, and we should undoubtedly confirm them, and there would be the end of that matter.

The reason stated by my friend from Pennsylvania is not an adequate reason for not acting on this portion of the bill now. It ought to be acted on, as we think, with the knowledge that we have derived in our inquiries and investigations as to the state of business and the difficulties and confusion that surround it. Now, when there is so great a pressure on the Treasury for these war claims and cotton claims by a horde of claimants—some of them very likely having just claims, and others quite the reverse—it is of all times most appropriate that we should protect the interests of the Government by putting the defense of these cases into the hands of the responsible head of the law department of the Government. Then we shall have an administration of these cases such as we shall be satisfied with. So much for that.

Now, as to what my friend says as to the third section—although it is not quite in order to discuss it, it having already been agreed to—I will, with the permission of the Senate, say a word in regard to it. It would be very difficult to undertake to distinguish between the classes of persons who should be required to prove loyalty affirmatively. To declare that a citizen of Vermont should not be required to prove loyalty while a citizen of Virginia should, would seem to be making a very invidious distinction. In the legal sense there is just as much presumption of loyalty as applied to the citizen of one of these States as the other; and, perhaps, if you take an individual citizen in a practical and de facto sense, it would not be right. I am so much of a national Democrat as to believe in the equality of all men before the law, even if they are white men and claimants in the Court of Claims. I should be very sorry to apply one rule of evidence to a citizen of Vermont or Pennsylvania and another to a citizen of Virginia or South Carolina. That, as it appears to me, would be contrary to the first principles of justice and of the administration of the law.

My friend says it is inconvenient to require this affirmative proof. It is a little inconvenient when it is a perfectly clear case; that is to say, the claimant is put to the expense of a dollar for taking the deposition of some man who would swear that he had resided in Pennsylvania during the war, and had never been suspected of any disloyalty. That would be proof enough. On the other hand, if you find a man in Pennsylvania who has been absent during the war, not in the Union Army, and has been all the time in the South, it might require a little more evidence to satisfy a court that he was a man of that loyal character which comes within the definition of the law as to making these claims; so that the only practicable and fair way that occurred to the committee was to lay down one rule which would apply to all persons alike, and that was to put the affirmative upon them, inasmuch as they would know where they had been, what they had been about, and what they could prove; whereas if you put it upon the United States to prove that they had not been loyal, you would just make us perfectly powerless, and any man, no matter how disloyal, could squeeze a claim through the Court of Claims. That is the reason for that provision; but that, as I have said, is not now properly before the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] is a cool gentleman. I never noticed anything from him quite as cool and refreshing as his proposition to the Senator from Vermont to drop the fifth section, when we all know that that is the bill. That is what he is after—to legislate one set of gentlemen out of office, so as to have another opportunity to put another set of gentlemen in. That is the substance of it. This bill, as it originally came to the Senate, was a very innocent affair, proper enough. Nobody could object to it. It proposed that when the Court of Claims decided a case against the Government, the Government might take an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Of course nobody would dispute that. It seemed to be very proper. We would all agree to the passage of a bill like that at once. Then, sir, to that original, simple, plain, fair proposition is attached a further proposition to turn the three solicitors out of the Court of Claims, and the Assistant Attorney General out of office, with a view of making vacancies and putting other gentlemen in their places. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the coolness to suggest that that should now be dropped. Why, that is asking to give up the character in the play itself. The Senator from Vermont has not troubled the Senate to show the importance of this right of appeal on the part of the Government. Of course not. But upon this point of reorganizing the Attorney General's office he is full and elaborate—satisfactory to himself, at least.

Then the sixth section is a very important one, surely. It is fifty-seven lines in all. And what do Senators suppose it contains? It contains an authority on the part of the Attorney General to address a letter to the head of the Department where any decision may have been made, and a direction to that head of the Department to answer the letter of the Attorney General and to give a statement of the case so far as it appears in that Department or that bureau. Is it necessary that we shall legislate so elaborately upon a point so simple as that? Does any Senator suppose that any Department or bureau would refuse to give information touching a decision that had been made in that Department or that bureau, when that decision came under review in the Court of Claims? Clearly not. That decision, inasmuch as it is made the subject of dispute in the Court of Claims, must necessarily go there, go there by a certified copy of the record and of the files, certified under existing laws, certified in such a form that it shall be evidence. It is evidence because the propriety of that decision is attacked in the Court of Claims, and what that decision is, the grounds of that decision, the evidence upon which it was made come before that court as a matter of course. So that I think the sixth section is innocent mainly, but elaborate. I cannot see the necessity for it, except that it is hung on to the fifth section.

The fifth section is the kernel in this nut. There are some gentlemen who must have office, and in order to give them a fair chance in this time of the dispensation of public patronage, in order to give these outside gentlemen a chance, we must legislate the solicitor and his assistants out of office and the Assistant Attorney General out of office, and then comes up the beautiful controversy between the President of the United States and the Senate as to who shall be the successors. The Senator from Vermont, when that controversy shall arise, will say, in my opinion, that any man nominated must be sound not only as a lawyer so as to be fit to be the solicitor or to be the Assistant Attorney General, that he must not only be an able lawyer, but he must be sound on the political questions of the day. The President will think that he must be some person who reflects his views on the question of reconstruction; so that we come to a dispute in the Senate here not whether a party is qualified as a lawyer to vindicate the rights of the United States, but whether he is sound upon the question of reconstruction, as that question hangs between the executive and the legislative department. Is that desirable?

The Senator from Vermont states correctly in respect that it has been a subject of some consultation in the Judiciary Committee, whether there ought not to be a reorganization of the Attorney General's office; but I will suggest to that Senator that that discussion has not been confined to the little question of the Court of Claims and the solicitors in that court, but it has extended to all of the Departments, whether the solicitors in the several Departments ought not to be attached to and become a part of the Attorney General's office. This bill does not propose to regulate all that matter, and it ought not to do so.

On that point I am inclined to think that a reorganization is desirable. I believe that, in my judgment, I shall concur in what I understand to be the opinion of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that the solicitors of the different Departments ought to be a part of the Attorney General's office; it would seem that the law business of the Government ought all to be transacted in the Attorney General's office; but this requires the readjustment, the reorganization of that department. It ought all to be done in one bill having that purpose in view, to consolidate in one department the entire law business of the Government, so far as it is transacted at Washington city. That would carry the different solicitors into the Attorney General's office. I am inclined to favor such a proposition, though it has not been sufficiently considered yet for any Senator to say that his mind is entirely made up. There are some reasons why the solicitors should be in the Departments themselves, so that they may be convenient to be consulted by the head of the Department. On the other hand, there are reasons why the solicitors should be connected with the Attorney General's office, so that upon all the law business of the Government the decisions shall be uniform, and not have one practice in one Department and another practice in another Department.

But this bill proposes to make, I think, four vacancies for four anxious individuals who are now on the outside, and we are called upon to make these vacancies. Why, I ask, Senators? Is it known to Senators that the business in charge of the solicitor and his assistants in the Court of Claims has not been well attended to? Is it known to the Senate that any case has been decided against the Government which ought not thus to have been decided? I have heard complaints of the Court of Claims, but mainly by persons who have lost their cases there. That is the principal complaint that I have heard, and I have not paid much attention to it, for it is not often that a man, having a claim before that court, would be entirely satisfied if the decision should be against him, although every other person might be satisfied that the decision was proper. But that that court has made decisions because of the inefficient management of the solicitors, against the Departments, I have no information, and I think I am justified in saying that no such information came to the Judiciary Committee.

I know I have heard criticisms as to the ability of some gentlemen connected with the Court of Claims; but that the business in that court has not been well conducted, the cases properly presented for the Government, I have no information. I have but a very slight acquaintance indeed with the solicitors; I believe with but one of them, and I do not now recollect his name. Whether he is an able lawyer I shall not undertake to say, except that the fact that there are no complaints, that no cases are presented to us in which the court has been unable to decide properly because of his negligence, is a circumstance supporting him as a public officer.

Mr. President, when it shall be proposed to reorganize the Attorney General's department and to bring into that department all the law business of the Government, then we shall have a dignified and decent business before us; then the purpose of Congress will be plain; the purpose will be to reorganize the department with a view to the efficiency of the public service, and I shall go into that work cheerfully, investigate it, and come to the very best conclusion I can. But, sir, when it is proposed simply in regard to the solicitors of the Court of Claims and in respect to the Assistant Attorney General, to strike them out of office with a view of making vacancies, and that those vacancies shall be under the control of the Senate, and at this time bring into the Senate a controversy which has been agitating, which has not been promotive of the good of the public service, the controversy between the President and the Senate upon political questions, in my judgment it is not for the good of the public service. Therefore in committee I was not in favor of this; I am not in favor of it here; I opposed it there as I oppose it here, as a thing not called for by the facts of the case and as legislation that in my judgment, is vicious.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I desire to say one word in consequence of what has been said by the Senator from Indiana. I think this bill is very valuable in the other parts besides the fifth and sixth sections, upon which he has spoken. In any event, I should be very anxious that it should be enacted. I think the first four sections and the seventh are very good, very useful; and that whatever is done in regard to the fifth and sixth, they ought to be passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say in reply to the honorable Senator from Indiana that he entirely misapprehends, taking him at his word for his belief, the object of this bill. We do not want to legislate out of office any particular persons for the purpose of legislating into office any other persons. My friend from Indiana ought to know that the committee had no such purpose, and they ask the Senate to have no such purpose; and if my friend is so very nervous and suspicious on the subject of official changes, as perhaps from the state of things in the country just now he might be expected to be, of course we cannot impute any blame to him for supposing that wherever he sees meal he believes there must be a cat under it. But he is mistaken about that. The interests we have at heart are those which address themselves to our sense of public duty, to provide for defending the interests of the United States in respect to these great claims that are now being pressed upon the attention of this court for consideration. This is the whole of it; and inasmuch as no reason connected with the merit of the thing has been suggested against it, I hope the Senate will agree to the section.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I believe the large cotton cases to which the Senator refers have gone, or are going, to the Supreme Court, and in that court I understand the Attorney General will represent the Government of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, my friend from Pennsylvania is mistaken. As the law now stands, the solicitor of the Court of Claims, and not the Attorney General, by the express letter of the old law, as it happens to have been framed by mere accident, I suppose, is the person who has charge of the cases that go up from the Court of Claims—a most anomalous and extraordinary state of things.

Mr. BUCKALEW. In the Supreme Court?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCKALEW. There will be no difficulty in modifying the law in that respect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We propose to modify it. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to fill the blank with "four thousand." The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposing to insert the fifth section as amended.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont what will be the additional cost at the salaries now fixed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe it will be less under this bill. There are three persons now connected with the Court of Claims in this capacity, and an assistant in the Attorney General's office, making four persons whom we propose to get rid of, and then we provide in place of them for two Assistant Attorneys General, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, at a salary, I think, slightly larger than the present, but the aggregate expense will be less.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the Senator recollect the present salaries as now fixed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at this moment, but I think it is $3,000 or $3,500.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Thirty-five hundred dollars, according to my recollection, is the salary of the principal solicitor. I am sorry that this bill should have assumed the aspect that it has in the opinion of Senators on the other side. There is nothing, so far as I am advised, or have any intimation, of a political or partisan character about it. The object of the bill is to improve the public service. It has been a matter of frequent conversation among the members of the Judiciary Committee, and I think the Senator from Indiana must be aware of it, that there are inconveniences arising from the division of what properly belongs to the Attorney General's office, among the various Departments of the Government. I know my attention has been often called to the fact that we have solicitors in the different Departments, and different opinions are given out by these solicitors, often in conflict, and the public service has suffered from that inconvenience; but this particular matter that is now under consideration relates to the Court of Claims chiefly, dispenses with an Assistant Attorney General—

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator did not hear my remarks. I said that the subject of the reorganization of the Attorney General's department, bringing into that department all the law business of the Government, has been a matter of consideration in the Judiciary Committee, and I went on to say that I regarded it as a subject well worthy of our consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But this particular section provides for bringing the law business connected with the Court of Claims immediately within the control of the Attorney General. That is one step in the direction which the Senator from Indiana and I both think legislation ought to go. As the law now stands, the solicitors of the Court of Claims not only attend to the business in that court but also in the Supreme Court, and the Attorney General has declined to have anything to do in the Supreme Court of the United States with cases that have been appealed from the Court of Claims.

Then, again, it is known that the character of the business in the Court of Claims has become more important of late years, and it is desirable that we should have responsible solicitors there. The Attorney General of the United States is one of the members of the Cabinet, and is supposed to be one of the most eminent lawyers in the United States, at the head of the profession. A man of that character is ordinarily selected for that high position, while the solicitors of the Court of Claims are not always of that character. By having the Attorney General responsible for the business in that court it was thought an improvement to the public service would be effected.

That anybody is outside expecting these offices is wholly unknown to me, if such be the case. There is no use in disguising from the Senate or from ourselves the fact—I think the Senator from Indiana is aware of it—that there have been more or less complaints that the solicitors in the Court of Claims were not the persons that it would be desirable to have there. I believe that the gentlemen occupying those positions are very respectable gentlemen, and I have no complaint to make of them; but it must be remembered that they meet in that court the most eminent counsel in the United States; and the gentlemen who have occupied these positions in the Court of Claims, with a salary of three thousand or thirty-five hundred dollars a year, it could be expected, would be the most eminent counsel in the nation. And there have been more or less, if not complaints, apprehensions in the minds of different persons that the business of the Government and the rights of the Government were not protected as well as they ought to be in that court, because we did not have the responsibility that would attach to the Attorney General if he was made responsible for defending the Government before that tribunal. I think it would be an improvement to the public service; and as to nobody's wanting the offices, I know nothing about that; but I do know that the solicitors of that court have not been altogether satisfactory to the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I approve of the general object of the bill, because I believe that the amounts involved now in claims before this court are such as require the very highest legal ability to take care of properly; and we miss it very much when we hesitate about giving salaries that would command the services of very able counsel. We lose many thousands in the effort to save a few hundreds. Therefore, I think that it would be well to reorganize the Attorney General's office, and give the kind of aid that is required in order to take care of the business of the Government in the Court of Claims for many years to come. Even when the questions arising out of this war shall be disposed of, such is the growth of business in this country, such will be the great extent of it, that the bill, in my judgment, does not make any more provision than is necessary for meeting what we shall have to meet hereafter.

But I would suggest to the Senators who are urging the bill whether the present is not rather an unfortunate time to attempt to do this. I think if the bill could be passed at the next session so as to take effect on the 4th of March, 1869, or thereabouts, it would be likely to meet with more favor and likely to be more permanent. I think, with the honorable Senator from Indiana, that at the present time if we should pass this bill making this reorganization, we should probably meet with difficulties.

In the first place, when the bill is passed, I suppose the present solicitors go out of office. It takes considerable time, or it may take considerable time before the offices are filled, and in the meantime the business of the country connected with the Court of Claims would be likely to suffer very much; for we want men in attendance there constantly, while the court is in session, at least, in order to conduct the business and to take care of the interests of the country. From what we have experienced here, I ask Senators whether there would not be likely to be very considerable delay in filling these offices. We might not, and probably should not have the kind of appointments made that would be desirable or satisfactory to the Senate, and we might have a long delay before appointments could be had which would be satisfactory to the whole appointing power; and in the meantime the business of the country would suffer very much. In the present state of things, therefore, I doubt whether it would be advisable to pass those parts of the bill which refer to appointments, and whether it would not be better to confine it simply to the original provisions of the bill, those matters about which there is no dispute, and which do not involve the filling of important offices at the present time; or between now and the time when there will be a change of administration.

I make this suggestion to the Senator who has the bill in charge and to the friends of it, because I think really, in the existing state of things, it may be a very serious matter whether it would not be well to defer this portion of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend will permit me to say that there would be force in that if we only looked at those considerations alone; but the fact is that there is now pressing on through that court and up to the Supreme Court a great mass of claims of a very important character, both as to the amount and the principles involved, and there needs immediately to be put into the charge of the Attorney General the management of these cases; because we shall certainly have an Attorney General. We all expect that. The Government cannot get along much better without an Attorney General than without a Secretary of War. Some eminent person, some responsible and respectable lawyer of some party or other, will, undoubtedly, be appointed Attorney General within thirty days. I cannot permit myself to doubt that. I cannot presume, much as I differ with the President of the United States about a great many subjects, I cannot permit myself to presume that he will hesitate, within a reasonable time, to present such a man, if he has not already done so, and I have no right to say that he has not already done so, or that there is any nomination here; but I cannot think that he will hesitate to present to us such a name as the Senate will feel it to be its duty to confirm. We must assume that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. So far as that is concerned, as to merely putting the matter under the charge of the Attorney General, I presume no difficulty would arise and there would be no objection to a simple provision to that effect; but the bill, as I understand it, strikes at the present solicitors of the Court of Claims, and they go out of office when the bill is passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They go out of office on the 1st of July, when that branch of the bill goes into effect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How long might we be detained before we could fill the offices created by the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Presumably we ought not to be detained longer than would be necessary for the President of the United States to perform his duty of nominating suitable persons. Of course there is something in what my friend says as to the difficulty, but I think that difficulty will be out of the way by the necessity of action, because we shall have, as we now all agree, an Attorney General. He is the responsible person to whom this business is to be turned over. Then the question will be, can we appoint two Assistant Attorneys General. If we fail to appoint two Assistant Attorneys General, still the duty is reposed in the Attorney General himself to see that this business is attended to, and provision can be made, (as the law now permits the Secretary of the Treasury to assist in defending claims upon his Department,) arrangements can be made for such a difficulty as that. He will undoubtedly meet the temporary emergency in some way or other, because we put on him the responsibility, and he will feel it to be his duty, if assistance enough is not furnished him, to take the responsibility of employing counsel on his own account, trusting to the justice of Congress to make it good. If we shall come to such a difficulty as my friend suggests, I do not think there will be any practical danger about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not see that the Senator from Vermont gives us any assurance that the persons to be appointed as Assistant Attorneys General will be any better qualified to attend to the business of the United States in the Court of Claims than the present officers. What evidence have we that if we abolish these offices at this time, turn out the men who now perform the duties, some persons will be appointed who are better than they are? Judging from what has taken place, from our experience in the last two or three years, we are not to expect, it strikes me, any very great improvement in that respect; and I think myself there may be trouble, such as has been suggested by the Senator from Maine, in making this change. These men have been in office some time attending to this business. I do not know but that the country has suffered; but if it has, it can endure this suffering, it seems to me, until the 4th day of next March, when possibly, if a change is made, we can expect an improvement. But to undertake to remove these men from office at this time with an idea of having others appointed who are better, taking the chances of a disagreement between the President and the Senate as to their successors, it seems to me is not very politic or wise, and I must confess that the necessity of that course is not very obvious to me at this time.

I should favor this plan under other circumstances. If I had that confidence in the Executive which would induce me to believe that men eminent for their legal qualifications would be taken to fill these places, and not men distinguished for partisan fealty, then I should favor this plan; but according to my present apprehensions I doubt very much whether there would be anything gained by this change, and I do not like to see the experiment tried. As far as I know the men who attend to the business of the Government in the Court of Claims, they are very respectable gentlemen. Perhaps there has been some complaint made, but not more than is generally made of public officers, and I think that the country can stand the infliction of having these men fill these offices until the 4th of next March better than it can stand the experiment of a change at the hands of the President at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, as amended, to insert the proposed fifth section, and upon this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Before the vote is taken, I desire to say that I have received a note from a friend of Senator HARLAN requesting me to state that he is absent to-day in consequence of sickness, and that he hopes to be able to be present in the Senate in the course of a few days.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuyesen, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Doolittle, Fessenden, Hendricks, Howard, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Vickers, and Williams—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Davis, Dixon, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Johnson, Morton, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Sprague, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, and Wiley—19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to insert the following as section six:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall also be the duty of the said Attorney General and his assistants, in all cases brought against the United States in said Court of Claims founded upon any contract, agreement, or transaction with any executive Department, or any bureau, officer, or agent of such Department, or where the matter or thing on which the claim is based shall have been passed upon and decided by any Department, bureau, or officer intrusted by law or Department regulations with the settlement and adjustment of such claims, demands, or accounts, to transmit to said Department, bureau, or officer, as aforesaid, a printed copy of the petition filed by the claimant in such case, with a request that the said Department, bureau, or officer to whom the same shall be so transmitted as aforesaid, will furnish to said Attorney General all facts, circumstances, and evidence touching said claim as is or may be in the possession or knowledge of the said Department, bureau, or officer; and it shall be the duty of the said Department, bureau, or officer to whom such petition may be transmitted and such request preferred as aforesaid, without delay, and within a reasonable time, to furnish said Attorney General with a full statement of all the facts, information, and proofs which are or may be within the knowledge or in the possession of said Department, bureau, or officer, relating to the claim aforesaid. Such statement shall also contain a reference to or description of all official documents or papers, if any, as may or do furnish proof of facts referred to in said statement, or that may be necessary and proper for the defense of the United States against the said claim, together with the Department, office, or place where the same is kept or may be procured. And if the said claim shall have been passed upon and decided by the said Department, bureau, or officer, the statement or answer to be transmitted to said Attorney General, as hereinbefore provided, shall succinctly state the reasons and principles upon which such decision shall have been based. In all cases where such decision shall have been made upon any act of Congress, or upon any section or clause of such act, the same shall be cited specifically. And if any previous interpretation or construction shall have been given to such act, section, or clause by the said Department or bureau transmitting such statement, the same shall be set forth, succinctly in said statement, and a copy of the opinion filed, if any, shall be annexed to such statement and transmitted with the same to the Attorney General aforesaid. And where any decision in the case shall have been based upon any regulation of an executive Department, or whose such regulation shall or may, in the opinion of the Department, bureau, or officer transmitting such statement, have any bearing upon the claim in suit, the same shall be distinctly referred to and quoted in extenso in the statement transmitted to said Attorney General: Provided, however, That where there shall be pending in the said court more than one case, or a class of cases, the defense to which shall rest upon the same facts, circumstances, and proofs, the said Department, bureau, or officer shall only be required to certify and transmit one statement of the same, and such statement shall be held to apply to all such classes of cases as if made out, certified, and transmitted in each case respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section seven:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the head of any executive Department, whenever any claim is made upon said Department, involving disputed facts or controverted questions of law, where the amount in controversy exceeds $3,000, or where the decision will affect a class of cases or furnish a precedent for the future action of any executive Department in the adjustment of a class of cases, without regard to the amount involved in the particular case, or where any authority, right, privilege, or exemption is claimed or denied under the Constitution of the United States, to cause such claim, with all the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims, and the same shall be there proceeded in as if originally commenced by the voluntary action of the claimant. And the Secretary of the Treasury may, upon the certificate of any Auditor or Comptroller of the Treasury, direct any account, matter, or claim of the character, amount, or class described or limited in this section to be transmitted, with all the vouchers, papers, documents, and proofs pertaining thereto, to the said Court of Claims, for trial and adjudication: Provided, however, That no case shall be referred by any head of a Department unless it belongs to one of the several classes of cases as to which, by reason of the subject-matter and character, the said Court of Claims might, under existing laws, take jurisdiction on such voluntary action of the claimant. And all the cases mentioned in this section which shall be transmitted by the head of any executive Department, or upon the certificate of any Auditor or Comptroller, shall be proceeded in as other cases pending in said court, and shall, in all respects, be subject to the same rules and regulations; and appeals from the final judgments or decrees of the said court therein to the Supreme Court of the United States shall be allowed in the manner now provided by law. The amount of the final judgments or decrees in such cases so transmitted to said court, where rendered in favor of the claimants, shall in all cases be paid out of any specific appropriation applicable to the same if any such there be; and where no such appropriation exists the same shall be paid in the same manner as other judgments of said court.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont what particular necessity there is for this seventh section? I confess that I know of no facts which seem to require the passage of such a provision of law as this. It seems to me that it will tend to relieve, in a very great degree, the heads of the Executive Departments and the heads of bureaus from the just responsibilities which they are bound to discharge by their appointments. Under this section the head of any executive Department, and I think the head of any bureau, is authorized to transfer any claim which may come into his possession for consideration to the Court of Claims, and instead of deciding it himself, turn the whole matter over to the judges of the Court of Claims, and have it decided there. All claims may be thus disposed of that involve an amount greater than $3,000. What is the necessity for this? Why relieve the head of an executive Department or the head of a bureau of the ordinary administrative duties which devolve on him, and turn those duties over to the Court of Claims, thus driving the claimant into court and compelling him to employ counsel there and submit to all the inconvenience and delay and expense of litigation, when the facts in the case or the law in the case might as well be determined by the head of the Department or of the bureau, as by the Court of Claims? I should like to hear some explanation of the necessity of this provision. Are there any complaints in the Departments or in the bureaus that they are overburdened with this description of duties?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am glad to be able to satisfy my friend from Michigan, as I think I can, as to the propriety of this seventh section. The spirit and object of it is to change the present system by which a Secretary of an executive Department has a subordinate of his pass upon a disputed claim, controverted questions of law and fact, subject to the ex parte pressure that we know is always brought to bear by the applicant upon that subordinate, that clerk or head of a bureau or of a division or whatever he may be, which leads to his making a report to the Secretary that does not properly present those facts which are controverted or the law which is disputed, thus producing a decision adverse to the United States by the head of the Department who orders a claim to be paid, when if the subject had been contested before a board of lawyers or commissioners or judges, as this section provides, where counsel for the United States could be heard, where every influence which should be brought to bear should be an open and public one in a court, the result might have been entirely different. That was the object of this section, to relieve the Government from the inroads that are now being made upon it through the Departments where the Secretary of the Department is not responsible at all, because he cannot with his time—and I do not speak of any one in particular; none of them can—he cannot with his time himself go into a minute examination of all the disputed claims that are presented. He is, therefore, obliged to rely upon his head of bureau, and the head of bureau is obliged to rely upon the clerk there who makes report to him; and consequently if you get the least amount of undue influence in the original examination by some clerk of a large claim that depends upon disputed facts or controverted law you are in danger (and practice has shown that it is not a light danger) of having the head of an executive Department finally allow a claim against the Government when, if it had been subjected to a contested investigation in a public way, it would not have stood a minute.

We thought, therefore, that it was wise and proper, under every consideration that presented itself to us, to authorize the Secretaries of the various Executive Departments to send these large controverted claims above $3,000 to the Court of Claims. We did not want to put every claimant to the expense of going to the Court of Claims; but those claims which are of a considerable amount we think should be sent to a tribunal where, if there is a real controversy, there will be a real defense before persons of skill, ability, and respectability. That is the theory of it. I speak with deference to my friend from Michigan; I think it ought to be satisfactory to him.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, certainly the honorable Senator from Vermont has made out as good an excuse as could well be framed for this very anomalous section in the bill, and he is entitled to great credit for the ingenuity which he has displayed. But I am really not able to appreciate it. This Government has been in operation since 1789, and we have never had any such arrangement in the administrative Departments of the Government as is contemplated in this seventh section. It is an entire anomaly, and I believe that it has no example and no precedent in any Government in the world, free or otherwise. What is it, sir? Simply this: where there is a claimant prosecuting a claim before the head of an executive Department or the head of a bureau of the Government, which amounts to more than three thousand dollars, it is discretionary in the head of the Department or bureau to transfer the claim for adjudication to the Court of Claims. He may exercise this discretion without the slightest reference to the convenience of the claimant. The claimant's hands are tied; he cannot ask to have the claim thus transferred for adjudication; he has no right to say a word about it; he is bound hand and foot by the law. But if the head of the Department sees fit to turn him out of the Department and send him into the Court of Claims he must go there, and there he must prosecute his claim. It is not mutual, therefore. While it relieves the officers of the Government of some duties, which undoubtedly are at times onerous and difficult, it gives to the claimant by no means the benefit of taking his case before an impartial judicial tribunal for adjudication and settlement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend permit me to correct him?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly, if I am in error.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The claimant has a perfect right to go to the Court of Claims, as well as the Secretary, by the general law.

Mr. HOWARD. Can he transfer his claim from the Department and bring it into the Court of Claims?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; and he most generally sues there after being beaten in the Department, if he chooses to go there at all.

Mr. HOWARD. My objection is mainly that this unnecessarily seeks to relieve the officers of the Government from the discharge of their duties and enables them to shirk responsibilities which are justly imposed upon them by the law. I move to strike out the seventh section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order. The question is on agreeing to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to insert the seventh section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move now to insert after the seventh section the following amendment, to come in as section eight:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no person shall file or prosecute any claim or suit in the Court of Claims, or an appeal therefrom, for or in respect to which he or any assignee of his shall have commenced and has pending, or shall commence and have pending, any suit or process in any other court against any officer or person who, at the time the cause as above alleged in such suit or process arose, was in respect thereto acting or professing to act, mediately or immediately, under the authority of the United States, unless such suit or process, if now pending in such other court, shall be withdrawn or dismissed within thirty days next after the passage of this act.

The object of this amendment is to put to their election that large class of persons having cotton claims particularly, who have sued the Secretary of the Treasury and the other agents of the Government in more than a hundred suits that are now pending, scattered over the country here and there, and who are here at the same time endeavoring to prosecute their claims, and have filed them in the Court of Claims, so that after they put the Government to the expense of beating them once in a court of law they can turn around and try the whole question in the Court of Claims. The object is to put that class of persons to their election either to leave the Court of Claims or to leave the other courts. I am sure everybody will agree to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert the following as section nine:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all provisions of any act incompatible herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS subsequently said: I ask the consent of the Senate to submit a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the Court of Claims bill. My friend from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] being out at the moment of its passage, wishes to propose a mere verbal amendment which leaves the bill, as I construe it and I believe as he does, just as it is now; but he desires to offer it to avoid a misconception.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is reconsidered. The vote by which the bill was passed to a third reading will also be reconsidered by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment can be made by unanimous consent without that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is reconsidered on its third reading.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, I move to amend the bill by adding the following to the second section:

But until an order is made staying the payment of a judgment, the same shall be payable and paid as now provided by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

PURCHASE OF VESSELS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of J. M. Schofield, Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of January 20, 1868, information relative to the purchase and sale of vessels by the War Department during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. WILSON. I move that that communication be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does that carry with it the proposition to print the papers sent in?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No proposition to print has been made.

Mr. WILSON. The committee will look into them, and report as to printing.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask leave to report certain amendments from the Committee on Finance to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with a view that they may be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations under the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. WILSON. I move now to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 598) to continue the Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUCKALEW called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Doolittle, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, and Vickers—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sprague, Thayer, and Trumbull—17.

So the motion was agreed to, and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is provided in the first section that the act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees," approved March 3, 1865, and the act entitled "An act to continue in force and amend 'An act to establish a Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes,'" passed on the 16th of July, 1866, shall continue in force for the term of one year from and after the 16th of July, 1868, excepting so far as herein modified. The Secretary of War is directed to reestablish the bureau where the same has been wholly or in part discontinued, if he shall be satisfied that the personal safety of freedmen shall require it.

Section two makes it the duty of the Secretary of War to discontinue the operations of the bureau in any State whenever such State shall be fully restored in its constitutional relations with the Government of the United States, and shall be duly represented in the Congress of the United States, unless upon advising with the commissioner of the bureau, and upon full consideration of the condition of freedmen's affairs in such State, the Secretary of War shall be of opinion that the further continuance of the bureau shall be necessary. But the educational division of the bureau is not to be affected, or in any way interfered with, until such State shall have made suitable provision for the education of the children of freedmen within the State.

The third section provides that unexpended balances in the hands of the commissioner, not required otherwise for the due execution of the law, may be, in his discretion, applied for the education of freedmen and refugees, subject to the provisions of law applicable thereto.

Section four provides that officers of the Veteran Reserve corps or of the volunteer service, now on duty in the Freedmen's Bureau as assistant commissioners, agents, medical officers, or in other capacities, who have been or may be mustered out of service, may be retained by the commissioner, when they shall be required for the proper execution of the laws, as officers of the bureau, upon such duty and with the same pay, compensation, and all allowances, from the date of their appointment as now provided by law for their respective grades and duties at the dates of their muster out and discharge; and such officers so retained shall have, respectively, the same authority and jurisdiction as now conferred upon "officers of the bureau" by act of Congress passed on the 16th of July, 1866.

An amendment was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to add to the bill the following additional section:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the commissioner is hereby empowered to sell for cash or by installments, with ample security, school buildings and other buildings constructed for refugees and freedmen by the bureau, to the associations, corporate bodies, or trustees who now use them for purposes of education or relief of want, under suitable guarantees that the purposes for which such buildings were constructed shall be observed: Provided, That all funds derived therefrom shall be returned to the bureau appropriation and accounted for to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to look at this bill a little. It has been impossible for me to do so. If the Senator from Massachusetts does not care to press it to a passage to-night, I should like very much that he would consent to let it lie over until to-morrow. I did not know that it was to be called up to-day, or I should have looked into it.

Mr. WILSON. I am very anxious to have the bill passed. I certainly do not wish to press a matter improperly on the Senate; but the bill has been here for some time, and it is necessary that it should be passed this week. To-morrow we are to take up, I understand, the bill reported this morning from the Judiciary Committee. I should be glad if we could get this bill through to-day, if possible. At any rate I should like to have the amendment acted upon, if the Senator will allow that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not object to the consideration of the bill in committee if when it comes into the Senate the Senator will then consent to let it go over.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Massachusetts is not disposed to press this bill this afternoon, I am exceedingly anxious to take up the bill to remove political disabilities from Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee. It is a bill that ought certainly to be disposed of. It involves the right of a member of the other House to a seat. I had it before the Senate once or twice, and I think it will not take very long to dispose of it.

Mr. WILSON. I wish Senators would let us act on this amendment, and then when we reach the general provisions of the bill I will consent to let it go over.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will not object to that. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that rather an extraordinary amendment, and I should like to hear some explanation of it. It would seem to me that the school-houses which have been constructed at the public expense ought to remain public buildings permanently for the purposes for which they were constructed. If they were constructed as school-houses for the colored children then they should remain public buildings for that purpose. It would seem to me that some provision declaring them public buildings for such purpose would be better than a bill to sell them; but I suppose the committee have considered that, and I would like to hear the reasons. Who are to become purchasers? What societies or organizations are referred to in this section? How permanent are these organizations? Into what charge and under what control will these buildings fall? These are some of the questions that it seems to me the Senate ought to be informed upon.

Mr. WILSON. Most of these buildings have been erected by the bureau, or the bureau has aided in their erection, and they are occupied, to a great extent, by schools, supported in part by associations and societies, and by contributions raised in the loyal portions of the country. A great part of the educational establishment in the southern section of the country is supported by these contributions. There are now about thirty-seven hundred freedmen's schools in all supported in this way and about two hundred and forty thousand scholars. There are some two or three hundred—I cannot tell the exact number—buildings that have been erected by the bureau. The object is to allow the commissioner to work out of this system. We propose to extend the bureau one year, and during that year to work out, as far as we can, from all connection with education or anything else that concerns the local affairs of the States. The object is to sell the school-houses that have been erected to these societies and associations or persons interested in education and who are teaching schools in them, and to put the money into support of the bureau, and finally into the Treasury if it is not used for that purpose.

Then there are some buildings which have been erected out of property of the Government purchased at cheap rates. Some have been erected in this city; some may be seen south of the Capitol, erected out of barracks purchased at sales of Government property at cheap rates. It is proposed to sell these buildings for cash, or to sell them on credit, and secured so that they will go into the hands of the persons who occupy them and who can pay for them. It is believed by the commissioner that by this system the Government can work out of the expense incurred, and little loss will accrue to any one, and great benefit to the cause of education and relief to those persons who occupy and desire to purchase the buildings that have been so erected.

I have no doubt that the adoption of this amendment will enable the bureau to work itself out of these expenditures with very little if any loss of the cost of the buildings that have been erected. Those which are school-houses will be used for the purposes of education, and those that are rented out, as they are mostly, will be used as they are now used, and a little credit given to those persons will enable them to purchase them rather than throw them into the hands of capitalists who will turn these people out of employment and tear down the buildings. They are mostly cheap buildings and cost very little.

I hope the amendment will be adopted. General Howard is exceedingly anxious that it shall be adopted. He believes it will be of great benefit to adopt it in this form. The money derived from it it is provided shall go into the Treasury.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) This motion cannot be debated.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. YATES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 357.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a bill before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall take a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Now the bill may go over.

Mr. YATES. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 357.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would like to know what that is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a bill before the Senate. Does the Senator move to postpone it?

Mr. YATES. Yes, sir; I move to postpone it, and take up the bill for the establishment of a territorial government for Wyoming.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves that the further consideration of the bill before the Senate be postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I dislike to interfere with the Senator from Illinois; but I desire to suggest to the Senate that a bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations yesterday to supply certain deficiencies, among which is an item for expenses in the collection of the revenue, which has lain a long time in the other House, and about which there is the most exigent necessity that it should pass immediately. I trust my friend from Illinois will allow me to call up that bill. It will not occupy much time.

Mr. YATES. This bill will only occupy a few moments, and it is important that it should be passed now. The Committee on Territories have had no part of the attention of the Senate at this session. The committee is unanimous in regard to this bill, and I think there will be no objection to its passage.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senate will see; I think, that the bill to which I ask their attention is of very pressing necessity, and it occurs to me that the other matter may well go over until to-morrow. I do not think this bill will occupy more than twenty minutes of the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on postponing the further consideration of the bill to continue the Freedmen's Bureau until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCIES IN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. YATES. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 357, to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On that question I feel called upon to make a statement to the Senate. The bill which I wish to have considered is one that has lain in the House since March.

Mr. YATES. I will consent to the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1117.

Mr. YATES. Let the territorial bill be taken up first, and then it can be passed by informally.

Mr. NYE. I hope that will be done.

Mr. CONNESS. That is taking a lien on the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to take up Senate bill No. 357.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and will be read.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The understanding was that that bill was to be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be laid aside informally if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1117.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1117) to supply partial deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending on the 30th June, 1868. The bill proposes to appropriate the following sums: to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1868, namely: for compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others, receiving an annual salary in the service of the House of Representatives, $12,960; for folding documents, including materials, $25,000; for miscellaneous items, $10,000; to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, for the half year ending June 30, 1868, $1,800,000; to facilitate the payment of soldiers' bounties in accordance with provisions of acts of July 28, 1866, and March 19, 1868, for salaries of fifty clerks of class one, $60,000; to supply a deficiency in the office of the Paymaster General for blank books, stationery, binding, and other contingent expenses, $5,000.

The Committee on Appropriations reported several amendments to the bill. The first amendment was to add at the end of the bill the following:

For deficiency in the appropriation for defraying the expense of hydration of the Senate Chamber, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the bill the following:

For deficiency in the appropriation for stationery, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the bill the following:

For deficiency in the appropriation for furniture and repairs, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the bill the following:

For deficiency in the appropriation for clerks to committees, pages, horses and carriages, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the amendments reported by the committee. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. HOWE. There is a clause in this bill with which I am not at all satisfied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator propose an amendment?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir. I move to strike out lines fifteen, sixteen, seventeen, and eighteen, in these words:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, for the half year ending June 30, 1868, $1,800,000.

I have but a few words to say about the amendment, simply because I do not know much about it, and I think I must be excused for not knowing much about it, for the Treasury Department, from which this recommendation comes, seem to know just as little as I do. They tell us that in 1858 there was an appropriation made to defray the expenses of collecting this revenue, an annual appropriation of $3,600,000. That sum, it seems, sufficed to pay these expenditures up to 1866. In 1866 Congress increased the appropriation to $4,200,000, if I remember the sum aright, and I think I do, and added to that sum whatever was received from fines and penalties in the administration of the customs laws. That act passed in May, 1866. Now we are told that the Department has added to the sum appropriated by law during the last year, which is $4,200,000, with fines and penalties added, and I think they amount to about six hundred thousand dollars, $1,200,000 derived by transfer from other appropriations, and yet they ask in these last months of the fiscal year an appropriation of $1,800,000 to pay deficiencies. When asked to explain how this deficiency arose, they say that in 1866 the Government undertook to supply stationery, which before had been purchased by the collectors out of their own funds, and authorized the employment of an additional number of officers, but do not say what number, and that Congress confided to the discretion of the head of the Department the adjusting of certain salaries, the salaries of inspectors and the higher class of clerks. The Department does not tell us to what extent either of these changes in the law increased the cost of collecting the revenue; but it does happen that by reason of these three items the expenditure for the last year is three full millions more than it had been up to 1866, almost one hundred per cent. more than it was up to that date.

There is a suggestion from the Department that the revenue service has been attended by greater difficulties the past year and by greater expenditures than formerly. What those difficulties or expenditures are we are not told. Why they should be any greater than they were prior to 1866 we are not told, and I cannot imagine; but $3,600,000 a year covered the whole expense up to 1866; and during the present year they want, not only that sum, but about six hundred thousand dollars arising from fines and penalties, and $1,200,000 received by way of transfer from other appropriations, and now they ask a deficiency of $1,800,000. If the Senate is content to vote this additional appropriation, of course I cannot have any more objection to it than any other citizen; but if such deficiencies are voted without any explanation, there is not the slightest sense, it seems to me, in pretending to put any lock on the Treasury. I do not see why we might not just as well throw the doors wide open and allow the head of that Department to help himself, only exacting a promise from him that he shall not take any more than he wants. That is all the condition, it seems to me, it is worth while to impose upon him. I do not know that there has not been a necessity for this expenditure. If there has been, it is not explained. The Department has been called on for the explanation, and I felt it to be my duty to call the attention of the Senate to it, and to move to strike out this appropriation. Having done that I shall be content with the action of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ought to say a word or two in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin, although I have not the information to enable me to say precisely to the Senate how this deficiency occurs. But one general fact perhaps will arrest the attention of the Senate; and that is, that this deficiency does exist; it is certified to exist by the Secretary of the Treasury; and of course it must be met in some way. Whether it is satisfactorily accounted for to the Senate is another question. Nobody questions, I believe, that there is that amount of deficiency existing in this particular branch of the public service. I agree entirely with the Senator from Wisconsin, that it does not appear clearly to the committee, from anything we had before us, precisely how that deficiency occurred. In a general way it is accounted for. It is said that we are collecting very much more revenue from this source than formerly. That is one mode of accounting for it. Another is that since the war and the opening of the southern ports very large additional expenses have been incurred by the Department, which were not anticipated. Then, through the provisions of recent revenue laws, very large additional duties have been imposed upon that branch of the service; and that out of these general facts arose the deficiency. Of course the Committee on Appropriations did not think it their duty to inquire into the expenditure of the appropriations made for this particular branch of the service. That is not a duty which we understand to be devolved on the Committee on Appropriations. Having ascertained that a deficiency does exist, and that this branch of the service is a legitimate one, the duty of the Committee on Appropriations is discharged perhaps when it has ascertained the amount necessary to cover that deficiency.

But, sir, I have a communication addressed to the committee, which in a general way undertakes to account for the deficiency, which I will send to the Clerk, and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The communication will be read if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 29, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, asking in behalf of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, an explanation of the deficiency of $1,800,000 existing in the appropriation for collecting the revenue from customs.

Previous to May 3, 1866, there was a standing annual appropriation of $3,600,000—fixed by law in 1858, (11 Statutes, 337,) at a time when the receipts from customs for five years had averaged but little more than fifty-five million dollars annually—amounting to about six and a half per cent. upon the collections. All transactions being on a coin basis; and the value of importations in 1858, $282,613,150.

The high tariff of the war both involved a direct increase of expenditure for collection, and by giving an instant stimulus to illicit traffic, added to the difficulty and expense of protecting the revenue. For a while some degree of compensation was found in the decrease of expenses at the South, but later the heavy expense of reopened ports enhanced by high prices, and accompanied by a continued advance in all prices throughout the country necessitated the enlargement of the appropriation, which was accomplished to the extent of $600,000 per year in addition to fines, penalties, &c., by the joint resolution of May 3, 1866, (14 Statutes, 334.) In the preceding year the collections had been $84,923,260, (coin,) of which the appropriation for expenses thus made was a little more than five per cent. currency.

Very soon after the date of this resolution a series of laws were enacted adding largely to the expenses chargeable to the appropriation, namely, the acts of 27th (14 Statutes, 302) and 28th (14 Statutes, 308) July, 1866, increasing certain salaries, the fifth section (14 Statutes, 309) of the act of the last-mentioned date requiring stationery for custom-houses to be paid for from the customs fund—an expense previously borne from the emoluments of the collectors—the forty-third section (14 Statutes, 188, eleventh line of section) of the act of 18th July, 1866, authorizing the employment of a greater number of employes at the several ports, and the thirty-third (14 Statutes, 186) section of the same act empowering the Department to pay certain incidental expenses at custom-houses previously borne by collectors.

These sources of expenditure were, of course, for the most part unexpected by the Department at the time of recommending the sum fixed by the resolution of May, 1866. And it has naturally followed that the appropriation has proved insufficient each year.

The Department, moreover, driven by necessity to make more liberal provision for that class of employes whose compensation was discretionary with the Secretary, and guided by the views and action of Congress in respect to the higher officers of the same service, has found it necessary from time to time to increase the pay of inspectors and other subordinate officers. The condition of prices, both of necessities and of labor, is too well known to need that I should explain more fully the grounds of such action.

The same causes have steadily increased the expenses of the revenue-cutter service until they amount at present to upwards of thirteen hundred thousand dollars. Of this charge it was last year recommended that the customs fund should be freed by a distinct appropriation; but the measure, though favorably viewed by the committees and passed by one House, failed in the other from want of time. The amount of deficiency chargeable to the other particular heads it is impossible to state, the accounts never having been kept with that view.

There have been similar deficiencies in previous years, and there existed at the beginning of the current year a deficiency of $500,000, which, of course, forms a part of the deficiency of the year. A portion of the deficiency—$1,200,000—has been provided for by transfer from other appropriations, but the sum of $1,800,000 remains, without which it will be impossible to meet the indispensable requirements of the service.

I would call attention to the fact that under all disadvantages the expenses are much less in proportion to the collections than in 1858, as seen upon page 1 herein.

The coin value of imports was in 1866 and 1867 an annual average of $428,000,000, against $382,000,000 in 1858, and for three years past the collections have been an annual average of $172,000,000 coin, equivalent to $240,000,000 currency at current rates, of which the expense of collection, ($7,800,000 less, $500,000 old debt, namely, $7,300,000) is but a fraction over three per cent. against six and a half per cent. in 1858.

Permit me to say, in conclusion, that for two months past the Department has been unable to meet the expenditures of the service, either for salaries or other items, and respectfully to urge the great importance of early and favorable action upon the bill now before the committee.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

HUGH McCULLOCH,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. L. M. MORRILL,

Chairman Committee on Appropriations, Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I am reminded by the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the committee, that I did not do quite justice to the Treasury Department when I undertook to state the reasons assigned for this deficiency. I did not enumerate the whole of them. The Secretary in that letter, I remember now, does urge, among those reasons, the fact that the southern ports had been opened, and that the opening of them had been attended, of course, with considerable expense; but I was of the impression that those southern ports were opened some time previous to the commencement of the present fiscal year. It should be borne in mind that the Secretary is explaining what has occasioned this enormous increase in the expense of collecting the customs during the present fiscal year, and he assigns the opening of the southern ports as among those reasons. The war closed in 1865, as I have been told; those ports, I suppose, must have been opened soon after that; and this fiscal year commenced on the 1st of July, 1867, more than two years after the war closed. The war closed and the southern ports were opened before this law of 1866 passed. The war closed and the southern ports were open while the customs of the country were being collected at an expenditure of $3,600,000. This year the Department uses $7,800,000. I said almost one hundred per cent. more. You see I very much understated it. It is more than one hundred per cent. on the expenditures of the years prior to May 3, 1866.

The Secretary urges the fact that larger sums are collected now than was the case prior to the war, or than was the case ordinarily during the war. Mr. President, do you think the Secretary of the Treasury meets the American Congress fairly, or the American people fairly, when he undertakes to argue that the expenditures of that branch of the service are in proportion to the amount received? Is that a fair argument to address to us? Is it an honest argument to address to us? Why, sir, almost the entire revenue of the country is collected in half a dozen different ports—much the largest portion of it is collected at one.

My friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] reminds me that we have a larger force. The Secretary says we have a larger force; but he knows just how much larger, and he knows just how much that adds to the expense of the service. But my friend from Vermont does not mean to intimate that the force has been doubled since May, 1866, nor that it has been increased ten per cent. since 1866. If you have added a given number of clerks to the staff of the custom-houses in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and San Francisco, you know what their salaries are. I do not. The Secretary knows, and he could have told us.

But not content with giving this little item of specific information, which is at his hands and not so readily at ours, he prefers to submit to us an argument that he is getting so many millions more from the customs this year than was ordinarily the case prior to 1866. Nay, he goes further than that; he submits an argument in the paper which has just been read at the desk, as if he were entitled to the same percentage, not only on the coin collected, but on the exchange of that coin into currency. He submits an argument here as if it cost him the same percentage to collect $100,000,000 in New York that it ought to cost to collect $50,000,000, and then if it costs the same percentage you are to change that into currency, as if he ought to have, to meet the expenses of the customs department, the same commission for the difference between the value of that coin and its value in currency. And that comes from the Secretary of the Treasury; that comes from the financial minister of the United States; and it is upon his simple recommendation, his simple assertion that he wants this additional sum; I say again, more than one hundred per cent. of the expenditures prior to 1866. But the Senate, I take it, is entirely willing to vote it, and I suppose if he had asked four times that sum the Senate would have been entirely willing to vote it, upon no theory in the world that I can understand except that it comes from the financial minister, who cannot be wrong!

He gives another reason, and that is, the high prices which have prevailed through the country. I am not aware, as matter of fact, that prices are higher now than they were in 1866, when this law was passed. I am not aware that prices throughout the country are higher during the present fiscal year than they were during the fiscal year preceding. They are not so high as they were prior to 1866. But, in the name of wonder, what has the Secretary of the Treasury to do with high prices, I should like to know? How do they affect the expense of collecting the revenue from customs? He employs so many clerks in New York; so many in Boston; he has so many employes engaged in this service. If he paid them such salary and found them, he could talk about the high prices and their effect upon the expenditure of that branch of the service; but, I take it, he does not clothe or feed the employes under the Treasury Department. It may be hard for them to have to live on the same salaries that they had before the war; but that is a consideration between them and the Government. If the Government has increased their salaries, that increase can be stated, and the Secretary should have stated it to us.

Mr. President, if there were no reasons to suspect the justice and propriety of this demand but just those reasons which are assigned by the Secretary for it, I should think the Senate would hesitate long before they would vote the appropriation. I cannot help but think they are very unfair and irrational considerations to address to the Legislature; and it was because of the extraordinary character of these reasons, as much as because of the extraordinary character of the demand itself that I was led to interest myself enough in the subject to submit the matter to the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There are, perhaps, one or two items to which I ought to call the attention of the Senate as going to explain this deficiency. The general appropriation for this service is $4,200,000 by the resolution of 1866.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the whole amount? Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is $7,300,000. The whole sum is $7,800,000, but $500,000 of that is for the expenses of the former year; so that the expenses proper of this year, the year ending June 30, 1868, will be $7,300,000. It should be remembered that taken from that is the expense of the revenue-cutter service, which is a distinct service, and that is about one million two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator does not mean by saying that it is a distinct service, that it is distinct in contemplation by law as existing prior to that time?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir; I mean to say covered by general appropriation. I only make that statement by way of explaining what is stated in the Secretary's letters where he complains that his recommendation of last year, by which he would have had that service charged upon some other fund, was not agreed to by Congress.

Mr. HOWE. That would have been a reason for reducing the appropriation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Secretary makes his estimate in this way: he says the standing appropriation by the resolution of 1866 was $4,200,000. Then is added to that $600,000 received by way of forfeitures and penalties; and then by a transfer from appropriations, $1,200,000, making $6,000,000 which has been received for the service for the current year, leaving a deficiency of $1,800,000, out of which $500,000 is necessary to pay the debts of last year; so that the deficiency now, independent of that, is $1,800,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask for information, what was the appropriation for collecting the revenue from the customs for the year 1868?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It was $4,200,000; that is all; except that by provision of law the service was entitled to what should be collected from fines, penalties, &c., which amounted to $600,000 more. That was the entire appropriation, as anybody will see, apparently an inadequate appropriation, and a deficiency under these circumstances was very likely to occur.

Now, the deficiency has occurred. That is a dead certainty. That is certified to us here. Nobody questions it. Has it legitimately occurred? That is a question which I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin cannot be demonstrated by the evidence we have. He thinks it ought to be demonstrated. That would take more time than the Committee on Appropriations have to examine it. Have we gone far enough to show that it is probable that the deficiency is legitimate? If so, then the Senate can safely vote it. The reasons are set out generally in the letter of the Secretary—the large increase of the service, the extraordinary duties imposed by certain acts of Congress, and the large increase of salaries growing out of a discretion put upon the Secretary, and which he says, following the example set by Congress, he has deemed it proper to exercise. There is another item, and that is the opening of the southern ports. Although the war ceased, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, at an earlier period, yet I believe the fact is that those ports were not opened—certainly not in whole—until within the current year, so that the largest expense would fall upon this year. These are some of the general reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for this deficiency. Do they render it probable to the Senate that the deficiency has honestly occurred? If so, then the Senate has information which would seem to me to justify this appropriation. This is all the information I have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the amendment be reported again.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to strike out the following clause:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the half year ending June 30, 1868, $1,800,000.

Mr. HOWE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 5, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Howard, Howe, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, and Williams—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Johnson, Nye, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wiley, and Yates—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Chandler, Davis, Dixon, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Wade, and Wilson—18.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to ask my friend, the chairman of the committee, whether this bill covers an appropriation of $5,000 for additional clerical assistance in the Department of State?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It does not; but another bill now before the committee does.

Mr. SUMNER. When does the Senator expect action on the other bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very soon.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: A bill partially to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending on the 30th June, 1868.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating a report from the Secretary of State, accompanied by a dispatch from the acting United States consul in charge of the United States legation in Costa Rica, in relation to a new port at Tivives, in the Gulf of Nicoya, on the Pacific coast; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DRAKE. My colleague [Mr. HENDERSON] has been obliged by the calls of business to go to his home, and I ask on his behalf leave of absence for eight days.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CONNESS. The bill of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] is now before the Senate, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill taken up on motion of the Senator from Illinois is before the Senate, and will be read through, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONNESS. I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California.

Mr. CONNESS. That was the motion I intended to make. I do not know any reason why the floor should be taken from me by my modest friend from New Jersey. [Laughter.] I was going to state to the Senate, and also to the honorable Senator from Illinois, that it was evident that we could not get through with his bill to-night, and it would be in order first to-morrow, and there is some business that I very much desire to call up in executive session, and therefore I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business. I hope my friend from Illinois will agree to that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from California will allow me, I desire to make a statement. We have just received the printed bill with regard to the recognition of the other southern States, and I design to move to bring that up at one o'clock to-morrow. I hope this other bill will not interfere with it.

Mr. CONNESS. I think that will keep until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business, and that motion is not debatable.

Mr. CATTELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up a bill for the purpose of reference only. It will not take a single minute.

Mr. CONNESS. I believe no debate is in order on a motion for an executive session.

Mr. CATTELL. I do not propose to debate it, but, by the courtesy of the gentleman from California, to call up a bill for reference.

Mr. CONNESS. That will put the other bill aside.

Mr. CATTELL. Not at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL REFERRED.

Mr. CATTELL. While the doors are being closed I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up House bill No. 1068 for reference.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 1068) to provide for certain claims against the Department of Agriculture was taken up.

Mr. CATTELL. I now move its reference to the Committee on Appropriations. The motion was agreed to.

JOHN M. PALMER.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the first and disagreed to the second amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 118) for the relief of John M. Palmer, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. AMASA COBB of Wisconsin, Mr. WILLIAM B. WASHBURN of Massachusetts, and Mr. W. S. HOLMAN of Indiana, managers at the same on its part.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment disagreed to by the House to the said joint resolution; and

On motion of Mr. WILLEY, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment to the said joint resolution disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. WILLEY, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. MORRILL of Vermont.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 2, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ELECTIONS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the General of the Army, transmitting, in further answer to House resolution of the 13th ultimo, a report by General Meade, commanding third military district, relative to recent elections under reconstruction laws in the State of Georgia; also two general orders of General Canby, commanding second military district, relative to elections in North and South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON EDUCATION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of Education, transmitting, in compliance with the act of March 2, 1867, his annual report; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that five thousand extra copies of this document be printed.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be referred under the law to the Committee on Printing.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOUTWELL and Mr. BINGHAM obtained leave of absence for ten days, and Mr. ORTH for two weeks.

ELECTION CONTEST—M'KEE VS. YOUNG.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, submitted a report from a minority of the Committee of Elections in the case of McKee vs. Young, from the ninth congressional district of Kentucky; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CONFEDERATE PROPERTY ABROAD.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 283) relating to confederate property in foreign countries; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION CONTEST—DELANO VS. MORGAN.

Mr. CULLOM. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I call up the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election of Delano vs. Morgan, from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That George W. Morgan is not entitled to a seat in the Fortieth Congress from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

Resolved, That Columbus Delano is entitled to a seat in the Fortieth Congress from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

REMOVAL OF A SUIT.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. If the call for the regular order is not insisted upon, I will yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. POLSLEY] to introduce a joint resolution which he has satisfied me ought to pass, provided it is passed without debate.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw my call for the regular order.

Mr. POLSLEY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 284) to provide for the removal of a suit pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, West Virginia, to the circuit court of the United States.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that whereas a suit in ejectment is now pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, in West Virginia, against the tenant in possession to recover possession of the Harper's Ferry property, owned by the United States, and it is doubtful whether under any existing law of the United States the said suit can be removed to the circuit court of the United States, it is therefore resolved that it shall be the duty of the circuit court of the United States for the district of West Virginia, if in session, or to the judge thereof in vacation, on the application of the defendant in said suit, showing that the property sought to be recovered by the said suit is owned or claimed by the United States, under color of title, and verifying the facts set out in such application by his affidavit, to issue a writ of certiorari, directed to the said State court, directing it to send the record and proceedings in said suit to the said circuit court of the United States, in duplicate, which writ shall be delivered to the clerk of the said State court or left at his office by the marshal of the said district or his deputy or other person thereto duly authorized, and thereupon the said State court shall stay all further proceedings in said suit, and upon the return of the said writ the said suit shall be docketed in the said circuit court of the United States and there proceeded in according to law; and all further proceedings had therein in the said State court shall be null and void.

Mr. MARSHALL. Is that offered for reference?

The SPEAKER. It is offered for action.

Mr. MARSHALL. I must object, unless it is referred. I am willing it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary to be reported back at any time.

Mr. POLSLEY. The court convenes next Monday, and there is danger judgment will be rendered for the possession of the property at that time.

Objection was insisted on to action on the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was received, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with liberty to report at any time after the morning hour.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. WEIR, one of its clerks, announced that that body had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1039) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

POST ROUTES IN MONROE COUNTY, NEW YORK.

Mr. SELYE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 285) for the establishment of certain post routes in the county of Monroe, in the State of New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

JOHN M. PALMER.

On motion of Mr. COBB, the House took from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 218, for the relief of John M. Palmer.

The first amendment to correct a clerical error was concurred in.

The second amendment, as follows, was non-concurred in:

Add as an additional section, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the chief quartermaster of the military department of the Cumberland, in addition to the contract price of ninety cents for each coffin manufactured by the said John M. Palmer, under his contract aforesaid, of the date of the 27th of August, 1866, cause to be paid out of any money under his control unto the said John M. Palmer the further sum of $12,716 30 for manufacturing and delivering said coffins: Provided, That the said John M. Palmer shall, in conformity with the provisions of his contract aforesaid, well and truly manufacture and deliver all the coffins which he is thereby still required to manufacture and deliver.

Mr. COBB moved that the House ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—DELANO VS. MORGAN.

Mr. CULLOM. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Mr. Speaker, this is the longest case, and involves more questions of law and disputed facts than any other case that has been before the Committee of Elections during the five years I have had the honor, and, considering the amount of unpleasant labor we have had to perform, I might say since I have had the misfortune, to belong to the committee. The contestant, Mr. Speaker, asks the House to reject the returns from thirteen different precincts, and he assigns his reasons at length, and the sitting member asks us to reject the returns of thirteen townships more for reasons which he assigns. The contestant asks us to reject the votes of 285 persons whom he alleges were not qualified electors under the laws of Ohio; and the sitting member asks us to reject the vote of 133, making in all 418. The House will have some kind of idea of the amount of labor entailed upon the committee when I say each one of these 418 names has attached to it a personal history, and not always a very brief one, the evidence in regard to which is scattered through fifteen hundred pages of printed matter, none of it to be found, even in a single instance, on consecutive pages, and not all in the same volume. The committee heard the parties during nineteen different sessions. The contestant occupied nine of those sessions and the sitting member ten.

Now, I propose to present in the space of perhaps half an hour all I have to say upon this case, at least for the present, and if gentlemen who have given it no attention will listen to me during that brief time I will endeavor to present what I deem the important features of the case.

We have before us two reports, one from the majority, of six pages, and one from two gentlemen who dissent from the views of the majority, which is somewhat longer. In examining these reports I find four leading differences between the majority and minority of the committee. The minority propose to reject the returns from the township of Blue Rock, which gave the contestant a majority of 117. They also propose to reject the returns from Clinton township and the city of Mount Vernon, which gave the contestant a majority of 117. The majority decline to reject the returns from either of these localities, but they propose to reject the votes of 126 persons who, they have come to the conclusion, were disqualified under the laws of Ohio, because they were deserters from the military service of the United States, and they also reject the returns from the township of Pike, which gave the sitting member 140 majority.

There are many other minor differences. One or the other of these claimants have asked us to reject the votes of certain persons who are claimed to be non-residents, idiots, lunatics, paupers, aliens, minors, and who were for this reason disqualified as electors of Ohio. I shall not just now discuss these questions, because these differences, all told, amount to less than fifty, and could not in any event, if the other questions are settled as the majority of the committee recommend, affect the result.

I will call the attention of the House first to the township of Blue Rock. In the summer of 1865 the inhabitants there discovered the existence of rock oil. It created great excitement, and called to that locality a large number of persons from the different counties of the State, and some few, it is alleged, from other States. One of the witnesses called by the sitting member informed us that from four to five hundred men were attracted to that locality in consequence of this discovery. They remained there till after the election in 1866. The election returns of 1866 show that the additional number of votes cast in that township was 87—that is, 87 more than were cast in 1865—and one witness for the sitting member estimates that of those 87 additional votes, 50 probably were cast by those new comers.

Now we are asked to set aside the returns of this entire township because it is conjectured that fifty persons, or thereabouts, who had been attracted to that section of country about a year and a quarter before, are supposed to have been non-residents. At least that is one of the reasons assigned by the minority for rejecting the whole. The laws of Ohio require that a voter should have resided in the State one year, in the county thirty days, and in the township twenty days before he offers to vote. The evidence shows that very nearly all these persons came to that township in the summer of 1865, and prior to that were residents of some portion of the State of Ohio. The discovery of oil in Blue Rock, unlike the discoveries in Pennsylvania and West Virginia, was not of sufficient account to attract the attention of the whole country. It gathered in the adventurers, speculators, mechanics, laborers, and capitalists from the neighborhood around it, but very few from other States. The question then comes up to be decided, did fifty, or as many of these people as voted at the election in 1866, go there with the intention of remaining? They were mostly young men, who came there to buy land, to purchase leases, to sink wells, to refine oil, and, if the business prospered, they proposed to continue there. The only thing to show that they did not intend to remain was the fact that most of them went away some time in the fall of 1866. But, by that time the whole thing had exploded. When it was ascertained that no oil, or at least not in such quantity as they expected, was to be found in that region, they left. Now, if any of these men were really non-residents, it was the duty of the sitting member, or of the contestant, if he wished to reject their votes, to have gone to the poll-books and taken the names of the men whom he alleged were non-residents and had voted, and offered some evidence of the facts which it was alleged existed; then the committee would have had something to go upon, had it been thus shown that these persons were non-residents and had voted for the contestant. But, on the contrary, the sitting member merely alleges that, judging from surrounding circumstances, a large number of these people were necessarily non-residents; that they had come from other localities without the intention of remaining, although they had remained a year and a quarter.

Another objection to this return is, that on the day of the election there was great excitement about the polls, and the friends of the sitting member were abused. One of the witnesses, whose imagination upon that subject, or whose recollection of the facts, I will not say which, seems to be the most lively, says that some of the friends of the contestant called them "rebels," and everything they could turn their tongues to. The same old gentleman says he had voted there for fifty years, and in his opinion the people who came there to engage in this new enterprise were not citizens and not entitled to vote. He further says that he went in before the board of election with the intention of challenging them. He first challenged the crowd, alleging that all the oil men were disqualified as electors, and when some one told him that he could not challenge in that way, that oil men were like Methodist preachers, and had a right to vote wherever their present residence was, then he commenced challenging individuals, and did challenge two or three, but some of the oil men blackguarded him so that he went off. These are the reasons assigned in the report of the minority for rejecting the returns of this township altogether. These, at least, are the most prominent reasons, and all I now recollect. The majority of the committee came to the conclusion that these reasons were not sufficient and the returns should be counted.

The minority also reject the returns from the townships of Clinton and city of Mount Vernon, which voted together. The city or village of Mount Vernon, as it used to be prior to 1852, lies in the center of Clinton township. In the year 1845 they applied to the Legislature for a charter as a village, and a special act was passed which separated the village from the township and divided it into wards. Under that law the elections for township officers were to be held in the township, and for village officers in the respective wards of the village; but they were permitted to hold the State and national elections together under the control of the township officers. It provided that the spring elections for township and village officers should be held separately, but allowed them to go on voting at the fall elections as they always done under the control of the township officers. In 1852 the Legislature of Ohio passed a general act relating to small cities. Among other things it provided that elections, without distinguishing between local and State elections, should be held in the respective wards of the cities. Mount Vernon had a population of more than five thousand, and, therefore, came under this law. In the fall of 1852, after the passage of this act, two elections, a State election and a national election, were held as they had been before held, under the control of the township officers. The people of this little city and of the township came to the conclusion that the general law which directed the election to be held in each ward did not overrule the special law of 1845, and that they could still hold their general elections together from that time on as they had for the seven years preceding. And so from that time, up to and including the election of 1866, the township and the city held their general elections together. This was their construction of the law. Fifteen consecutive State elections, including that of 1866, were held under that construction of the law, in accordance with the law of 1845, and four national elections, making in all nineteen elections that had been held under that construction, nobody complaining.

The election of 1866 was held in the same way. But a new construction has been put upon that law by the sitting member and his counsel. They now claim that the people of Clinton and of the city of Mount Vernon misconstrued the law; that they ought to have formed separate election districts in each ward of the city, and that the people of the city should have voted by themselves, and the people of the townships by themselves. I have two answers to that; one is, that under the law of 1852 the city councils were directed to appoint voting places, but under this misconstruction of the law, if it was a misconstruction, they never appointed any voting places, and the people had the right to vote under the old law until new provision was made for them.

The minority of the committee say that the people might have elected officers themselves on the day of election. So they could; but they could not appoint places for voting. Secondly, the law has received a practical construction by nineteen elections, sanctioned, or at least assented to, not dissented from, by any of the Ohio authorities.

I hold, then, that if they were wrong in their construction of the law of 1852, still, having held nineteen elections under that construction, and no voting places ever having been selected by the city council of Mount Vernon, that construction became the law, and the Committee of Elections would not have been justifiable in rejecting the 381 majority given for the contestant.

I come now to consider whether, under the laws of the United States and the constitution of the State of Ohio, a deserter from the military or naval service of the United States is a qualified elector. The law of Congress passed March 3, 1865, provides—

"That all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service or report to a provost marshal within sixty days after the proclamation hereinafter mentioned, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their rights to become citizens."

And the constitution of the State of Ohio, unlike the constitutions of many other States, provides that no person shall be an elector in that State unless he is also a citizen of the United States. Now, if this law of the 3d of March, 1865, is valid, taken in connection with the provision of the State constitution of Ohio, deserters are not qualified electors in that State. Upon that point I think it probable that I will not be disputed by any person. To my recollection, that inference of the law, providing it is valid, taken together with the constitution of Ohio, has not been denied either in argument before the committee or in the report of the minority.

But it is said that the law itself is not constitutional, and therefore the House should not enforce it. It is said to be unconstitutional because it is ex post facto; the desertions had all taken place prior to the act of the 3d of March, 1865. Now, if gentlemen will give attention to what the disqualification consists in, they will find that it is not in desertion, not in the former desertion, but in the refusal to return within the sixty days fixed in the proclamation of the President. Whatever penalties Congress saw fit to denounce against desertion were provided in other laws. The act of 1865 calls upon these men, who are already offenders against the law, to return to duty; and it provides that all who shall not return within the sixty days, under the proclamation of the President calling upon them to do so, shall be deemed to have relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship. So the question of its constitutionality, on account of its being ex post facto, is not applicable.

But, it is said again, that conceding the law to be constitutional, no person can be deemed a deserter until he has been convicted in some court, either military or civil. However, before I say anything on that point, I wish to inquire by what authority the Committee of Elections, or even this House, can pass upon the constitutionality of a law which has received the sanction of both Houses of Congress, and been approved and signed by the President? Suppose there is a doubt about the constitutionality of this law. Sir, since this case has been pending before the Committee of Elections we have impeached the President for disregarding a law because he thought it was unconstitutional. And now it is proposed that this House shall commit the same offense. The President had some shadow of excuse. He said that he had never sanctioned that law; that he had vetoed it. The House has no such excuse, because a very large portion of the members that compose this House voted for the act of 1865. He said, too, that he wanted to bring the case before the Supreme Court to test the constitutionality of the law. We have no such excuse. There is no appeal to the Supreme Court from the decision of this House in a case of contested election. I think we are bound to take this law as it is found on the statute-book, and administer it according to its spirit and its letter.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MULLINS. Does the gentleman propose to oppose the policy of the President in this regard, or does he propose to go in harmony with the policy of the President and have his own views override the law?

Mr. SCOFIELD. My own views upon the President's attempt to override a law because he believed it unconstitutional are upon record in the vote which I have given. I am saying that if we held the President criminal because he attempted to override a law which he deemed unconstitutional, so much more in default would we be if we attempted to trample under foot this law, whether we like it or not.

But it is said, further, that no person can be considered a deserter until he has been convicted. The law, in fixing the qualifications and the disqualifications of electors, sometimes makes a fact the ground of disqualification, and sometimes it makes the certificate of a court. The ground of disqualification and the certificate of the court may be based upon the same fact. Sometimes the law authorizes the election board to act upon the facts, and sometimes it authorizes a court to act upon the facts and give a certificate of their conclusion, which is obligatory upon the board of election. For instance, the law requires that a foreigner should reside in this country five years before he becomes a citizen. But that fact is withdrawn from the consideration of the board of electors and submitted to the determination of a court. The court is to certify whether the applicant for naturalization has been five years in this country or not; and that certificate binds the board of election. The fact may be that the person had not been in the country five days; but if the court determine that he had been here five years and so certify, the board of election is concluded by it.

Then, on many other disqualifications, such as color, race, idiocy, insanity, minority, non-residence, pauperism, betting on elections, and several others, the law has confided the decision, upon the facts, to the election board. That board passes upon the facts. But it is said that these facts do not constitute crimes, while desertion does. Suppose the old law of the United States, that is, the law in force prior to the act of 1865, which made desertion a crime, were repealed, would it make any difference about the deserter being an elector? Laws in force prior to the act of 1865 make desertion a crime, punishable in a certain way. The act of 1865 provides that a failure to return to the Army shall disqualify the deserter as an elector. Now, the fact that some law of the United States makes desertion a crime does not affect in any way the act of 1865, which makes it a disqualification. Certain facts may constitute a crime if tried in court, and may be punishable in a certain way, and they may also constitute a disqualification before a board of electors; but unless the law provides, as it sometimes does, that the disqualification shall consist in conviction, and not in the facts upon which conviction might be based, no conviction can be required. The case does not go before a court to determine the disqualification, but before the board of electors.

Under the constitution of Ohio and the decisions made in pursuance of it, a mulatto, I believe, is not a voter, but a quadroon is. It is sometimes a very nice question even for one thoroughly booked up in the science of races to determine exactly the amount of African blood which a person who presents himself as a voter may have in his veins. According to a former law of, I believe, the State of Ohio—certainly of some of the States—to have African blood in one's veins was a crime for which the unfortunate man was liable to be arrested and tried before an officer; and, if guilty, expelled from the State. And still, under the laws of Ohio, the election board passes upon this delicate and difficult question. They passed on this question, and yet gentlemen say if the same facts which go to make up disqualification by some law, either State or national, make a crime, too, that it requires conviction in the court before disqualification can be considered. Those States where treason or having engaged in the rebellion is made disqualification, according to that rule no man could be excluded until he had been brought before the court and tried, and convicted for treason. I do not know but gentlemen would go so far as to say that the sentence should be carried out and the man hung before he could be excluded. I am satisfied, after hearing the whole argument, that disqualification is always the subject of investigation by the election board, and that they are bound by the decision of no tribunal unless the law so provides. If the law requires a conviction, as it almost always does in the case of a crime, then the election board must have evidence of conviction.

In arguing this case before the committee the great hardship of excluding these men without trial was pressed upon the attention of the committee. One of the gentlemen in an eloquent way said that Adam and Cain had been summoned before they were pronounced guilty, but we propose to convict men of this crime of desertion without summons and without trial. Mr. Speaker, these men were summoned. They had sixty days in which to appear. They had the proclamation of the President urging them to return to duty. They had notice under the law which was passed some time before that if they persisted in remaining in Canada, or hiding away from duty, if they refused to come to the assistance of the country in this emergency, they would lose their rights of citizens of the United States. The summons to Adam and Cain, I think, was returnable forthwith, but these men had sixty days; and now the gentleman says because they did not return, because they did not obey the summons, they still ought to be put upon the same footing as those who did. How could we do anything more? Had they obeyed the summons and returned then under the law they would have been forgiven, they would have been entitled to an honorable discharge and released from all penalties and forfeiture, and when the war was over they would be entitled to their share of pensions and bounties and of the honor which belonged to honorable soldiers. But if they refused to come forward when summoned how could they be tried?

The objection of gentlemen would make out that all who returned were not disqualified, because the act of returning removed the disqualification; those who did not return would not be disqualified because they did not return, and of course could not be tried. The construction which the gentlemen give this law would make it a perfect nullity. No man would be disqualified under it. Those who obeyed the summons and came back to the service would be entitled to an honorable discharge, and those who rejected the invitation and refused to obey the summons would be acquitted altogether because they were not tried.

The committee have considered the two hundred and one cases presented under this law, and have concluded that the evidence shows one hundred and twenty-six come within its provisions, and they have rejected that number of votes.

I ought, perhaps, to say a word about the rule of evidence which the committee have adopted in ascertaining whether these deserters or non-residents or any person decided by the committee to be disqualified voted for the sitting member or the contestant. I will simply read a clause from the report:

"For whom a vote is given, by the laws of Ohio, is a secret properly known only to the voter himself, and he is never required to disclose it. This fact must, therefore, be often determined upon circumstantial evidence alone. To what political party a voter belonged, whose partisan he had been, whose friends claimed for him the right to vote at the time, what he said of his intention before and his act after voting, are circumstances which each claimant has endeavored to prove, and which the committee have considered in making up their verdict. In this action they are governed by precedent as well as principle. The same ruling obtained in the celebrated case from New Jersey, decided in 1840, and known as the "broad seal" case, and also in Vallandigham vs. Campbell, decided in 1865. (See Bartlett's Contested Elections, pages 28 and 233.) If it is not to be inferred from this kind of evidence for whom an illegal vote was cast, it cannot, except in a few instances, be ascertained at all. Any number of illegal votes, once placed in the ballot-box, either by the deception or connivance of the board, can never after be excluded unless the whole poll is rejected or the fraudulent voters voluntarily confess their crime."

I come now to the consideration of the township of Pike, the returns from which are rejected because one of the judges, being a deserter, was disqualified under the laws of Ohio to discharge the duties of that office. The law which governs this case was early settled by this House—I think during the administration of Washington—in the case of Jackson vs. Wayne. That case came from the State of Georgia. The law of that State required that election boards should consist of three magistrates. Just prior to the election the commissions of two of the magistrates, who were appointed by the Governor, expired, and new commissions were issued, either to the same parties or to others; I do not recollect which. The election occurred a few days before the meeting of the court, and the law of Georgia required the magistrates to qualify in open court. Having their commissions in their pockets they were sworn in as judges of the election and made the returns. The next week they attended the court and were qualified as magistrates. That case came before Congress in a contested election. It was argued at considerable length by some of the ablest members of the House. It was finally decided that returns made by a person acting as judge who was personally disqualified for that position must be rejected. The returns were therefore not allowed in this case.

The same principle, although the facts are not exactly the same, was ruled in the case of Howard vs. Hooper. The principle was decided first by the committee and finally sustained by the House. The law may be right or wrong, but it is the settled law of elections, settled as early as the administration of the first President, and has come down to us without reversal.

The case to which the minority of the committee have referred does not touch the principle settled in Jackson vs. Wayne at all. That was a case where there was a dispute as to whether the officers of election were elected on a particular day. Some said the election should have been in the month of March and some said in the month of April; but they were elected, and their commissions or certificates of election were issued to them, and the question was whether the House would go back and pile one contested-election case upon another by deciding that these men were not judicial officers. The disqualification there was not personal. But in every case where a personal disqualification has come before the Committee of Elections and this House the law, as settled in the case of Jackson vs. Wayne, has been adhered to. The law of Ohio required that the judge of election should himself be an elector. But this judge was disqualified as an elector by reason of being a deserter, and therefore had no right to sit. If the House dislike the law which the committee have intended to administer impartially, they may overrule it, but before they do so I would like to have them consider whether this is a case in which they should commence a new line of precedents.

It will be remembered that when this law was passed in 1865 we were entering upon what we hoped to be the last campaign against the rebellion. It was the impression of those who had charge of our armies that if the rebels could see the army filled up, if they could see the men who had deserted our ranks, those who had skulked away from the draft, concealing themselves in Canada or some distant part of the country, come back, the battle on our side might be won even without a fight. Therefore the act of 1865 was passed. It was an imploring pleading rather than a denunciatory one. It promised to those men pardon if they would return. It promised them bounties, pensions, and honor in the future, while they were informed by the press of the country that if they did return they probably might never be exposed in a single battle, that the rebellion would be ended and the Union Army victorious. Those men who refused did so in part because they claimed this law was unconstitutional. The cry of unconstitutionality was first raised in this Hall. We had no right, it was said, under such a law to induce deserters to return. The law was denounced before the country. Everybody who thought the war was wrong in the beginning, or that it was a failure, or that it would be a failure, and that it was useless to undertake anything further for the preservation of the Union, denounced this law and recommended the people everywhere to disregard it. The evidence shows that in Pike township they did disregard it. They were to settle the constitutional questions that nobody but the Supreme Court is authorized to settle, which this House cannot settle. They put upon this board a man who was obnoxious to this law; and to show their disregard of it they allowed eleven persons, disqualified by reason of desertion, to vote in that very precinct, and then, in making the return which the law required them to make, in that township, instead of certifying that the votes were cast by electors, they omitted that portion. This might have been by accident or cunning, but the omission was made. They changed the certificate which was sent out in blank to every township and which the law requires, that these men were electors under the laws of Ohio, and simply certified to the number of votes. I suppose that that itself—the deficiency of the certificate—is sufficient, perhaps, to reject the return from that township; but I prefer to rely mainly upon the law as settled in the case of Jackson vs. Wayne.

Mr. Speaker, I have now said all I intend to say, at least for the present, about the four leading differences between the majority and the minority of the committee. But before I sit down, it may be proper to say that there were some other matters about which there may be a difference of opinion in this House, although the committee have agreed upon them.

The contestant claimed that there was a concerted plan all over his district to defraud him out of some portion of his votes by exchanging the votes put in the ballot-box for him for others in favor of the sitting member. His evidence shows us that in the township of Clinton there was a fraud of forty-six votes, and so clear and satisfactory was the evidence upon that subject that the minority of the committee have agreed with the majority in making the deduction. In the township of Monroe there was a similar fraud to the number of twenty votes, and on that, too, the minority agree with the majority in making the deduction. In Jefferson county one of the judges was detected in exchanging three votes and then the exchange ceased after that. How far it would have gone but for the vigilance of the friends of the contestant we do not know. The contestant claims that the returns of all these townships should be rejected because he has proved these frauds, and he claims that there is a strong probability that others were perpetrated. The majority and the minority have concurred in retaining the returns from these townships, but making the corrections so far as the proof went. If they had been rejected and the township of Pike counted for the sitting member the result would have been the same as if the township of Pike was rejected and these counted. There were many other charges and allegations on both sides, but I will not weary the House by alluding to them at this time.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Private Secretary, informed the House that the act (H. R. No. 1045) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the execution of the reconstruction laws in the third military district, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, having been received by the President on the 19th of May, 1868, and not having been returned by him to the House within ten days, had become a law under the Constitution of the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed House joint resolution No. 278, to supply books and public documents to the national asylums for disabled volunteer soldiers, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

It further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 481) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Nebraska, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

REPRESENTATION OF ARKANSAS.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 1039) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress, returned from the Senate with amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

ELECTION CONTEST—DELANO VS. MORGAN.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to say that it has been four months since this case was argued before the Committee of Elections. The last argument was on the 3d of February, and it will be four months to-morrow. I intend, if possible, to get a vote upon this case to-day. It had occurred to me that two hours on each side would perhaps be as long as the House would listen, and unless gentlemen are more fortunate in obtaining the attention of the House than I have been, a great deal longer. Perhaps that will be enough time; at any rate, I design to get a vote on the case to-day if possible.

Mr. KERR. On that point I desire to say one word before I proceed, and that is merely to suggest that after what the gentleman has said in his opening remarks with reference to the character of this case, that suggestion comes with singular inconsistency from him. The case involves nearly two thousand pages of printed matter which has required the examination of the committee, and now is brought for the first time before the House for its consideration, and it is simply impossible for any human being, no matter what may be the degree of his intelligence or intellectual powers, to dispose of and do justice to it in four hours or four days. It is indecent haste to attempt to require any such thing to be done in four hours.

I desire now to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk as a substitute for the resolutions presented by the majority of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That GEORGE W. MORGAN was duly elected, and is entitled to retain his seat in the Fortieth Congress, from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

Mr. KERR. This case, in nearly all of its essential features, is an exceedingly important one, and I think I may say it is an unprecedented case in this House. The questions of law and the questions of fact which are involved in this record are not only numerous, but they are intrinsically important and exceedingly interesting. They are of such a character that I submit it does not become gentlemen here, acting as judges, even to attempt to give to them anything less than the most careful, deliberate, and full consideration.

Mr. Speaker, the labor which has been imposed upon the Committee of Elections by this case can scarcely be described to this House so that it shall be fully appreciated. The labor that was involved in the preparation by myself of the report of the minority was greater than I ever before bestowed upon any case, whether before this House or before any of the civil courts of the country.

I beg leave, in this connection, to remark that when I came to read the report of the majority, I must confess to some degree of surprise that it has undertaken to give this entire record so imperfect an examination, so imperfect an analysis, as that I say to every honorable gentleman of this House it is simply impossible from this report of the majority for any gentleman to understand this case; he cannot do it; he must go somewhere else. And that report does not even tell you where you can go for the evidence. Many of the most essential principles involved in the case are not considered at all by the majority. Why this is so, it is not for me to say; that it is so, I need only to invite gentlemen to look at these two reports that they may see the fact.

Now, what stands at the very door of this investigation? What is the first question that challenges the attention of the committee, and should now engage the attention of this House? It is this, and it is preliminary to every other question; whether the honorable contestant here, by his proceedings which antedated the commencement of the testimony in this case, has so made up his record that he is authorized to come here at all? I want honorable gentlemen to answer to themselves whether the notices that were served upon the sitting member by the contestant are, in point of law, worth the paper on which they were written.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] my colleague on the Committee of Elections, in speaking of another matter involved in this case, did himself the credit to say, (and it was refreshing to hear it from him,) that it did not become Congress to override any law of the United States which had been solemnly enacted and had received the executive sanction.

But what does the House undertake to do in this case? In the very inception of the case it undertakes to override a law of Congress made expressly for the government of this House. That law says:

"Whenever any person shall intend to contest an election of any member of the House of Representatives of the United States, he shall, within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the officers or board of canvassers authorized by law to determine the same, give notice in writing to the member whose seat he designs to contest of his intention to contest the same, and in such notice shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest."—1 Brigley's Digest, 234.

That is the law for this House; that is a law of this country as solemnly enacted as any other law on our statute-book; yet that law is deliberately overridden, first by the contestant and then by the committee. What is the object of that law? Need I say to gentlemen here who are members of the profession of the law that the object of this kind of a law is here, as in the courts of justice, to narrow, to circumscribe, to limit as much as possible the scope and reach of the issues to be determined by the House on final adjudication of the case? This object is a good one, it is a just one; it is indispensable to adhere to it in order to facilitate the administration of justice and to facilitate the disposition of cases. And it is important to the parties that obedience shall be given to this law in order that controversies shall not be interminable, and to the end that they shall not be so expensive to the parties by reason of the unnecessary and improper latitude which shall be given to them as to ruin parties who may attempt to prosecute contests like this.

Now, I say that in view of the precedents in this House, the notices served by the contestant on the sitting member in this case do not comply with the requisitions of this law of Congress; and I invite attention to the only two of the specifications which are necessary to be considered in the case. The second specification reads as follows:

"2. Six hundred and twenty-five persons, not legally entitled to vote, were improperly and illegally allowed to vote at said election, and did cast their votes for you."

What does that mean? I ask the lawyers of the House, what does that mean? Where were these persons allowed to vote? The notice does not answer. By whom were they allowed to vote? The notice does not answer. Why were they illegal voters? The notice does not answer. Were they insane? Were they idiots? Were they minors? Were they non-residents? Were they convicted criminals? or were they deserters? The notice does not answer. Yet we are told that such a notice as this is to stand in this court of justice.

The next specification to which I invite attention is the following:

"18. Illegal votes were cast for you at said election as follows: in Clinton township, Knox county, 25 votes, and in each of the townships of Jefferson, Union, Butler, Jackson, Brown, Howard, Harrison, Clay, Pike, Monroe, Pleasant, Morgan, Berlin, Morris, Miller, Middlebury, Wayne, Liberty, Milford, and Hiliar, in said Knox county, 10 votes. In the township of Newark, in the county of Licking, 25 votes, and in each of the townships of Fallsburg, Perry, Hanover, Hopewell, Eden, Mary Ann, Madison, Frankin, Washington, Newton, Licking, Burlington, McKean, Granville, Union, Bennington, Liberty, St. Albans, Harrison, Hartford, Monroe, Jersey, Bowling Green, and Lima, in said Licking county, 10 votes. In the township of Washington, in Muskingum county, 25 votes, and in each of the townships of Monroe, Highland, Union, Rich Mill, Meigs, Adams, Sulem, Perry, Salt Creek, Blue Rock, Harrison, Wayne, Jefferson, Muskingum Falls, Springfield, Newton, Jackson, Licking, and Hopewell, 10 votes. In the township of Tuscarawas, in the county of Coshocton, 25 votes, and in each of the townships of Adams, Oxford, Linton, Lafayette, White Eyes, Crawford, Mill Creek, Keene, Franklin, Virginia, Jackson, Bethlehem, Clarke, Monroe, Jefferson, Bedford, Washington, Pike, Perry, New Castle, and Tiverton, in said Coshocton county, 10 votes."

"Illegal votes were cast for you at said election." Why were they illegal? How was the sitting member, who was entitled to a particular statement of the grounds of contest, to know what was meant by this notice? Could he answer to his own judgment, and say, "My contestant claims that 25 non-residents voted in one township, and 25 insane persons in another?" No, he can answer to himself nothing from the face of that paper, because it is notice of nothing. It is simply an evasion of a legal notice, that is all. Yet, singular as it may appear, the learned gentleman who makes the report of the majority in this case has totally failed to notice this point, although he knew that the sitting member had excepted to every one of the specifications in the notice of the contestant.

Substantially, the allegation in each specification is that illegal votes were cast for the sitting member. It cannot be said, without doing most manifest violence to the intention of the law, that such general and vague allegations can put the sitting member in possession of the grounds of contest. They do not aver in what the illegality of the votes consists. They do not state facts from which the illegality results as a conclusion of the law. They only state the conclusion of law itself, and entirely omit any recital of the reasons or facts that are indispensable to sustain the conclusion. This is a violation of most obvious principles of correct pleading, and ought not to be approved. There is nothing in the nature or circumstances of this case to prevent or even render inconvenient a fair and full compliance with this law in the statement by the contestant of his grounds of contest. The object of all pleading, whether in ordinary actions at law or in contested election, or in any cases required to be subjected to judicial or even quasi judicial determination, is to limit, to restrict, to narrow, as much as practicable, the range and scope of the investigation, to exclude unnecessary latitude of inquiry, to disclose at the outset the difficulties to be overcome by testimony, or the specific conclusions intended to be established by proof, to the end that such litigation may be simplified and cheapened, not made interminable and unnecessarily expensive, and especially that no advantage shall be taken or injustice done, against which it is impossible to guard by reason of the uncertainty and vagueness in the statements of the grounds of controversy. The importance of these principles has been well illustrated in this case. The contestant wholly fails to specify the grounds of contest in his notice, and then proceeds in his own order to make his proofs; but in reference to a large number of voters, (alleged to have been deserters,) takes his testimony at so late a day in the time allowed as to absolutely preclude the taking of counter-testimony by the sitting member. It was the intention of the law of Congress to prevent such results by requiring reasonable definiteness and certainty in the statement of the grounds of contest.

I hold, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that upon the established law of this House, under the very letter of the law of this country, and under the precedents, the number of which is so great that I need not refer to them, that these notices are insufficient, and that every part and parcel of the evidence offered by the contestant here ought to be rejected by this House. But, Mr. Speaker, knowing full well that this will not be done, I have gone on and examined every single case in this immense record, case by case, page by page, witness by witness, and weighing them all, have reached the conclusions which I have undertaken to state in my minority report, and to which now, as briefly as I can, I will invite the attention of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I find it most convenient to take up this case in the order in which it is presented in the report of the majority, and not in the order in which it has been presented to the House by my colleague on the committee. I first, therefore, invite the attention of the House to the consideration of what is called the deserter vote; and I do hope that, as a matter of personal kindness to me, if not as a matter of higher duty, I shall have the attention of honorable gentlemen while I undertake to present my views upon these points.

The record on the part of the contestant alleges that there were allowed to vote in the thirteenth district of Ohio 201 men who had been deserters under one or another of the laws enacted for the enrollment of the national forces.

I desire, as preliminary to my argument on this point, to invite the attention of the House to the character of evidence in this case. There is alleged to have been 201 deserters. Gentlemen will remember the first law on the subject of the enrollment of the militia under orders of the Federal Government was enacted in 1862, the next law in 1863, and the next and last law in 1865—I mean so far as those laws bear on this question. Under the first law under which the first draft in 1862 was made, it was not declared the person who failed or refused to report under the draft should be held as a deserter, nor was there any penalty attached to the failure to answer to the draft under that enrollment. Under the second law, that of the 3d of March, 1863, it was declared that persons who should fail to respond to the draft should be held to be guilty of desertion, but no other penalty was attached to that offense. It was declared to work no disfranchisement. It was not only declared to be desertion under the law of March 3, 1865, but an additional penalty was attached to the penalties previously prescribed, and that was the penalty of disfranchisement and decitizenization of the United States. But those two penalties were prescribed under the law of 1865 alone.

Now, all the testimony in reference to all these cases of desertion: I also assert here, and I assert it broadly, I defy successful contradiction of it, that the testimony under all these various drafts, touching the alleged fact of desertion, is in every particular unsatisfactory. It is most shadowy, it is frivolous, in many cases it is absolutely contemptible. It is such that any intelligent court of justice of the country would reject it in any civil case pending before it for adjudication. It is the testimony of persons who heard some other person say that John Smith or William Jones was a deserter, or who heard that some person said his neighbor had gone off and it was stated that he had gone to Canada, or who heard that when a certain man's name was drawn he went out of the district. In respect to others, there is an attempt to prove record evidence of desertion, and it consists either of copies taken from the enrollment lists in this district or of certificates signed by the adjutant general of Ohio, purporting to state that some person stands on some enrollment list, marked as a deserter or charged as a deserter. Now, I say as a lawyer, as a member of this committee, on a just appreciation, I believe, of my obligations, that all this evidence touching the fact of desertion, and purporting to place that upon record evidence, is illegal and ought not to have been received. There is no law of Congress providing these things shall be evidence of the facts they purport to state.

In this connection I want to state that we are informed by the adjutant general of Ohio that the report of the Provost Marshal General of the United States says the entire number of deserters charged to the State of Ohio during the war is twenty-seven thousand, and that of that number those charged to the thirteenth district of Ohio are only five hundred and forty-three. We are told by the same authority that it is the opinion of the Provost Marshal General that at least two thirds of that entire number could, by returns to duty, have been shown not to have been deserters at all, but they were simply charged with desertion under the technical and arbitrary rules of the Government in a time of war; that they in fact were never guilty of desertion. Hundreds and it may be thousands of the persons so charged with desertion may have been at that very moment shedding their blood on the battle-fields of the country in defense of the flag; and it is shown that in some cases persons so charged in very truth were at the very time they were so charged in the actual performance of their military duties. Yet it is upon this kind of shadowy testimony that it is proposed by this House now to disfranchise two hundred and one of the legal voters of the thirteenth district of Ohio. All this evidence as to the voter is ex parte, having been taken in this case after the election, and where the election boards, after examination of the voter and hearing the case according to the laws of Ohio, had adjudged him a legal elector and received his ballot. He is thus, in legal effect, to be deprived of a precious franchise, branded as a criminal, and punished, in violation of the most obvious principles of justice, and without a hearing.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that the constitution of Ohio requires that no person shall be a citizen of that State who is not also a citizen of the United States, and that whenever he ceases to be a citizen of the United States he ceases also to be a citizen of Ohio. I ask you now whether it is to be held to-day by this House that it is competent for Congress to regulate suffrage in a State of this Union. And is it to be held that Congress may, under the pretext of punishing desertion, or any other crime, I care not what, regulate suffrage in a State of this Union? If that is the theory of this House, why is it not honestly, frankly, and boldly so declared? Why is it not avowed in this report that you mean to dictate terms upon which the right of suffrage shall be exercised in the State of Ohio by laws of Congress? I say that it is the province of the States alone to regulate their own suffrage, and when the State of Ohio declared in her fundamental law that no person could be a citizen of that State who was not also a citizen of the United States the State of Ohio simply intended to enact and declare that no person of alien birth and origin should become a citizen of that State until he had first become a naturalized citizen of the United States. That is what the history of this enactment in the State of Ohio justifies me in saying. That is what it means, and that is all it means. Yet it is attempted here to extend it far beyond the true intent and purpose of those who made it. But it is a perversion of terms to say that any person acquires the right of suffrage in Ohio by virtue of the laws of Congress. Naturalization does not confer the right of suffrage. That right is only conferred by the constitution and laws of Ohio. Persons are allowed to vote there because they possess all the qualifications thus prescribed. The right of suffrage at a State election is a State right, a franchise conferable only by the State, which Congress can neither give nor take away. If, therefore, the act now under consideration is in truth an attempt to regulate the right of suffrage in the State, or to prescribe the conditions on which that right may be exercised, it would be held unwarranted by the Federal Constitution. In the exercise of its admitted powers, Congress may doubtless deprive an individual of the opportunity to enjoy a right that belongs to him as a citizen of a State, even the right of suffrage. But this is a different thing from taking away or impairing the right itself. Congress may also impose upon the criminal forfeiture of his citizenship of the United States—that is, of what Justice Story denominates his general citizenship; but that does not legally or necessarily deprive him of his citizenship of the State, which is secured to him by the State constitution and laws, and is to be held on the terms prescribed by them alone. It is an integral part of the State government.

I hold, Mr. Speaker, in reference to all of these alleged deserters, that the laws of Congress under which it is attempted to disfranchise them upon the evidence in this case can have no possible application to the case, and cannot control the action of this House, unless the House is determined and is in search of a pretext merely to exclude the sitting member from his right as a member of this House without law.

I call attention now to the fact which no gentleman who will examine this report can gainsay, that of these two hundred and one persons charged with desertion, forty-one were drafted under the call for volunteers in 1862, and were therefore never subject to be disfranchised even on conviction of desertion, because the law at that time did not say that the failure to respond to the draft should constitute the crime of desertion. It is true, it was always desertion to run away from military service after being actually mustered into the service of the United States, but that is not this case at all. The persons threatened with unjust disfranchisement in this case were never mustered into the actual service, except a very few persons. I say, therefore, that as to these forty-one persons alleged to have been drafted under the law of 1862 there is no law of Congress which affects or touches them in this case.

Can it be said that the law of March 3, 1865, was intended to be retroactive and to go back to the law of 1862, to add provisions to that law, to make that a crime which under the law of 1862 was no crime, and to punish that in 1865 which under the law of 1862 was not punishable at all? Are we, then, to be told that this kind of a law, this kind of legislative declaration, is neither an ex post facto law nor a statute of pains and penalties? Are we to be told that the familiar cases in 4 Wallace do not destroy any such pretense as that in this case? I trust no gentleman here will insist upon any such construction of that law for one moment.

Then it will further appear that thirty-seven of the persons alleged to be deserters were drafted under the order of 1864, still antedating the enactment of the law of March 3, 1865. It will also appear that these thirty-seven persons are not, by the evidence, identified with the alleged deserters. It will further appear that forty-three of them are so identified by the evidence, such as it is.

In this connection I hold that the enrollments are not sufficient evidence that a person is a deserter. There must be other and additional evidence of identity. Parol proof is inadmissible to corroborate and sustain the record, but not to set it aside or contradict it where by law the record is required to be kept and is made evidence.

It will further appear that seventy-nine of these persons alleged to be deserters are in no just or legal sense guilty of desertion or disqualified electors. And the persons whom I classify in this way are set down in this report under their appropriate heads, to which I respectfully invite the attention of members of the House.

It will further appear that of the whole number one hundred and two are legal voters, and ought not to be rejected for reasons which are briefly stated after their respective names in the lists which are contained in my report.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it would afford me very great pleasure, if I had time and the attention of the House, to go over this report, and man by man state the evidence in regard to these alleged deserters, and show to the gentlemen of this House how absolutely unsatisfactory and insufficient and frivolous it is as to nearly all of the individuals. For example, Franklin Vian, who voted in Pike township, is not shown to have been a deserter; but another person of the same name in Monroe county is shown to have been a deserter, but there is no proof of identity, not one word or syllable; and yet that man is charged against the sitting member as a deserter and an illegal voter. Benjamin F. Kunkle put in a substitute, and yet it is charged that he was a deserter, and ought to be counted against the sitting member. If any gentleman has the curiosity to look at the evidence in this case I invite his attention to part two, page 276. Then John Kessinger, or Kensinger, who was drafted, did not vote at all, and yet he is charged against the sitting member as a deserter and an illegal voter. David Hodge put in a substitute, and he is charged against us as a deserter. Salathiel Parrish put in a substitute, and so did James F. Scoles and Philip Arnold, and yet all these men are said by the gentleman who drafted the report of the majority to be deserters and illegal voters.

Now, gentlemen may say that my report here should be verified by testimony. It is impossible for me to read all the evidence referring to these various persons through two thousand pages of printed matter; but I do ask, gentlemen, each one of you, if you please, to take one of these cases and examine the evidence in reference to that one case; and I challenge a denial of the truth of one single one of my findings as to these men. I might go through with the entire list, but I have referred to enough to show the general course of this examination.

It is said, Mr. Speaker, that this law of 1865 was retroactive in its terms, and was intended to refer to and embrace in its operations persons who were drafted under the preceding law. Now, upon that point I will not undertake to occupy the attention of the House by referring to the authorities or entering at any length into an examination of the law. I take it for granted that every intelligent gentleman upon this floor is—and if he is not I know he ought to be—familiar with the late decisions of the Supreme Court in the celebrated cases ex parte Garland and Cummings vs. The State of Missouri, in 4 Wallace. I say that under the decisions in these cases the law, by its very terms, can have no legal operation upon the execution of the draft law that preceded it, that it is not retroactive, and was not so intended, and ought never to be so construed. It is an ex post facto law as to every person named in this case. It was enacted after the desertions; it was enacted after the facts had occurred; it was enacted after the crime was committed.

It was enacted after the offense was complete, and the man was guilty of desertion and ought to be punished. Ah, but the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has discovered a mode of evading the force of these decisions and of that law by assuming that this law was not intended to punish for desertion, the original act of desertion on the part of those persons drafted in 1862 and 1864, but that the law by its terms creates an additional offense, which was a failure by those persons, after the proclamation of President Lincoln, of 11th March, 1865, to return and report themselves for duty under the draft; in other words, it is claimed by him that this original crime of desertion has now become a sort of continuing crime—a crime that goes on from time to time and will never cease to run against these men and to multiply itself year by year and month by month until the grave shall have swallowed every one of them. Then I suppose the justice of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania will be satisfied. Mr. Speaker, to my mind, as a lawyer, it bears very much the character of a legal absurdity to say that if I commit desertion to-day, which desertion to-day is not a crime, and by proclamation to-morrow it is announced to me that if I will return to duty I shall not be punished, and that if I fail so to return and surrender myself I shall be punished as for desertion. Can I pile up crime upon crime by a mere failure to respond to the demands of the constituted authorities? When a man deserts his crime is complete; he is at that instant a deserter. You undertake to say that a failure thereafter to report under a new law, under some new order, shall constitute another crime. How, in God's name, are you going to find a foundation for that new crime, except upon the basis of the original desertion?

Is not your law, then, retroactive? Is not your law, then, in the very terms and definitions given in the Constitution, an ex post facto law; a bill of pains and penalties? What does the Supreme Court say is an ex post facto law? They say:

"An ex post facto law is one which imposes a punishment for an act which was not punishable at the time it was committed; or imposes additional punishment to that then prescribed, or changes the rules of evidence by which less or different testimony is sufficient to convict than was then required."

"A bill of attainder is a legislative act which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial. If the punishment be less than death, the act is termed a bill of pains and penalties."

If that law does not meet these very definitions of solemnly prohibited laws, then I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I have not legal capacity to determine what those definitions mean.

I hold in my hand the only judicial decision of a court of last resort in this country upon this law, giving to it a judicial interpretation. That is the decision of the supreme court of the State of Pennsylvania, constituted of five judges, three of whom were Democrats and two were Republicans. But this is the unanimous decision of the whole court, and it is entitled to the very highest respect at the hands of this House. It is no discredit to the high authority of that opinion for me to say that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, who now sits on my left, [Mr. Woodward,] distinguished for twenty years as one of the finest legal minds of this country, was then on that bench.

I will read somewhat at length from that opinion for the reason that it bears so directly and so materially upon the point embraced in this alleged desertion law. I read from the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the late case of Huber vs. Riley, a case which arose under the act of Congress of March 3, 1865:

"The spirit of these constitutional provisions is briefly that no person can be made to suffer for a criminal offense unless the penalty be inflicted by due process of law."

Now, I have held in reference to every one of these deserters that before they can be disfranchised in Ohio, even by reason of desertion, they must first have been arrested and tried by courts of competent jurisdiction and convicted of the crime of desertion. And I hold that the adoption of any other theory in this country is to do violence to some of the first and most fundamental principles of our Government. It is to reverse the sacred presumption of innocence until guilt is proved. It is by legislative declaration, by mere legislative enactment, in times of high party excitement, to declare men guilty of crime, and thereupon to punish them without trial, without decency, and without law. And that is what this proposes to do.

I further hold that, in reference to every one of these cases, under every one of these numerous laws of Congress, there is no way in the world by which any one of the penalties denounced against the crime of desertion can be inflicted upon a deserter except upon the judgment of a duly constituted court-martial. No civil tribunal can try any one, be he criminal or no criminal, for any offense against the military laws of the country. The like never before has been claimed or attempted; the like ought never to be justified or palliated; for it is a perversion of the most sacred guarantees of civil liberty. Are you to transfer the punishment of military offenses to civil tribunals? Why, sir, the like has never been heard of, has never been yet claimed in the history of this country. If you will look into Justice Story you will find that in his opinion no power can adjudge or punish for military crimes except military tribunals. No law of Ohio declares desertion shall work disfranchisement, nor be tried or punished in any way whatever under the laws of that State, in any tribunals, civil or military. Nor does that law give any authority, jurisdiction, or power to any board of election officers to even inquire into a charge of desertion against an elector.

The court in Pennsylvania proceed and say:

"The spirit of these constitutional provisions is briefly that no person can be made to suffer for a criminal offense unless the penalty be inflicted by due process of law. What that is has been often defined, but never better than it was, both historically and critically, by Judge Curtis, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Dean vs. Murray, (18 Howard, 272.) It ordinarily implies and includes a complainant, a defendant, and a judge, regular allegations, opportunity to answer, and a trial according to some settled course of judicial proceeding."

Yet, my honorable colleague on the committee [Mr. SCOFIELD] undertakes to say to this House that these petty election boards, mere ministerial tribunals organized under the laws of the State of Ohio, have the power under a Federal law to sit in judgment upon men charged with desertion, and to try, convict, and punish those men. Yes, that is the novel and startling doctrine upon which this case is to rest. A mere election board, not one of whom is a judge, not one of whom has ever studied law, not one of whom it may be ever saw a military camp, not one of whom is competent to sit in judgment upon any case where crime is the basis of accusation, is to decide in these cases the most precious rights of citizens, and inflict the bitter and humiliating punishment of disfranchisement, not under State laws, but under Federal laws. This seems to me like going from the sacred guarantees of Magna Charta back to the chaos of arbitrary power.

These election boards are competent to decide the legality of the votes of the citizens of Ohio so far only as they are expressly empowered to do under the laws of that State.

The honorable gentleman says that election boards do, in very many cases, determine judicial questions; and in his brief he forgets himself or the facts so far as to declare that they do sometimes determine the question whether a person is guilty of the crime of bribery or not. He ought to know that under the laws of Ohio no elector can be punished for accepting a bribe for his vote. In the open light of day he may take into his filthy and polluted hand a price for his vote, and with the price in one hand and his ballot in the other he may cast the ballot for the price, and yet under the laws of Ohio he cannot be punished. It is wonderful that such is the law; but it is the law, else my search into the statutes of Ohio has been most unfortunate. It is true that a candidate for an office or an elector may be punished under the laws of Ohio for offering a bribe; but no man can be punished for receiving a bribe and selling his vote.

But we are told that these election boards do determine facts. So they do; but what kind of facts do they determine? They determine such facts as these: whether a voter is of age; whether he is a minor; whether he is an idiot; whether he is insane; whether he is a legal resident of the county and precinct in which he offers to vote; whether he has been convicted of crime; and whether he is naturalized under the laws of the United States. But let me invite the attention of every fair-minded man to the fact, never to be forgotten in a case like this, that these election boards have no power under any system of laws in this country to determine anything except some single, naked fact, not crime, not guilt—never. They may determine mere facts which have no connection with guilt; that is to say, with guilt to be adjudicated upon by the election board. If a man is not of age that is a fact; it is something that inheres in and constitutes a part of the person, but is not a crime. If a man is an unnaturalized foreigner, or if he has too much negro blood in his veins, neither of those is a fact based upon allegations of crime. If he is a murderer, and is so charged upon challenge before an election board, the board may ask for the record of his conviction of murder, and if that be produced may find the fact that he is a convicted criminal; but the board does not try the question of guilt, but only finds the fact of conviction by the record of a legal trial elsewhere had.

It simply determines upon a fact, which fact excludes the vote. I say, therefore, that nowhere—under no system of State laws—can any gentleman show me that the duty has ever been imposed upon these boards to settle questions of alleged crime; and it is simply monstrous, it is simply outrageous, for any Congress, for any power in the country, to undertake to confer such jurisdiction upon such incompetent tribunals.

I also invite attention to the fact that under the repeated adjudications of the Supreme Court and of the State courts, it is not competent for the Federal Government to confer judicial power on any tribunals of the States, whether judicial tribunals or ministerial tribunals. The Federal Government must constitute its own courts, must enforce its own laws, must try and convict and punish its own offenders; it cannot commit that duty to petty tribunals of the State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is proposed by the majority of this committee to do these things monstrous in themselves, utterly untenable as propositions of law, utterly in violation of civil liberty. But it is proposed further that these persons so charged with desertion shall rest forever—yes, forever—under the ban of Federal legislative condemnation, adjudged, or rather declared guilty of crime, and forever denied a trial. Why? Because in 1865, when the war had ceased, the Federal Government, on the 13th day of April, by an order issued from the headquarters of the military power of the Government, declared that the provost marshals throughout the country should discontinue the business of recruiting and drafting in all the districts of the States until further orders. Then, on the 14th of the same month, by order of the Secretary of War it was commanded that all men drafted under the call of December 19, 1864, who had not been forwarded to general rendezvous shall be released. This order did not apply to substitutes already mustered in.

And, Mr. Speaker, I call attention still further to this remarkable fact, I say in the history of this case a most remarkable fact, worthy to receive the gravest consideration of every member of the House, that on the 17th day of October, 1865, long after these alleged crimes of desertion had been committed, and long before the election at which the sitting member was elected to this House, it was ordered by the Secretary of War as follows, and I hope gentlemen of the House will give attention to the language of the order:

[General Orders, No. 152.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, October 17, 1865.

Hereafter no person shall be arrested as a deserter for having failed to report under any draft, or for any other non-compliance with the enrollment act, or the amendments thereto. Any and all persons of this class now held will be immediately discharged.

By order of the Secretary of War:
E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

In pursuance thereof all this business was stopped, and all such persons were discharged. And now the country finds itself in this novel condition: these men, these alleged deserters, by the very order of their own Government, to the end of time, are to be denied not only a trial but an opportunity in any kind of judicial or military proceeding to vindicate their innocence.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WOODWARD. I move that the gentleman's time be extended for another hour.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I shall not object to the extension of time to the gentleman. I do not care how much time he has; but at the end of that hour I design to call for the previous question. I think four hours are enough for this debate; and if the House will sustain me in demanding the previous question it will be entirely satisfactory to me if one member shall consume the whole time on that side.

Mr. WOODWARD's motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, if I can, I will get through in a shorter time.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman concede the majority to be in favor of the contestant if the votes of these alleged deserters were rejected?

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, in answer to my friend I have this to say, that in my judgment, after a most deliberate and careful examination of this case, I do most sincerely and profoundly believe that in no aspect of this case can this House justly give this seat to the contestant. No, sir; in no possible attitude of the case. I say if you give him every one of these deserters' votes, or rather deny them to the sitting member, you cannot under any possible judicial determination of the other questions in the case give him the seat.

I think, Mr. Speaker, in reference to the order that I have just read, it must be held, and ought to be held by this court, if this law of March 3, 1865, possesses any validity whatever, to have the legal effect of forever discharging not only from arrest, but from every charge of crime. Is it just; does it become the dignity, the magnanimity, and honor of a great Government to charge citizens with crime by mere legislative declarations and yet deny them an opportunity to vindicate their innocence? This order amounts to a dismissal of all charges, a kind of amnesty or pardon against all offenses arising out of the enrollment and draft laws.

Now, I desire to read a little further from this judicial opinion:

"But I can call to mind no instance in which it has been held that the ascertainment of guilt of a public offense and the imposition of legal penalties can be in any other mode than by trial according to the law of the land, or due process of law—that is, the law of the particular case, administered by a judicial tribunal authorized to adjudicate upon it. And I cannot persuade myself that a judge of elections or a board of election officers, constituted under the State laws, is such a tribunal. I cannot think they have power to try criminal offenders, still less to adjudge the guilt or innocence of an alleged violator of the laws of the United States. A trial before such officers is not due process of law for the punishment of offenses according to the meaning of the phrase in the Constitution. There are, it is true, many things which they may determine, such as the age and residence of a person offering to vote, whether he has paid taxes, and whether, if born an alien, he has a certificate of naturalization. These things pertain to the ascertainment of a political right; but whether he has been guilty of a criminal offense and has as a consequence forfeited his right is an inquiry of a different character. Neither our Constitution nor our law has conferred upon the judges of elections any such judicial functions. They are not sworn to try issues in criminal cases. They have no power to compel the attendance of witnesses, and their judgment, if rendered, would be binding upon no other tribunal. Even if they were to assume jurisdiction of the offense described in the act of Congress, and proceed to try whether the applicant for a vote had been duly enrolled and drafted, whether he had received notice of the draft, whether he had deserted and failed to return to service, or failed to report to a provost marshal, and whether he had justifying reasons for such failure, and if after such trial they were to decide that he had not forfeited his citizenship, all this would not amount to an acquittal. It would not protect him against a subsequent similar accusation and trial, would not protect him against trial and punishment by a court-martial. Surely that is no trial by due process of law the judgment in which is not final, decides nothing, but leaves the accused exposed to another trial in a different tribunal, and to the imposition by that other tribunal of the full punishment prescribed by law. It is not in the power of Congress to confer upon such a tribunal, which is exclusively of State creation, jurisdiction to try offenses against the United States. The doctrine seems a plain one that Congress cannot vest any of the judicial power of the United States in the courts of any other government or sovereignty. (Martin vs. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat., 304, 330; Blythe vs. Peck, 7 Conn., 242; and Seville vs. Canfield, 14 Johns., 338.) And clearly if this is so Congress cannot make a board of State election officers competent to try whether a person has been guilty of an offense against the United States, and if they find him guilty to enforce a part of the prescribed penalty.

I invite attention to another paragraph touching the true construction of the law. The same court, after an examination of all the laws of Congress on the subject of desertion and its punishment, gives the following just construction to the act of 1865:

"All these acts of Congress manifestly contemplate trial for desertion in courts-martial, and the infliction of no punishment or forfeiture except upon conviction and sentence in such courts. The act of 1866 provided for general courts-martial, and made minute and careful regulations for their organization, for the conduct of their proceedings, and for the approval or disapproval of their sentences. Subsequent acts made some changes, but they have not restrained the jurisdiction or diminished the powers of such courts. It is to such a code of laws, forming a system devised for the punishment of desertion, that the twenty-first section of the act of March 3, 1865, was added. It refers plainly to preëxisting laws. It has the single object of increasing the penalties, but it does not undertake to change or dispense with the machinery provided for punishing the crime. The common rules of construction demand that it be read as if it had been incorporated into the former acts. And if it had not been, if the act of 1866 and its supplements had prescribed that the penalty for desertion, or failure to report within a designated time after notice of draft—which the act of 1863 declares desertion—should be punished on conviction of the same with forfeiture of citizenship and death, or in lieu of the latter, such other punishment as, by the sentence of a court-martial, may be inflicted, would any one contend that any portion of this punishment could be inflicted without conviction and sentence? Assuredly not; and if not, so must the act of 1865 be construed now. It means that the forfeiture which it prescribes, like all other penalties for desertion, must be adjudged to the convicted person, after trial by court-martial, and sentence approved. For the conviction and sentence of such a court there can be no substitute. They alone establish the guilt of the accused and fasten upon him the legal consequences. Such, we think, is the true meaning of the act—a construction that cannot be denied to it without losing sight of all the previous legislation respecting the same subject-matter, no part of which does this act profess to alter.

It may be added that this construction is not only required by the universally admitted rules of statutory interpretation, but it is in harmony with the personal rights secured by the Constitution, and which Congress must be presumed to have kept in view. It gives to the accused a trial before sworn judges, a right to challenge, an opportunity of defense, the privilege of hearing the witnesses against him, and of calling witnesses in his behalf. It preserves to him the common law presumption of innocence until he has been adjudged guilty according to the forms of law. It gives finality to a single trial. If tried by a court-martial and acquitted his innocence can never again be called in question, and he can be made to suffer no part of the penalties presented for guilt. On the other hand, if a record of conviction by a lawful court be not a prerequisite to suffering the penalty of the law, the act of Congress may work intolerable hardships."

Let me call the attention of the House one moment to the language of the act itself. The learned gentleman who presented this case for the majority [Mr. SCOFIELD] has not cited the act; he has taken good care not to do that. He read a part only of section twenty-one, which does not give a just and adequate idea of the true scope and meaning of the whole act. What does that act say? "That in addition to the other lawful penalties of the crime of desertion," &c.; not an original act, not an act to be executed and enforced by State law or State tribunals, but it is a law enacted "in addition to," as a part of, as an amendment to a preëxisting law of Congress on that same subject. It is what lawyers would call a law in pari materia. It is a law which must be construed in connection with and as a part of a preëxisting statute.

Now, this law prescribes an additional penalty to the crime of desertion from the military or naval service of the United States. When the honorable gentleman cited this section it might justly have been inferred by members unfamiliar with it that this law by its terms had undertaken expressly to confer this kind of jurisdiction upon these petty tribunals. I say to you that there is nowhere in this section, nor in this law, nor in any law of Congress, from the beginning of the Government to this blessed hour, any provision in which the Federal Government has ever attempted to commit to any tribunal of the State the adjudication of any such case or of any such fact. It is all assumption; it is not law, and it cannot be found in the law, and I challenge the production of one single line to justify any such construction or interpretation.

Mr. Speaker, I will not give further time to the consideration of this general question about deserters. I now come to consider the case of Pike township, which, it is claimed by the report of the majority, the House ought to reject; and to this I beg to call the attention of members while I state, as briefly as I can, the material facts in the case. In that township, it is alleged by the contestant, that Salathiel Parrish, one of the judges, was a deserter from the draft of 1864 and therefore incompetent from disability as a citizen to act in that capacity. He was not a man of foreign birth or origin, but was a native citizen of Ohio. He was convicted of no crime under that State. He had never been adjudged by any court of the State or Federal Government, civil or military, to have forfeited his citizenship or rights as a citizen. Salathiel Parrish, by the testimony to which I have invited the attention of the House, is shown not to have been a deserter at all. This same man, on whose action alone it is attempted by the majority to reject the vote of this township, so as to deprive the contestee of one hundred and forty votes to which he is most justly and legally entitled, was never a deserter. On the contrary, he put in a substitute to relieve himself from every obligation under this draft law. That is the evidence, and I challenge its successful contradiction.

I further invite the attention of the House to the fact that in the notice of the contestant to the contestee there is not one word said about the qualification or disqualification of Salathiel Parrish as judge of election. He has had no notice of any election contest on that ground until he went to make out his evidence upon record before this committee. Yet it is attempted here, without any previous notice, without giving any opportunity to the sitting member to contest or controvert this fact, to rest the whole case upon this foundation.

But fortunately for the ends of justice, the sitting member has shown by the most unquestionable testimony that not one solitary material fact exists to justify the exclusion of this poll on account of the disqualification of that election officer.

Now, then, it is not proved, as I have said, that he was a deserter. It is not proved that he is the same person who by that name it is alleged did desert. But it is proved by the testimony of David Porch (H. Mis. Doc. 38, part 2, p. 276, et seq.) that Salathiel Parrish, who was the election officer, had furnished, according to law, a substitute, and was released from the draft in 1864. When the honorable gentleman came to make up his report in this case he thought he could rest the rejection of the vote of this township on the case of Howard vs. Cooper, reported in Contested Election Cases, (vol. 2, p. 282,) but he has discovered in some way that that case does not sustain his position at all, because in that case there was no analogy to this. In that case but two persons pretended to act as judges. There was, therefore, no compliance with the law; but in the case under consideration there was an actual compliance with the law, and even if Parrish were incompetent for the reasons alleged, yet no fraud being alleged or proved, he was a judge de facto, and the election was clearly valid. In this connection I refer to Miliken vs. Fuller, Bartlett's Contested Election Case, page 176; Ohio, &c. vs. Ritt, American Law Register for December, 1867, page 90; Barret vs. Reed, 2 Ohio, 410; Johnson vs. Stedman, 3 Ohio, 96; Elden vs. Sexton, 5 Ohio, 216, all of which are directly in point.

But I have a more authoritative decision on this point, which ought to challenge the approval of the majority in this House. The laws of Ohio provide that if either of the judges of the election shall be a candidate for a State or county office it shall be the duty of the electors present to elect a suitable person to act as judge in the place of said candidate.

In the contested-election case of Grosvenor, Republican, vs. Golden, Democrat, before the Senate of Ohio in 1865-66, one of the grounds of contest was that Erwin Moore, one of the judges of election, was a candidate for county commissioner, and was thereby precluded by the express terms of the statute from acting as judge of the election. The Senate which tried and decided this contest was three fifths Republican. In speaking of a judge of the election being a candidate, the majority of the committee, in their report, say:

"The committee find this contrary to a provision of the statute. But they further find that he (Moore) did not act corruptly, but in ignorance of the law."

What did Salathiel Parrish do? Have they proved any corruption or irregularity against him? Have they proved any dishonest acts on his part? Did he tamper with the polls? Not one thing have they proved. Not one word has been said that soils the fair name of this man as an officer of that election. He was regularly chosen by the electors to hold that election.

"The committee regard said action as irregular; yet they are of opinion, and so find, that all the really essential requisites to constitute a valid election were observed in this case. The election was held at the proper time and place and by competent authority, (to wit, the township trustees.) That there was no evidence of fraud in conducting the same, and no doubt about the result."

That is exactly the case here.

"In view of these facts, we are unable to assign any satisfactory reason for rejecting this return." * * * "The evidence is clear that the election was conducted with entire fairness. We are therefore of opinion that we can neither allege want of authority in the election board, fraud in conducting the election, nor any uncertainty about the result. The supreme court of this State have decided in the cases of Ohio vs. Choate, 11 O. R., p. 511; Ohio vs. Aibey, 12 O. R., p. 16; Ohio vs. Jacobs, 17 O. R., pp. 151, 152, that where an officer acts under the color of authority his acts will be binding, although in point of law and right he was no such officer. And if the acts of a person who acts by color of authority alone will be sustained, there is certainly much greater reason for sustaining the acts of a real officer, although the mode of his action has been irregular."

The majority of the committee reported, therefore, that the Democrat should retain his seat against the claim of the Republican on this same ground, and the Republican Senate adopted that resolution by a vote of 23 against 11.

I hold, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that Salathiel Parrish in this case was as good an officer as any who sat upon an election board in Ohio; and I hold, also, that if this law against deserters were a valid and constitutional law, still his proceedings as a member of that board are legal and valid, and must be held good by this House, because he acted under color of authority. He was legally chosen; his conduct was regular; there is no fraud proved; there is no bad faith shown; there is no taint found upon any single act of his. Under such circumstances the acts of the officer, whether he possessed the legal qualifications to constitute him an officer de jure or not, have always been held by all the courts of the country to be valid. In the leading case on this subject, of the People vs. Cook, 14 Barbour, 239, the court say:

"It is sufficient that they were inspectors de facto. They came into office by color of title, and that is sufficient to constitute them officers de facto. The rule is well settled by a long series of adjudications, both in England and this country, that acts done by those who are officers de facto are good and valid as regards the public, and third persons who have an interest in their acts; and the rule has been applied to acts judicial as well as ministerial in their character. This doctrine has been held and applied to almost every conceivable case."

I could cite authorities to the same effect to almost any number. Out of the immense number of American cases in which this doctrine has been emphatically stated as the law, I deem it sufficient to cite the following: Commonwealth vs. Fowler, 10 Mass., 301; Mason vs. Dillingham, 15 Mass., 170; McGregor vs. Bach, &c., 14 Vermont, 428; Cummings vs. Clark, 15 Vermont, 653; Keyler vs. McKissom, 2 Rawle; Neal vs. Overseers, 5 Watts, 538; Bond vs. Bank Washington, 11 S. & R., 411; McKean vs. Summers, 2 Penn., 297; Barrett vs. Reed, 2 Ohio, 410; Johnson vs. Stedman, 3 Ohio, 96; Elden vs. Sexton, 5 Ohio, 216; St. Louis Co. vs. Sparks, 10 Mo., 117; Pritchett vs. People, 1 Gilm., 511, 529; Cook vs. Hall, 1 Gilm., 580; People vs. Ammon, 5 Gilm., 170; 13 Mich., 527; 1 Mon., (Ky.), 297.

But the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] says that he has discovered another authority on which the House may reject the vote of Pike township, because of the disqualification of Salathiel Parrish. And that is the case of Jackson vs. Wayne (1 Cont. Elec. Cas., p. 47) that came up from the State of Georgia to this House. Now, my worthy colleague is a lawyer, and I have a right to expect that when he invites the attention of the House to a decision he will at least have the kindness to give to that decision the only construction it will bear; that he will at least have the frankness to read that decision to the House, in order that the House may be its own judge, if he is not willing himself to put a construction upon the case.

What did the House decide in that case? I ask the attention of gentlemen to it. I read from the syllabus of the case, which faithfully indicates all there is in it affecting the case now before the House:

"The law of Georgia requires that three magistrates shall preside at elections; and it was held that a return by three persons, two of whom were not magistrates, was defective."

"Two of whom were not magistrates." Well, what has that to do with this case? If the law of Ohio held that this election should have been conducted by three township trustees, and Salathiel Parrish was no trustee at all, then this decision would apply. But this decision has no application at all to this case. In Georgia two of the election officers were not magistrates at all. Therefore they were not acting under color of authority; they were neither officers de jure nor de facto. They had no legal right to preside at that election; they were not chosen magistrates at all, regularly or irregularly, under color of law or without it. In this case Salathiel Parrish was acting under the color of law, elected according to law in every particular. And the honorable gentleman only objects to him because he was not personally competent to be elected as a member of that election board because he was charged with desertion.

Now, suppose that Salathiel Parrish had been a citizen of Indiana, or a citizen of Great Britain never naturalized, yet if the people of Pike township, in pursuance of law, under color of law, had elected him to preside at that election, he would still have every particle of legal authority that is necessary to make valid the proceedings of that board, because he would be acting under color of legal authority. And the decisions are too numerous to be cited, to the effect that all such proceedings of such boards, as to all third persons, must be held to be legal, valid, and binding.

Mr. Speaker, I desire now to have the attention of the House very briefly to a consideration of the alleged non-residents. In reference to the legal votes rejected, to the alleged alien votes, and the alleged minors, I respectfully invite the attention of gentlemen to my report under those respective heads, and there they will find the law and the facts that pertain to each one, stated according to my examination of the case.

On page 27 of my report I state my conclusion touching the alleged non-resident votes that were cast for the contestant; and when the other day I came to compare my results with those of the honorable gentleman who made the report of the majority here, I found some singular differences.

For instance, if gentlemen will refer to page 12 of the brief of the contestant, made by the contestant himself, they will find that 19 persons are there put down as having voted illegally for him, who are either idiots, minors, or non-residents. And those 19 the contestant, in his recapitulation of his own case, upon his own examination and presentation of it to the Committee of Elections, admits ought to be rejected, yet, in making his report in this case, I find to my surprise that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] has refused to reject from the count of the contestant some of the persons whom the contestant himself confesses were illegal voters, and should not have been allowed to vote. I would like to have the honorable gentleman answer why he is not willing to deduct from the vote of the contestant the number the contestant himself confesses were illegal.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Does the gentleman wish me to answer his question at this time?

Mr. KERR. Certainly.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If there is any name which the contestant himself admitted was that of a non-resident, as the gentleman says, and it has not been deducted, it has been by some mistake. The gentleman will recollect that it was a vast labor to go over all these names; he had almost a month of time; the majority were waiting for the minority to get ready, and there may be some errors in that long list of names.

But I am satisfied that if there are any such, they are not enough in any event to affect the result. I presume the gentleman from Indiana will acknowledge that I intended to be perfectly fair in the treatment of the evidence.

Mr. KERR. I accept the gentleman's explanation, but I will add that while I admit that the case involved great labor, yet I think it required just as much from me as from him. My duty was no less than his, and his no less than mine, and if I had a month of time, he had two months, and the House must judge whose has been most faithfully discharged.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the contestee, that the entire vote of Blue Rock township shall be rejected; and I invite the attention of the House to the facts in that case.

It is claimed by the sitting member that, by reason of alleged gross frauds, irregularities, and menacing disturbances at the election in Blue Rock township, Muskingum county, the entire poll should be rejected. The material facts in reference to the precinct are as follows:

The officers of the election were all the political friends of the contestant. One hundred and twenty persons voted there in 1866 who did not vote there in 1865. In 1865, at the Governor's election, 129 votes were cast for Cox, the Republican candidate, and 79 votes for Morgan, the Democratic candidate, making the majority for Cox 50. At the congressional election in 1866, 206 votes are returned for the contestant, and 89 for the sitting member. The majority for Mr. Delano is 117, and his increase over the vote for Cox, in 1865, is 67, and the increase in the township since 1865 is 87, and the increase in the vote for Mr. Morgan is 10. In 1867, 711 more votes were cast than ever before in the thirteenth district, yet in that year the whole vote in this precinct was 258, being 37 less than in 1866, and Hays, the Republican candidate for Governor, received in 1867 155 votes, being 51 votes less than Mr. Delano had in 1866, and Thurman, the Democratic candidate, received 103, being 14 more than Mr. Morgan had in 1866.

The polls were closed for one hour by the election officers at dinner time. The law of Ohio requires them to be opened "between the hours of six and ten o'clock in the morning," and continued open until six o'clock in the afternoon. The district court of Hamilton county, Ohio, by Justice Brinkerhoff, a distinguished member of the supreme court of Ohio, has decided, since the election in controversy, that—

"Under the Ohio statute, passed March 3, 1852, 'to regulate the election of State and county officers,' (3 Curwen's Rev. Stat., section 1920,) after the polls of an election have been once opened between the hours of six and ten in the morning in pursuance thereto, they cannot be closed for any purpose until six o'clock in the afternoon, without rendering the election illegal and void."—State vs. Ait et al., Am. L. Reg. for December, 1867, p. 88.

The State of Ohio has a right to enact her own election laws, and they are binding upon this Congress. It has been the habitual practice of Congress for fifty years to follow as its guide the laws regulating elections in the States of this Union. The judicial tribunals of the State are the highest authority that can interpret the election laws of a State. One of those tribunals, of Republican organization, has adjudicated one of these laws, and has so ruled as that the election in this township must be held to be utterly void.

I hold in my hand the decision of Judge Brinkerhoff in that case, concurred in by his four associates. The court use the following language:

"It was beyond dispute that for about the space of two hours the judges and clerk of election left the polls and took the ballot box away, returning afterward and resuming the election. There is no pretense that the ballot-box was tampered with, but that the judges rather acted in ignorance of what their duties were."

"The court is of opinion that such conduct on the part of the judges goes to the substance of the election and renders it void in toto. The statute prescribes that the polls shall be opened at a given hour in the morning and closed at a given hour in the afternoon. It was the express design of the Legislature that all the time between those hours the polls should be kept open for the convenience of any elector or who may choose to present his ballot. The court does not agree with counsel that it lies on the party contesting the election to show affirmatively that the closing of the polls influenced the result. The law gives the elector the privilege of consulting his own convenience as to what hour of the day he will visit the polls, and it is a fair presumption that if the polls were temporarily closed for dinner, as was proved, a portion of the electors were deprived of that privilege."

In that case the judge says:

"There is no pretense that the ballot-box was tampered with, but that the judges rather acted in ignorance of what their duties were."

That is all Salathiel Parrish did; nay, he did not even do that.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KERR. I will yield for a question.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether he believes the decision of Judge Brinkerhoff, to which he has referred, to be good law? and I wish also to say that the decision was made by the district court—

Mr. KERR. I am unwilling to be interrupted any further. I have already stated the fact that the decision was made by the district court.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me a single remark?

Mr. KERR. Let me answer first the question of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understand the majority and the minority to agree upon the point that the returns from these townships should not be rejected because the officers went to dinner.

Mr. KERR. I will answer both gentlemen. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] that speaking for myself as a member of this House, desiring to disfranchise no one, but to give every one the full benefit of the legal votes to which he is entitled, I will say that if there existed in this case no other fact than the adjournment of the election officers at the dinner hour I would not ask this House to reject the poll.

But I say that I am bound to let my judgment in this case be controlled by this judicial decision of Ohio when, in connection with it, there are shown to be facts of fraud, of wrongdoing, of corruption, of irregularity, that ought to, independently of this fact, entirely reject this vote. And, therefore, I will say, in conclusion of my statement of this part of the case, upon all these facts and upon the law, I reject this poll.

In the summer of 1865 there sprang up in this township a great deal of excitement about the alleged existence of petroleum there, and large numbers of transient persons, as laborers, speculators, and mechanics, and others, came into the township without intending to become citizens of it, and many of them are alleged to have illegally voted.

Now, in this connection, the gentleman who made the report for the majority said there is no evidence tending to show any voters at this precinct who were not legal residents were allowed to vote. I am surprised to hear statements like that from the gentleman.

There were great irregularities, frauds, and disturbances attending the conduct of the election, which can be best indicated by the repetition here of the material parts of the testimony on these points.

Thomas L. Elwell testifies (part 2, p. 579) that—

"The companies were principally formed in the fall of 1865 and spring of 1866. They came from different portions of Ohio, Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. They may have been from other States, but I recollect of hearing of men from these States. Men from these different places performed the labor. These were principally from Virginia. I knew one man from New Jersey by the name of Cox."

"Question. With what political party did the non-resident oil men act in Blue Rock township at the October election, 1866?"

"Answer. Principally with the Republican party, with one or two exceptions."

"Question. State what you know relative to there having been an exodus of oil men from Blue Rock township immediately after the last October election."

"Answer. The exodus was general; the oil men generally left immediately after the election."

James White testifies, (part 2, p. 608 :)—

"Question. How long have you resided in Blue Rock township, Muskingum county?"

"Answer. A little over fifty years."

"Question. State with what political party the non-resident oil men in Blue Rock township acted at the last October election."

"Answer. Well, sir, as far as I know, they voted the Republican ticket; I understood there was one voted the Democratic ticket; his name was Stitley."

"Question. Please state what was the conduct and bearing of the active Republican friends of Mr. Delano toward members of the Democratic party while at the polls."

"Objected to."

"Answer. I thought they were a little rougher than ever I had seen there."

"Question. Describe what that conduct was."

"Answer. Well, I have been a voter there all my life, and never saw as much abuse to old citizens; they called them rebels and everything they could lay their tongues to."

"Question. State whether or not you and other Democrats were intimidated from asserting your right as challengers by the conduct of the friends of Mr. Delano."

"Answer. There were three old members went into the house and thought we would challenge some of their votes; they commenced abusing us till I backed out, and went out of the house and stayed out."

"Question. State whether or not Democrats were generally induced to leave the polls in consequence of the abuse and threats of the friends of Mr. Delano."

"Answer. They did run two Democrats off; the Democrats came, and would go right off again."

"Cross-examined by W. R. Sapp, attorney for contestant."

"Question. What political party do you belong to, and for whom did you vote for Congress at the last October election?"

"Answer. I belong to the Democratic party, and voted for Mr. Morgan."

"Question. Will you please name any Democrats who left the place where the election was held by reason of abuse, &c.?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I can tell you two; Mr. Farrel and Mr. Silvey."

"Question. What was said to them, and by whom?"

"Answer. After they had got on their horses ready to go, there was a great band of them with Tom McClees, whooping and hallooing and urging them on; I couldn't tell you the words they said, for they were all cursing."

"Question. Now you say this was when those gentlemen got on their horses to leave for home; that could not have been the cause of their leaving, could it?"

"Answer. The cause of their leaving was they were abusing them; Mr. Silvey said something and Slater slapped his hand over his mouth, and then they swarmed around him."

Joseph McDonald testifies, (part 2, p. 624 :)—

"Question. How long have you resided in Blue Rock township, Muskingum county, Ohio?"

"Answer. Since 1816."

"Question. Were you at the election held for State and county officers and members of Congress in said township in October, 1866?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. Please state what you know relative to the judges of said election refusing to swear non-resident oil men when they were challenged. As nearly as you can, please state what was said."

"Answer. They said they fetched them in as stragglers or Methodist preachers, who had a right to vote wherever they were; there were some few sworn; the balance were not sworn; the judges said it was not worth while."

"Question. Please state who requested the judges of said election to have the non-resident oil men sworn?"

"Answer. I did myself, and also heard other persons do so, but do not recollect who. They said they had not time to swear all of them, and they passed the oil men into the class of stragglers and Methodist preachers."

"Question. Please state to what political party the judges of said election belonged, and whether all the trustees of said township officiated as judges at said election?"

"Answer. They were Republicans; there were only two of them officiated; John Patton was appointed in Mr. Sterrett's place; Mr. Sterrett was there and voted, but was sick and went home; Mr. Patton was also a Republican."

"Question. Please state what was the conduct and bearing of the active friends of Mr. Delano at that election to members of the Democratic party."

"Answer. They were more like a mob than anything else."

"Question. State what you know relative to Democrats having been driven from the polls by threats and intimidations."

"Answer. One gentleman there, I have forgotten his name, he was a Democrat, they brought him up and examined him; he answered all the questions that were put to him, and the mob called him a secessionist. They did not let him vote; put him off till the afternoon; he was willing to swear that he had been two years in the county, two years in the State, and six months in the township."

"Question. To what political party did the non-resident oil men, who voted in Blue Rock township at the last October election, belong?"

"Answer. They belonged to the Republican party generally; there were few Democrats."

John Silvey testifies, (part 2, p. 638 :)—

"Question. How long have you resided in Blue Rock township, Muskingum county, Ohio?"

"Answer. Ever since I was born, about forty-three years."

"Question. Please state whether you were present at the election held in Blue Rock township for State and county officers and members of Congress in October, 1866?"

"Answer. I was."

"Question. State what you know relative to the judges of said election refusing to swear non-resident oil men when challenged?"

"Answer. Mr. McDonald and I went into the polls and requested them to swear these oil men; the reply was that it was not necessary; that Mr. Peyton's reference was enough; that they are the same as a Methodist preacher on a circuit; wherever they were at the time was their residence; nothing further said in my presence."

"Question. Please state whether or not Democrats were intimidated from challenging by the conduct of the active friends of Mr. Delano at that election?"

"Answer. Well, I suppose they were."

"Question. State what was the conduct toward Democrats by the active friends of Mr. Delano at that election?"

"Answer. Why, if the Democrats were to speak, fifteen or twenty would run up and shake their fists at you and menace you, and threaten to beat you or whip you."

"Question. For how long was that election suspended by the judges at noon?"

"Answer. I could not tell you; I was not there just at noon."

"Question. Please state whether the Democrats, or many of them, remained at the polls during the election, or went home; and if they did not remain, what was the reason?"

"Answer. Well, there did not appear to be many of them remain at the polls. I think there was a reason of too much rabble and too much fuss."

"Question. With what political party did the non-resident oil men in Blue Rock township act at the last October election?"

"Answer. As a general thing with the Republican party."

"Question. Now, can you give the facts which make them non-residents according to law; we want facts and not your opinion?"

"Answer. The fact is this: they were there a few days before the election; they were there at the election, but they were not there a few days after the election, and they are not there now—that is, a majority of them."

I will not read further from the testimony as to the scandalous, unlawful, and outrageous conduct which characterized the proceedings of the officers at that poll. I say upon all the evidence in this case, giving it the fairest and most charitable construction any fair-minded man can put upon it, it does not lie in this House for one moment to do otherwise than reject this poll as being wholly corrupt, as being tainted with unlawful conduct, with fraud and corruption.

Other witnesses swear that numerous persons desired to vote for the contestee and were not allowed to do so; that numerous persons, his friends, were driven from the polls and not allowed to vote, and that on the day after this election, or two or three days afterward, nearly all these transient Methodist preacher rascals emigrated from that township, and left the country for the country's good.

In my judgment all the proof touching this precinct discloses such a condition of disorder and violence, and so many gross irregularities, frauds, and unlawful acts, on the part of the election officers and the friends of the contestant, that it is impossible to deduce the truth from the returns. It is impossible, upon an impartial examination of all the evidence, not to conclude that there were committed numerous, palpable, and corrupt violations of the law in rejecting legal and receiving illegal votes, in refusing to regard challenges, in permitting confessedly transient itinerant persons to vote because they were like Methodist preachers, and in other acts detailed in the testimony. These conclusions are further greatly strengthened by the facts concerning the remarkable changes in the votes in this township between the years 1865, 1866, and 1867. We refer in this connection, as authority, to Blair vs. Barrett, 2 Cont. Elec. Cas., p. 308; Knox vs. Blair, Id., p. 521, and cases there cited; Howard vs. Cooper, Id., p. 275; Kneass's case, Parson's Select Cas., p. 553, and Washburn vs. Voorhees, in the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire as briefly as possible to invite the attention of the House to one more return that I esteem it to be my indispensable duty upon the law and the facts to advise this House to reject; and that is the poll of Clinton township. In that township there was also an adjournment, and therefore, under the decision of Judge Brinkerhoff, that poll is by the very force of this unauthorized adjournment null and void. I do not rest the rejection of the poll on that fact alone. As in the other case, I rest it upon all the facts and circumstances connected with the election, as well as upon the law. Within the corporate limits of the township of Clinton, in Knox county, is situated the incorporated city of Mount Vernon, divided into five wards. The constitution of Ohio requires electors to vote in the county, township, and ward in which they reside. Will Congress set aside that law? Will Congress say that when Ohio says that a man shall vote where he lives, it means that he shall not vote where he lives, but somewhere else?

But the gentleman discovers that this law in this particular township was violated for twelve years. Suppose it was. That does not make it the duty of Congress to repeat that violation—to set aside the laws of the State. He also said that that violation had been recognized by every department of the government of Ohio. For that statement he has not one particle of authority. That irregularity has never been approved by any judicial tribunal or authorized ministerial officer of Ohio. It has simply been tolerated because no one has questioned it. It may be that the majorities were so great as to render a contest on that ground immaterial or ineffectual.

The laws of that State are still more specific on this point than the constitution itself, and they require, as I state in my report, that every person shall vote in the township or ward in which he may reside, and that he must have resided there the requisite period of time before he shall be entitled to vote. They also make it a penal offense, a felony, to vote anywhere else than in the township or ward in which he resides. Every person then residing in the city of Mount Vernon, in any ward of that city, who voted at that election, violated the criminal law of Ohio, and subjected himself to prosecution as for felony. Will you set aside these laws? Will Congress declare, in the teeth of all these facts and of this law, that this election is good and valid, because, forsooth, it gives to the contestant a majority of 381, and reject the vote of Pike township upon the most frivolous ground, because it gives the sitting member a majority of 140 votes?

In the city of Mount Vernon no election was held according to law. No attempt was made to hold any election according to law in said city as such, or in the respective wards thereof. An election was held within the territorial limits of the fourth ward, but it was held as a township, not as a ward election, and was held by the trustees of Clinton township, neither of whom was a councilman or officer of the city. At this election the electors of the township, including the city, voted. The votes of the citizens of the city and those of the citizens of the township outside the city were all deposited in the same ballot-box. The polls were closed by the officers of this election from thirty to sixty minutes between twelve m. and one o'clock p. m., and the ballot-box and poll-books were carried away and kept by the officers, all of whom were the political friends of the contestant. (See the decision of Justice Brinkerhoff, referred to in connection with Blue Rock township.) The working men in the foundries and workshops of the city generally voted during their dinner hour, from twelve to one o'clock, and were liable to lose wages if absent to vote at another hour. (Pt. 2, pp. 286, 287, 211, and Pt. 1, pp. 132, 133.) One of the officers of the election, John Y. Reeve, refused to administer the oath to many persons challenged by the friends of the contestee, and unlawfully and fraudulently deposited their ballots in utter disregard of the demands of competent challengers, and thus committed felonies punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary of the State. The law says that:

"If any judge" * * * "shall refuse or sanction the refusal by any other judge of the board to which he shall belong to administer either of the oaths or affirmations prescribed by the thirteenth and fifteenth sections of this act," * * * "(to be administered to any person whose right to vote is challenged,) he shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary and kept at hard labor not more than five years nor less than one year."

Here the election officer perpetrates a fraud, numerous frauds upon the sitting member at this poll, each one of which subjected him to a confinement in the penitentiary for at least one year; and yet this House is asked to set aside, ignore, and disregard this solemn enactment of the State of Ohio to regulate the conduct of her own elections and preserve the purity of the ballot-box.

Although I deem it wholly immaterial to effect the result of this contest whether the House exclude or admit the poll of this township, yet it becomes my imperative duty to present the facts, the law, and my views to the House. The law, in the conduct of this election, has not only been openly disregarded, but it has been also directly violated. No elections were held in the wards of the city. Their ballots were confused with those of the citizens of the township outside. It is no answer to say that the proper officers neglected to organize election boards in the city, and that the people therefore might vote at the township poll, because, in such case, it was the right and duty of the citizens at the time to select other officers, and proceed to hold the election according to law. The citizens of the city had no right to vote at all out of their respective wards, and to do so was to commit crime under the laws of Ohio. If all these things can be done without vitiating elections, then election laws become useless and inoperative. Upon the evidence in this case it is impossible to purge this poll of votes unlawfully cast, or to determine what electors of Clinton township voted at all, or for whom they voted. In Miller vs. Thompson, 2 Contested-Election Cases, page 118, it is held that "if the constitution and laws of a State require that electors shall vote only in the counties in which they reside, and at designated places in those counties, votes given at other than the designated places must be treated as nullities."

I do not feel at liberty for a moment to hesitate in the conclusion, upon all the grounds of fact and law, that it is my clear duty to reject this poll entirely. The vote returned for the contestant was 736, and for the contestee 355.

Now, in reference to these two precincts, I submit, that by the authorities in this House for the last seventy-five years the entire polls ought to be rejected. And I say, also, that in the absence of any material particle of proof of fraud or other irregularity the vote of Pike township can no more be rejected than you can reject every precinct in the whole thirteenth district of Ohio that gave the sitting member a majority.

Mr. Speaker, there are many other points to which I desired to invite the attention of the House in connection with the evidence as it has been presented by the author of the majority report. I have but a moment of time to refer to two or three cases.

He finds that William Murray, who voted in Clark township, was an illegal voter, and yet there is not one single syllable of testimony tending even to show that Mr. Murray was ever drafted, or in the Army, or was ever charged with desertion, and I defy the production of one solitary word of testimony to the contrary of my assertion.

And I do the same as to David Ford, who put in a substitute, and as to whom the proof is clear and overwhelming, and yet he is said to be an illegal voter.

The same is true of Josiah Pepper, who also put in a substitute.

The same is true of Frederick Spang, or Sperry, as he is sometimes called, who was drafted but did not vote, and yet he is charged to the sitting member as a deserter voting for him.

The same is true of George Billman and Henry Cutchall, and Jacob Cutchall, in Crawford township. There were three Jacob Cutchalls: one went into the Army, and after his return settled in White Eyes township; another was drafted, left the country, and never returned; and the third was not drafted nor in the Army, and remained at home, and he voted. And yet he is rejected, because, forsooth, his name was the same as that of the man who was in the Army and did not desert. He is alleged to be an illegal voter, and his vote is rejected for the sitting member. To all these assertions I challenge the production of one line of contrary evidence.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, obtained the floor.

Mr. KERR. Before I take my seat, I will ask leave of the House to add a little to my remarks when published, by way of completing my statement.

Mr. MULLINS. I move that the gentleman have longer time.

Mr. KERR. I only want about five minutes.

Mr. MULLINS. I hope the gentleman will be allowed that much time.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I do not care how much time the gentleman takes; he may occupy all the time on the other side of this question if gentlemen opposite choose. But I am opposed to devoting so much time to this case. I want to get to the end of it after awhile, and hear no more of the case of Delano vs. Morgan, which we have had before our committee for six months.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. WINDOM in the chair.) The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I would like to inquire whether there is an evening session ordered for to-night?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is not. Mr. SCOTFIELD. A great many members are under the impression that there is to be an evening session. I was aware there was not, and I wished to announce it to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Night sessions are to be held only when the House has the tax bill under consideration, as the Chair understands.

Mr. KERR. Have I leave to proceed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has leave.

Mr. KERR. I resume then where I was interrupted. The same is true of George Loan, who was not liable to draft because he was over forty-five years of age, and the testimony to which I have referred in my report shows this fact.

The same is true of Perry Wheeler, who was not drafted. Benjamin P. Wheeler was drafted, but did not vote; and Perry Wheeler is charged against the sitting member as a deserter and an illegal voter.

In one township in this congressional district the election officers left the lawful place where they were holding the election and went to the home of a sick man remote from the polls and there received his ballot and then returned to the lawful place of holding the election. I have rejected the vote of that man because it was received in palpable and clear violation of the law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I invite the attention of the House to my recapitulation of this case. I give to the contestant the legal votes returned for him, certified to him by the officers of the election, 12,957. I add to that 5 votes which were illegally rejected and ought to have been counted for him.

I also add 23 votes for the township of Linton, and 10 votes for the township of Monroe, increasing his aggregate vote to 12,995.

Then, upon a most careful examination of the whole case, I deduct from his vote 9 minors, 8 insane persons and idiots, 45 non-residents, and 10 non-resident students, who, in the express language of the law of Ohio, were not competent and qualified voters, because, according to the very language of that law, they had gone into Ohio "for a temporary purpose," intending, according to their own sworn testimony, to leave as soon as that temporary purpose was accomplished; and by a decision of one of the district courts of Ohio, made a few days ago, at the town of Xenia. By a unanimous decision of the court, composed almost entirely of Republicans, that class of persons were held to be illegal voters. I also deduct 117 votes for the contestant's illegally returned majority in Blue Rock township; 381 for his majority in Clinton township; 2 for a double vote in Jefferson township, and 1 for the vote of McCosland, or a total deduction of 573—leaving the contestant's just and legal vote 12,422.

I give to the contestee 13,228 votes returned for him. To that I add 1 vote thrown out in Jefferson township, and 3 legal votes which were rejected; making a total of 13,232. Then, on account of irregularities, I deduct 23 votes in Linton township and 10 votes in Monroe township; also the votes of 3 minors and 32 non-residents; or a total deduction of 88 votes, leaving a total aggregate of 13,144. From this deduct the vote allowed for the contestant, 12,422, and the legal majority for the contestee will be 742 votes.

In arriving at these results I have endeavored, to the utmost of my capacity, to act in a strictly and absolutely judicial spirit, to reject no vote and to receive no vote which, upon the facts and the law, my judgment did not hold should be rejected or received. Therefore in my own conscience I rest in a firm, absolute, unwavering, and most confident conviction that every single result I have reached is susceptible of being sustained before any judicial tribunal upon the evidence in the voluminous record of this case.

The examination of this evidence, as stated by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD] involved immense labor, greater labor than I ever before bestowed upon a subject of this kind. I bestowed that labor with a determination to reach exact and absolutely correct results, because in the outset, on account of a difference which arose between me and the majority of this Committee of Elections, I had some little misunderstanding with the member of the committee from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] which led to such a state of things that we could not exchange our reports. On that account I made if possible a more careful and scrutinizing examination of every part of this case. Hence it is that I could not make my report shorter, and do justice to the facts and law which controlled my own judgment in the case. Now, sir, in conclusion, let the judgment of the House be what it may, I shall abide in the deep and earnest conviction that the denial of the seat to the contestee, Mr. MORGAN, will be a great public wrong and merit the most signal rebuke at the hands of the people. It will, in my opinion, be a decision disgraceful to this House; that can only be tolerated, never justified, on merely partisan grounds. It will establish a most dangerous precedent, which I hope no future Congress will ever follow. If I belonged to the majority in this House, I should desire the record of such a decision in this case to be forever kept from the observation of my fellow-men. It is discreditable to our country that such a judgment can be entered by the highest legislative body of the Republic. The injustice it does to the sitting member is the least deplorable of its results, for that his constituents will speedily rebuke; but the dishonor it does the House and the country are irreparable.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I know how difficult it is to command the attention of the House in the consideration of a case like this, involving as it does an examination of dull details of facts and the decisions of questions of law scarcely more interesting. Whatever may be the result in this case, I think there is one thing about which there can be no controversy; and that is that the amplest time and fullest opportunity have been given to the sitting member [Mr. MORGAN] to ascertain his rights; and that there has been no disposition to bring the House to a vote until every effort to ascertain the rights of the parties to this contest was exhausted. For fifteen months the contestee has occupied the seat he now holds; until more than half of this entire Congress has passed away, and at last, at this late period of the Fortieth Congress, we are brought to the final consideration of the questions involved in this contest.

A brief statement of the facts will bring me to the consideration of the questions which I propose to discuss, and which I will endeavor to present as briefly as may be possible.

At the last annual election for member of Congress in the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio the contestee and the contestant were opposing candidates. The canvassing officers, to whom the returns of the election were made, decided that the sitting member was elected by a majority of 271 votes. Now, if the contestant, Mr. Delano, has proceeded in the mode prescribed by the act of Congress for contesting elections, and if he has shown that he received a majority of all the legal votes cast at that election, then he is entitled to his seat; but if he has failed in either of these particulars, then the contestee must remain where he is.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether the resolution for a recess will operate to-day, with the present question pending before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order for a recess, made by unanimous consent on last Monday, provides that a recess shall be taken at half past four o'clock when the tax bill is under consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Then I desire at this point to move that a recess be taken this afternoon from half past four till half past seven for the purpose of finishing this question, so that we may take up the tax bill to-morrow.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The motion is not in order, I believe; and I object to it. We can get nobody here to-night to vote on this case. Why should we not go right on and dispose of this question? If the House is going to extend everybody's time, giving gentlemen two hours and more when they ought to condense their remarks into one, I do not know when we shall get through with this case. But I have already given notice that I intend to call for a vote to-night.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD,] if he will allow me, whether he intends to deprive the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MORGAN,] the sitting member, of an opportunity to make a speech upon this case?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I have had no intention about it. I supposed that the sitting member would make his speech. The House has already allowed to one member of the committee something over two hours. I am willing to remain here and listen to the discussion of the case as long as anybody else, though it is not quite so interesting to me as it may be to other gentlemen who have not heard so much of it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman has not quite answered my question. I inquired whether he, as the member having charge of this subject, intended to call the previous question, so as to prevent the sitting member from making his speech.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I suppose that when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] shall have concluded, the sitting member will be entitled to the floor for an hour, if he desires it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand that he does desire it.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Well, I shall not interfere with his getting it.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I will so frame my motion as to provide for taking a vote on this question to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal. My motive is that we may finish, if possible, the discussion of this question to-night, so as to enable the House to take up the tax bill to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that, without unanimous consent, no motion is in order except the motion to take a recess.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Then I will make the motion for a recess, with the understanding I have stated.

Mr. BLAINE. Is that with the intention of voting on this election case to-night?

Mr. GRISWOLD. No, sir; with the understanding that no vote shall be taken to-night, but that we may finish the discussion of the question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRISWOLD] intend to be here to-night, provided that arrangement be made?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Undoubtedly I shall.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rather thought the gentleman was seeking an opportunity to get away.

Mr. GRISWOLD. My object is simply to dispose of this question as soon as it can properly be disposed of in order that the House may take up the tax bill. That is my only motive.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the object is to take up the tax bill to-morrow.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I understand it to be the desire of a number of gentlemen that I shall withdraw my motion. Of course, I do not wish to press it against their wishes, and I withdraw it.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. A majority of the Committee of Elections report that 464 of the votes given for the sitting member were illegal and should be rejected. The gentleman from Indiana, who submitted the views of the minority of the Committee of Elections, claims that the contestant has failed to establish his right to the seat, both in the form of the proceeding which he adopted and as a matter of fact on the evidence he has submitted. In other words, he makes a question of law and of fact. And first, he says that the contestant has not proceeded in the mode prescribed in the act of Congress. The objection he makes is that the "notice of contest" is not sufficiently specific and certain. That I may not mistake the view he takes, I will read from the opinion of the minority, on page 8, as follows:

"Substantially, the allegation in each specification is that illegal votes were cast for the sitting member. It cannot be said, without doing most manifest violence to the intention of the law, that such general and vague allegations can put the sitting member in possession of the grounds of contest. They do not aver in what the illegality of the votes consists. They do not state facts from which the illegality results as a conclusion of law. They only state the conclusion of law itself, and entirely omit any recital of the reasons or facts that are indispensable to sustain the conclusion."

In the "notice of contest" served on the sitting member there are two specifications, as follows:

"2. Six hundred and twenty-five persons, not legally entitled to vote, were improperly and illegally allowed to vote at said election, and did cast their votes for you.

"18. Illegal votes were cast for you at said election as follows: In Clinton township, Knox county, 25 votes, and in each of the townships of Jefferson, Union, Butler, Jackson, Brown, Howard, Harrison, Clay, Pike, Monroe, Pleasant, Morgan, Berlin, Morris, Miller, Middlebury, Wayne, Liberty, Milford, and Hilliar, in said Knox county, 10 votes. In the township of Newark, in the county of Licking, 25 votes; and in each of the townships of Fallsburg, Perry, Hanover, Hopewell, Eden, Mary Ann, Madison, Franklin, Washington, Newton, Licking, Burlington, McKean, Granville, Union, Bennington, Liberty, St. Albans, Harrison, Hartford, Monroe, Jersey, Bowling Green, and Lima, in said Licking county, 10 votes. In the township of Washington, in Muskingum county, 25 votes, and in each of the townships of Monroe, Highland, Union, Rich Mill, Meigs, Adams, Salem, Perry, Salt Creek, Blue Rock, Harrison, Wayne, Jefferson, Muskingum Falls, Springfield, Newton, Jackson, Licking, and Hopewell, 10 votes. In the township of Tuscarawas, in the county of Coshocton, 25 votes; and in each of the townships of Adams, Oxford, Linton, Lafayette, White Eyes, Crawford, Mill Creek, Keene, Franklin, Virginia, Jackson, Bethlehem, Clarke, Monroe, Jefferson, Bedford, Washington, Pike, Perry, New Castle, and Tiverton, in said Coshocton county, 10 votes."

Now, sir, to the objection that the "notice" is not sufficient to authorize the rejection of illegal votes, I make two answers; first, that the objection to the notice, if there could have been any, has been waived by the sitting member; and, secondly, I say the notice of itself is sufficient both upon principle and the authority of contested cases decided in this House. I know of no case where it is more appropriate to employ technicality than when it is used to meet technicality; in other words, when it is sought to avoid the real point in controversy by technicality it is peculiarly appropriate that technicality should be met by technicality. I will say, then, as a technical question of law, that any objection to the form of notice has been waived, and this question now sought to be made cannot be properly raised.

This was decided in Otero against Gallegos, 2 Contested-Election Cases, 178. In that case the objection was taken that "no notice was given of the particular votes intended to be impeached on this ground;" that is, that they were Mexicans not entitled to vote. The notice alleged that in certain specified precincts eight hundred Mexican citizens voted, &c. The committee in considering the objection to the notice report as follows:

"Your committee think that the notice was quite sufficient to authorize the taking of the testimony. No such objection was made by the sitting member or his counsel at the time of taking of the testimony. On the contrary, he appeared and cross-examined the witnesses without any objection whatever; and if he had had no notice at all, and had appeared and cross examined, he would have been estopped from setting up the want of notice."

It is sound policy to hold all objections waived which are not made when depositions are taken. If the objection be then insisted on, a party may decline to take the evidence and abandon the contest. He has a right to this in order to avoid trouble and expense.

I will not occupy further the attention of the House in considering the question whether the sitting member has waived any objection to the notice, for I think the authority which I have read on that subject is conclusive. But I maintain, Mr. Speaker, as a question of law, that the notice which was given in this case is sufficient on principle and on authority to authorize the Committee of Elections, as they did, to proceed to inquire whether the votes cast for the sitting member were legal or otherwise. I have already read to the House two of the specifications in the notice of contest, and I have read the objection which has been taken by the Committee of Elections to that notice. The Committee of Elections do not state their objection to the notice in the precise words which the sitting member does in his answer. The objection made in the answer of the sitting member to the notice of contest served on him is stated in these words:

"It entirely fails to show, or specify why, or for what reasons the persons therein referred to were not legally entitled to vote at said election."

If this objection is well taken, and has not been waived, then all evidence that voters not legally entitled to vote did nevertheless vote for the sitting member must be excluded. But if not well taken, or if waived, then this preliminary objection on this point must be disregarded.

I may remark that this seems like an effort to evade the real merits of this controversy. The minority of the committee, in the views they have presented, have stated what is required under the laws of Ohio to constitute a legal voter and they are given in these words:

To be a legal voter in Ohio six qualifications are necessary, to wit:

1. To be a male citizen of the United States.
2. To be a white male citizen of the United States.
3. To be twenty-one years of age.
4. To be a resident of the State one year immediately preceding the election. (Art. V constitution of Ohio.)
5. To be a resident of the county thirty days next preceding the election.
6. To be a resident of the township or ward twenty days next preceding the election. (Swan and Critch., Stat., vol. 1, p. 543.)

There are also six disqualifications, and any citizen who has any one disqualification is an illegal voter:

1. Idiocy. (Art. V constitution of Ohio.)
2. Lunacy.
3. Conviction and sentence to the penitentiary under the act defining crimes and misdemeanors of the first class. (Swan and Critch., 417.)
4. For conviction and sentence of bribery at an election. (Swan and Critch., 545 and 547.)
5. For conviction and sentence under the act to preserve the purity of elections, passed March 20, 1841. (Swan and Critch., 543.)
6. Desertion as defined by act of Congress of March 3, 1865. (U. S. Stat. at Large, vol. 13, p. 487.)

Now, when this notice declares as it does, that 625 persons not legally entitled to vote were improperly and illegally allowed to vote, that in legal effect is equivalent to saying to the sitting member that 625 persons were permitted to vote who belonged either to the class of non-residents, aliens, deserters, minors, idiots, or some one of the specified persons not entitled to vote by the laws of Ohio. What is the difference between a notice declaring that persons voted who were "not legally entitled to vote," and a notice which goes on to say that persons voted who were not legally entitled to vote, for that they were minors, aliens, idiots, deserters, &c. Why, sir, a notice is just as definite and just as well understood in this general form as it would be if it went on to specify the particulars in which the voters who did vote were illegal voters. It is a rule of law that every citizen is bound to know the law. The sitting member did know the law. The minority of the committee in the views they have presented have stated what it takes to constitute a legal voter. This notice is just as intelligible as though it had gone on to enumerate every description of illegal votes given at the election. The law of Ohio known to the contestee supplies the particular description of persons covered by the general terms illegal voters.

Mr. KERR. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I understand him to be a lawyer, and a distinguished member of the profession. I ask him whether he does not believe that the allegation that 625 illegal voters were allowed to vote is simply equivalent to stating a legal conclusion which must, in order to have any existence at all, rest upon some antecedent facts?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Certainly; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. KERR. Then I desire to ask him whether it is not necessary, in order to comply with the law of Congress, that the particular grounds should be stated, to state those facts upon which the conclusion rests?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I say that there is no law of Congress which requires the notice to state facts only, but that where a fact is sufficiently stated by stating a legal conclusion, if it gives adequate notice to the person whose seat is contested, it is sufficient.

Mr. KERR. Once more. I desire to inquire whether it is ever correct pleading to give the mere legal conclusion, not the fact. Must not the fact be stated with the conclusion?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The gentleman inquires whether it is ever competent in pleading to state a fact by stating a legal conclusion. The act of Congress does not adopt a rule of pleading, but is simply declaratory of the common parliamentary law of notice. But even in pleading in the judicial courts there are many facts consisting of mixed conclusions of law and fact which may be pleaded. This is abundantly proved by reference to the books on pleading. Even in pleading in courts, where a greater degree of strictness is required than here, a less degree of certainty is required—

"When it is to be presumed that the party pleading is not acquainted with minute circumstances."—3 Sharswood's Blackstone, note; 204 citing 13 East., 112; Com. Dig. Pleading, c. 26, § 8 East. 55.

So—

"Where a subject comprehends multiplicity of matter, there, in order to avoid prolixity, general pleading is allowed."—3 Blackstone, 201; Sharswood's Note citing 2 Saunders, 411, Note 4; 3 Term R. 462.

I say to the gentleman that the act of Congress which makes a notice of contest necessary does not prescribe a "rule of pleading," but it does prescribe a rule as "to the law of notice," and every lawyer understands very well the law of notice is one thing and the rules of pleading are totally different things.

Mr. KERR. Is not the notice in this case a pleading?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The notice is not declared by the act of Congress to be a pleading, nor is there any pleading required. Notice is required, and the law of notice should be brought to our aid, and not the law of pleadings.

What is the law of notice? The gentleman from Indiana knows as a lawyer that all that has ever been required under the law of notice is that the notice, whatever it may be, shall be such as reasonably to put the opposite party on his guard and inform him of the purpose for which the notice is intended. I need not refer to books to prove this to learned lawyers here.

The great inquiry in all such cases must be, does the notice fairly apprise the contestee "of the grounds" of contest, or, as the statute says, "specify particularly the grounds?"

Now, it is well understood that the same strict rules do not prevail here as in the judicial courts. Technical precision is not allowed, at least to be perverted so as to defeat the ends of justice.

When, therefore, the notice of contest said to the contestee that—

"Six hundred and twenty-five persons not legally entitled to vote were illegally allowed to vote"—it was equivalent to saying to him that—

"Six hundred and twenty-five persons disqualified from voting [by laws which you know and understand] were permitted to vote for you."

I am not, therefore, called on even to resort to that other maxim of the law, "id certum est quod certum reddi potest." By the aid of this rule, applicable to this case, the notice is sufficiently specific. When it says that "six hundred and twenty-five persons not legally entitled to vote did vote," it is equivalent to saying "that aliens, minors, non-residents, idiots, &c., voted." Suppose that the notice had averred that—

"Six hundred and twenty-five persons voted, one hundred of whom were aliens, one hundred minors, one hundred non-residents," &c.,

that would have been all that the contestee now insists upon. But that gives him no information not covered by the general designation of "persons not legally entitled to vote."

It is a rule that generals include particulars, and the expression "persons not legally entitled to vote" designates a class of persons comprehending every particular disqualification. It is assumed that the notice of contest, in averring that persons voted who "were not legally entitled to vote," states a conclusion of law. The act of Congress does not prohibit this. It requires the contestant "to specify particularly the grounds of contest." If the statement of a legal conclusion does this intelligibly it gives the grounds.

Mr. Speaker, if the rule contended for by the gentleman from Indiana were adopted it would be impossible ever to make a contest available. It is often impossible at the close of an election, within the time limited for giving the notice, to specify the precise grounds of objection to the voters who may have given illegal votes.

Why, sir, this congressional district consists of more than a hundred townships, some of them remote from the residence of the parties to this contest, perhaps fifty or one hundred miles. Some of our districts, at all events, will have townships one hundred miles from the residences of the candidates. It is not possible to obtain the particular grounds of objection to voters who give illegal votes in all the townships within the time allowed for the notice. And if you adopt the rule that the precise grounds must be specified, without being able to say in general terms that votes unauthorized by law were given, you adopt a rule which is utterly impracticable, and which would render a contest in nine cases out of ten utterly unavailable and of no value.

It is impossible in a notice to be more specific. A party may be advised generally that in a remote township there was illegal voting. It may be impossible in a district with a hundred townships, or often more, covering, as in Kansas, a whole State, to ascertain the particular class of illegal voting, and all that can truthfully be done is to give the notice in general terms. A rule which would drive contestants to particularize would exact a notice at random.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not rest the sufficiency of this notice of contest upon arguments drawn from analogy from legal principles, but I rest it upon authority. I say that this notice is in the form that is usually adopted.

It is substantially that of Washburn vs. Voorhees. (H. Mis. Doc. No. 11, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress.)

The first two specifications in the notice of contest which I have been considering are copied verbatim et literatim from the Voorhees case. It is not very probable that any real objection escaped the vigilance of a gentleman so able as Mr. Voorhees.

In the case of Wright vs. Fuller (2 Contested Elections, p. 154) the notice of contest charged that votes were given by minors, non-residents, aliens, &c., at the Danville poll. But the notice simply averred as to other polls that persons were allowed to vote "who were not entitled respectively to vote." Thus, the fourth specification is:

"That persons were permitted and allowed to vote at the election polls in Pittsen (and other places named) who were not entitled respectively to vote at such election polls."

Objection was taken that the notice was not sufficiently specific. The committee in their report say:

"The intentions of the law requiring this notice to be given was to prevent any surprise being practiced to put the sitting member upon a proper defense. As no surprise has been alleged, no want of due information protested, the committee could but conclude that the notice within the purview of the law was all-sufficient."

And in this case it was held that the names of the alleged illegal voters need not be given, page 154. So in the case of Vallandigham vs. Campbell, page 229. And the committee proceeded to say, in substance, that, under a notice that the election—

"Was illegally and irregularly conducted," *
* * * "by reason of which the result"
* * * "was affected," evidence could be taken—

"touching the qualifications, the duties, the acts, and conduct of the officers."

This goes beyond what is necessary for the purposes of the questions I am now considering.

The authorities cited by the sitting member do not sustain, but defeat his objection. In the case of Varnum, (1 Contested Elections, 112,) the notice there was in part that votes were—"Given by persons by law not qualified to vote."

On this the House—

"Resolved, That the allegations" * * * *
"as to persons not qualified to vote are not sufficiently certain; and that the names of persons objected to for want of sufficient qualifications ought to be set forth prior to the taking of the testimony."

Here the objection sustained is only for the want of the specification of the names of the voters. In all other respects the notice was sufficient. "Expressio unius exclusio alterius." On the point now made, the case of Varnum is a direct authority in favor of contestant, and as to the names the question is now settled the other way. Congress has reversed the rule that a party must name the voters who are claimed to have voted illegally.

In Easton vs. Scott, (1 Contested-Election Cases, 272,) the last point of the syllabus is not sustained by the case, but is in fact entirely unsupported by it. The syllabus, as is well known, is not prepared by the Committee of Elections, but is the work of the reporter years afterward, and is frequently erroneous. Besides, that case was under a different practice from that which prevails under the present act of Congress. The notice there held defective was the notice to take depositions. Its insufficiency turned on the point—

"That the names of the persons objected to for want of sufficient qualifications ought to be set forth prior to the taking of testimony."—1 Contested-Election Cases, p. 285.

This doctrine is now overruled, and if the case had decided what is claimed for it, the same policy which has overruled it on the point relative to the names of voters would overrule it as to a specification of their particular disqualifications. In other words, the degree of certainty then required has been found wrong and overruled. In that case the notice did not charge illegal votes, but only that—

"Improper votes have been admitted."—Page 284.

The committee do say that neither party was—

"Notified by the other that the particular qualifications of the electors would be investigated."

But the House did not sustain or decide any such point, but discharged the committee because the committee reported—

"That evidence cannot be procured in season to enable the committee to investigate the qualifications of the electors during the present Congress."—Page 285.

The necessity of objecting "during the taking of testimony" is recognized by the report of Mr. DAWES in the case of Kline vs. Verree, 2 Contested-Election Cases, page 383, and it is there said that a failure to object is properly deemed a waiver.

Reference has been made to a minority report in Wright vs. Fuller, 2 Contested-Election Cases, page 152, to support an objection to the notice of contest in this case. There is no authority to support it, and no reasoning except in minority reports.

Reference has been made to a minority report in White vs. Harris, 2 Contested-Election Cases, 262-63, though the majority, supported by a decision of the House, had ruled the other way.

The opinions of Mr. DAWES, expressed in Kline vs. Verree, 2 Contested-Election Cases, 381, are correct, but have no application to the case now being conducted. It is there said that the failure to object is deemed a waiver; which is an additional authority upon the point I first made, that all objection to this notice has been waived.

Mr. Speaker, I say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] and to the House that he cannot find a solitary notice in any parliamentary cases, either in Congress or in any other legislative body, where an objection of this description has been sustained as against a notice as specific and definite as this notice. And now I defy gentlemen to produce any such case.

The notice is sufficient for another reason. The act of Congress requires the contestant to furnish his adversary with a list of witnesses. This enables him not only to ascertain their character and means of information, but the points to which their knowledge extends. (Wright vs. Fuller, 2 Contested-Election Cases, page 154.)

There are one or two other points which I will briefly notice. It is objected by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] that the vote of Pike township was improperly rejected. That is the township in which a deserter acted as one of the judges of election. There are two grounds assigned by the majority of the Committee of Elections for the rejection of the vote of that township. One is that the election was held in part by a judge of election who was a deserter, one who by the laws of Ohio was not an elector, and who could not legally exercise the duties of his office. And it was rejected partly on the ground that there was no legal evidence that any man who voted at that poll was by law entitled to vote.

I am perfectly sure, Mr. Speaker; that the last objection I have named is well taken. Let me call the attention of the House very briefly to a clause of the constitution of Ohio and to a provision in the statutes of that State, from which I think this will be entirely clear.

The constitution of Ohio provides, in article five, section one, that—

"Every white male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of the State one year next preceding the election, and of the county, township, or ward in which he resides such time as may be prescribed by law, shall have the qualifications of an elector."

Observe, Mr. Speaker, the word "elector." It is a constitutional term; and it is here provided that no man shall vote unless he is an "elector." Well, sir, the law of Ohio provides a mode of perpetuating the evidence that those who vote are electors. The act of the General Assembly of Ohio of May 3, 1852, makes, in section eighteen, the following provision:

"That the following shall be the form of poll-books to be kept by the judges and clerks of the election held under this act."

The act then proceeds to give the caption of the poll-book which is to contain a list of the voters at the election. It then requires the certificate to be signed by the clerks and judges of the election, which certificate is to be in these words:

"It is hereby certified that the number of electors at this election amounted to —."

"Attest: A B, &c., Judges of Election."

Now, sir, in this township of Pike there was no such certificate that any man who voted at the election was an elector or entitled to vote. There is no evidence before the committee that any man who voted in that township was an elector or entitled to vote. I do not hold that the absence of the certificate ought to deprive the electors of that township of the votes they cast; but I do hold that when a law has required that the evidence shall be preserved in some form, that those who did vote were "electors"—were entitled to vote—that evidence must be preserved in the form prescribed by statute, or its place must be supplied by proof aliunde; and the gentleman from Indiana will not pretend for one moment that there is any evidence before the committee, either in the form prescribed by the act of Assembly of Ohio or by parol proof, that any man who voted at that poll in Pike township was an elector of the State of Ohio, or entitled to vote at that poll. How, then, can the vote cast at that poll be counted? Sir, it is perfectly manifest that in the absence of all evidence that the persons who voted in Pike township were electors the votes they cast cannot be counted in this contest without a clear disregard of all law and all authority.

Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly aware that the House is impatient and anxious to dispose of this contest; and I do not propose to continue the discussion at any great length. I think, however, that some answer ought to be given to a point which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] has made in his argument, but which is not very distinctly made in his minority report. The gentleman maintains in his argument that the votes of several townships ought to be rejected because the judges of election adjourned a brief space of time for dinner; and this he holds, on the authority of a decision made by Judge Brinkerhoff, in the district court in Ohio, to the effect that the votes cast at every poll where such adjournment took place should be rejected, or rather that an election depending exclusively on the votes at a poll where such adjournment occurred was void.

The sitting member insists that the vote of twelve townships, in each of which the contestant received a majority of votes, shall be rejected. The objection to those polls is thus stated in the answer of the sitting member:

"That the judges of the election for Representative of said district to the Fortieth Congress aforesaid did illegally and wrongfully suspend said election during a long space of time, to wit, for the space of more than one hour, between the hours of ten o'clock a. m. and six o'clock p. m. on said day of election, at the election precincts in each of the following townships of Washington, Virginia, Jackson, Keene, White Eyes, and Adams, in said county of Choshocot; in the townships of Madison, Memo, Highland, Union, Rich Hill, Salt Creek, Blue Rock, Harrison, Springfield, Hopewell, Muskingum, Licking, and Jefferson, and also in the first and fourth wards of said city of Zanesville, in said county of Muskingum; in the townships of Washington, Burlington, Granville, Harrison, St. Albans, Liberty, Hartford, Jersey, and in the first and second wards in the city of Newark, in said county of Licking; and in the townships of Clinton, Miller, Wayne, Liberty, College, and Morgan, in said county of Knox, in said congressional district, whereby a large number of electors, to wit, the number of one hundred and seven, who would have voted for me for Representative as aforesaid, were by the illegal suspension of said election prevented from so doing."

It may be well to consider first what in view of the evidence this objection is not, or does not, present for decision. In his argument before the committee the sitting member has a caption, "Fraudulent suspension of the election," (p. 37.) But as the charge of fraud is not made in his answer, and is not supported by any evidence, the objection now involves no charge of fraud.

Upon the evidence it is not pretended that it is proved that any voter asked, or offered to vote, or lost the privilege of voting, by any temporary suspension of the election. It is not proved that the officers acted in bad faith. It is not pretended that the law in terms prohibits a brief adjournment. The ballot-boxes were not tampered with, or any impropriety even intended. It is claimed, however, that the election officers adjourned, in some instances, for thirty minutes or more for dinner; and for this innocent, if not necessary act, it is claimed that the voters of these townships shall be visited with the loss of their votes. If this be the law it is absurd law, for a brief suspension of voting will sometimes be rendered absolutely indispensable. Human endurance could not always avoid it. It is not pretended that any committee of any legislative body anywhere visited such a consequence as is asked here upon similar facts; nor has any authoritative court, or any court in any deliberately considered case so held. The claim made for rejecting the votes of these townships all rests upon a decision pronounced by Judge Brinkerhoff in the district court of Hamilton county, Ohio, reported in the American Law Register for December 1867, page 88.

The statute of Ohio (Swan and Critch., p. 533, sec. 5) provides that the polls shall be opened between the hours of six and ten in the morning and closed at six o'clock in the afternoon of the same day.

The case decided by Judge Brinkerhoff was on a quo warranto to contest the right of John Ritt to exercise the office of mayor of Mount Airy. On the day of the election for mayor Ephraim T. Brown and John Ritt were opposing candidates. During the day the judges of the election adjourned the election and were absent from one to two hours. It was held this was a closing of the election within the meaning of the statute, and that the whole election was, therefore, void and neither candidate elected. The case seems to be reported in the American Law Register, in order that the editorial notes may show, as they do, that it is a wrong decision. But without going that far it might answer my purpose to say, if such a rule could be applied to an election like that, composed of only one voting precinct, where another mayor could immediately be elected or appointed, yet no such rule is practicable in a large district with a hundred voting precincts. That case was heard on quo warranto, and whatever rule might be adopted in such a case and in such a proceeding, no such rule has ever been adopted in parliamentary practice.

It must be remembered that there are many different systems of law in this and every country. Military law has its tribunals, its jurisdiction, and its separate system. The common, municipal, and written law has its courts, its jurisdiction, and its system of rules applicable to some elections with its quo warranto proceedings, &c. Then parliamentary law has its jurisdiction, among which is impeachment of officers, the arrest and punishment for breach of privilege or disobedience of its process, the punishment or expulsion of members, with the right declared by, but existing independently of, the Constitution, to judge of the election returns and qualifications of members of the House of Representatives. Now, neither one of these separate jurisdictions is bound by or regards the adjudications of the other, except so far as the principles thereof may be applicable in the particular tribunal, or may by it be deemed reasonable.

And it is safe to affirm that no such rule of parliamentary law has ever been adopted as that held by Judge Brinkerhoff. It should be remembered, too, that the decision itself is not by a court whose adjudications are deemed or quoted as authority. The supreme court of Ohio is the court of last resort under State authority for judicial purposes. Its decisions are reported as law. The district court is an inferior tribunal performing circuit duty, with little time for deliberation, and its decisions could in no sense be deemed authority. This case bears all the marks of haste and want of consideration. It is supported by no reason, by no reported case, by no citation of principle; it is a mere unsupported ipse dixit, hastily made and almost without argument. It is against all settled principle, and is in direct conflict with cases which are high judicial authority.

The statute, as we have seen, provides that the polls shall be opened between the hours of six and ten in the morning, and closed at six o'clock in the afternoon.

It is a directory statute. Piatt vs. The People, 29 Illinois Repts., 72; Locust ward contested-election case, 4 Pennsylvania Law Journal, 342; the People vs. Cook, 4 Selden, New York Rep., 93.

It does not declare an election void if its provisions are not strictly followed. It does not in terms prohibit an adjournment for dinner. Such adjournment will sometimes, ex necessitate, be unavoidable.

In 4 Selden Reports, 92, the New York court of appeals, in discussing a similar statute, say:

"The statute contains no words forbidding the poll to be held open after sundown or rendering the election void if the poll be not opened and closed as therein required."

The law of Ohio makes the judges of the election a corporation for various purposes.

It is one of the inherent common-law powers of a corporation that it may take reasonable adjournments.

In corporate elections where no injury has resulted a reasonable adjournment never vitiated an election. But this question may be regarded as settled by the supreme court of Illinois in the case of Piatt vs. The People, &c., 29 Illinois Repts., 54.

By the law of Illinois the people of certain townships were authorized to vote upon the question of making township subscriptions to the capital stock of the American Central Railroad Company. The law required the polls to be closed at five o'clock p. m., but there was evidence tending to show that votes were cast after that hour. The result of the vote as announced was in favor of subscription. This was contested, and a part of the syllabus of the case is thus stated:

"A mere irregularity in conducting an election which does not deprive any voter of his franchise or allow an illegal vote or change the result will not vitiate."

"Although the law directs that the polls shall be closed at five o'clock" * * * "unless it is made to appear that votes were cast after that hour, which change the result, the irregularity would not be fatal."

And in the opinion the court say:

"The rules prescribed by law for conducting an election are designed chiefly to afford an opportunity for the free and fair exercise of the elective franchise, to prevent illegal votes, and to ascertain with certainty the result. Such rules are directory merely—not jurisdictional or imperative."

If Judge Brinkerhoff could have seen this case before he decided on the election in Mount Airy his decision never would have been as it was, and the editor of the Law Register would have been saved the trouble of his note pointing out Judge Brinkerhoff's error.

In the Penn district election case, in 1847, decided in the Philadelphia common pleas, where the resolution of the Legislature required the polls to be kept open until ten o'clock p. m., and they were closed at eight, the election was set aside, but only on the ground that the evidence affirmatively showed that there were 261 persons who did not vote and were deprived of the privilege. (2 Parson's Select Cases, (Pennsylvania,) 533.)

In the case now under consideration it is not shown that a single voter lost the privilege of voting, or that there were other voters who did not vote.

In the Locust ward contested-election case, 4 Pennsylvania Law Journal, 347, the question was:

"What results follow where an election has been kept open after the hour fixed by law for closing it, and votes have been received? Is the entire election void? When a poll is kept open after that hour, and the number of votes polled afterward can be clearly ascertained, if the whole of those votes could not change the result, the election for this cause will not be set aside."—P. 341.

This is a case demanding the intervention of courts much more than the case of a mere recess during an election.

The principle of law, of common sense, and justice, which underlies the whole theory of election contests is this, that an irregularity which cannot change the result cannot vitiate a poll; but where fraud enters into the contest, then on high grounds of public policy to prevent its evil consequences, and especially where it leaves a shadow of doubt as to the result, the whole poll must be rejected. These principles are announced in The People vs. Cook, 4 Selden, 93, 94; in Piatt vs. The People, 29 Illinois Rep., 69, 72; in State ex. rel. Attorney General vs. Taylor, Ohio State Reports, and in many cases both in the judicial and parliamentary courts.

Thus in 4 Selden, New York Reports, 93, the court of appeals say:

"It may be safely affirmed that if the irregularity does not deprive a legal voter of his right, or admit a disqualified person to vote, if it casts no uncertainty on the result, and has not been occasioned by the agency of a party seeking to derive a benefit from it, it may be overlooked in an action of this kind, when the issue is as to which candidate received the greatest number of votes for a particular office at a given election. There is nothing in this principle which holds out the slightest invitation to disorders at the polls. Should a gang of rowdies gain possession of the ballot-box during or after the close of an election before the canvass, and destroy the whole or portions of the ballots, or introduce others surreptitiously into the box so as to render it impossible to ascertain the number of genuine ballots, the whole should be rejected."

Mr. Speaker, I have examined the report of the minority and the report of the majority, as well as the testimony, with as much care as I have been able to bestow; and upon every principle of law and justice, I believe that the contestant has made a perfect case, and is entitled to the seat. And I hope this case will establish the principle, as a rule of parliamentary law, that a notice of contest which declares that illegal votes were given shall be sufficient to admit proof that votes were given which are illegal for any cause—this rests in part on the well-settled rule of the common as well as the parliamentary law that "every man is presumed to know the law." Even in criminal law and its administration this is a conclusive presumption often against the fact, and parties accused can never plead ignorance of the law. "Ignorantia legis excusat neminem." (Sedgwick on Stat., p. 83; 17 Barber, p. 317.)

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether anybody on the other side wants the floor or not. Nobody appears to be claiming it.

Mr. KERR. I would like to inquire of the gentleman who manages this case how much more time he intends to allow this side of the House?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I suppose the sitting member will take an hour.

Mr. KERR. Does the gentleman intend to allow any one else any time?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I propose then to call the previous question. My colleague from the Luzerne district [Mr. WOODWARD] has an understanding with me as to a part of my hour.

Mr. WOODWARD. If I interfere with nobody else, I can go on now as well as at any other time. I do not intend to enter into the general question, but will confine myself to a single point.

Mr. SCOFIELD. How much time does my colleague desire?

Mr. WOODWARD. Ten or fifteen minutes will, I suppose, be sufficient.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the gentleman takes the floor now I suppose, Mr. Speaker, he will be entitled to an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless there be some other understanding on the part of the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have the floor, and had proposed to yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MORGAN;] but if my colleague [Mr. WOODWARD] will go on now for ten minutes, with the understanding that at the end of that time the gentleman from Ohio shall take the floor, that will enable us to get through.

Mr. KERR. The gentleman from Ohio, I presume, is to have an hour.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire or design to enter into the general question raised by the majority and the minority of the committee. The argument of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] is, in my judgment, conclusive, and I will not weaken it by attempting to add anything to it. There is, however, one single aspect of the subject with reference to which I wish to submit a few observations, designed especially for my colleague, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] who has charge of this case, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee of Elections, and the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] a member of that committee, for they are all astute and competent lawyers. I wish to state to these gentlemen, and through them to the House, the difficulties which my mind experiences with regard to one of the points of this case. The House will understand that more than two hundred men who are claimed to have voted for the sitting member are said to be disqualified by reason of being deserters. If the votes of these men be added to the admittedly legal votes cast for the sitting member, he is elected, though every other point in the case were ruled in favor of the contestant, so that the right of membership depends essentially upon this question of the soldiers' vote; and it is to no other question in the case that I propose to address myself. Now, whether these two hundred men are deserters or not, within the meaning of the acts of Congress, depends, first, upon the act of 1863, for enrolling and calling out the national forces, which was the general law under which the conscriptions took place. The act of 1865, under which these men are claimed to be deserters, is supplementary to the act of 1863.

The act of 1865 does not define any such crime as desertion, but the act of 1863 does define the crime of desertion, and declares that any person failing to answer the notice of a draft shall be deemed a deserter, and shall be arrested by the provost marshal and sent to the nearest military post for trial by court-martial. The twenty-sixth section also provides for the punishment of deserters as the law directs. Thus these sections of the act of 1863 define the crime and the persons deemed guilty of that crime, and we all agree that desertion is a grave and hateful offense. They are called deserters in the report of the committee. All the act of 1865 does is to add additional penalties to that crime. It does not create a new offense. It takes the offense as in the act of 1863, but adds additional penalties. I take the phrase "additional penalties," so there can be no controversy, from the act of 1865. The act of 1865 declares additional penalties to those imposed by the act of 1863 for the crime of desertion.

Such being the state of the law the only court that has construed that law has held that before any of the penalties of the act of 1863 or the additional penalties of the act of 1865 can fall on any individual he must be convicted by a court of competent jurisdiction. I say the only court, so far as I am aware, that has undertaken to give judicial construction to these acts has so decided, as abundantly appears from the case cited in the argument of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR.] If not all, enough of Judge Strong's opinion has been given to show the substance and the drift of it, that no imposition of these penalties, whether original or additional, can be made under these acts of Congress except as the result of judicial investigation. That may be before any court-martial or any court the law of the land may provide; but the point ruled is, until some court has judicially ascertained the man is a deserter there is no such desertion under these acts of Congress.

I wish to fix the attention of the very competent lawyers who belong to the Committee of Elections upon the fact that the only court of the country—and that the supreme court of the State of Pennsylvania, a court certainly entitled to the respect of my colleague, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] if not that of every member of the Election Committee—that have passed upon this act of Congress and given it a judicial construction, have held a conviction necessary to the establishment of desertion. Now, I argue that act of Congress means what the judicial mind declares it means, and that it does not mean what the election officers in the thirteenth district of Ohio declare it to mean. It does not mean what this committee may declare it to mean. It does not mean what this House may declare it to mean. It means what the judiciary of the country says it means. They are the constitutional expounders and interpreters of the statute law of the land. If gentlemen deny this I wish them to deny it distinctly, and if they do not deny it distinctly I wish them to admit it specifically. I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that this act of Congress is to be taken by the House and everybody else in the sense in which the judiciary of the country has declared it is to be taken. I wish the gentleman either to admit or deny that proposition. I presume gentlemen will not deny it if they have respect for their professional reputation.

If it is to be so taken how are we to decide these two hundred men are deserters. They have not been tried by any court-martial or any court of justice. They have not been summoned, they have not been arraigned, they have not been convicted; and if we are to take this act of Congress as the judiciary expounds it there is no desertion in the case, and we are fighting shadows. I place that question before the gentlemen of the Election Committee.

I have another point, and it is the only other point I intend to make. I know how feeble is any argument I may submit, but I suppose this committee will respect their own arguments. I am now going to place myself upon the argument of the acting chairman of the Committee of Elections.

Forgetful of or not alluding to the view I have suggested, the gentleman proceeds to say in his report that this act of Congress simply furnishes a test of the qualifications of voters, and involves merely the ascertainment of a fact, and that election officers are competent to judge of those qualifications and ascertain the fact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WOODWARD. I hope I may be indulged with a few minutes more to state this point.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman will be permitted to go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WOODWARD. Not over ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOODWARD. I want to state the gentleman's own position. In his report he argues thus:

"It makes no difference that the same facts which constitute a disqualification would, if heard before a court, constitute a crime. There are many instances where the law makes conviction in a court the ground of exclusion from the franchise, and then, of course, exclusion can only follow conviction. But when it makes the existence of a fact, as in this case, the ground of exclusion, that fact must be passed upon by the officers of the election in the first instance, and by this House upon a contest."

Now, there is the core of the gentleman's argument; that it is a matter of fact that these men are deserters; that election officers are competent to ascertain other facts, and therefore to ascertain this fact. Now, sir, the fact is that the act of Congress takes away from deserters their citizenship as citizens of the United States. That is the precise effect of the act of Congress in terms. The constitution of Ohio requires every voter to be a citizen of the United States; and then the argument of the committee is, that as the act of Congress has taken away the citizenship of these deserters, and the constitution of Ohio has forbidden anybody but citizens of the United States to vote, therefore these men are not voters, the judges of election being the judges of the fact. That is the argument of the report of the committee.

Now, sir, I wish to suggest for the consideration of the committee a difficulty that arises in the way of this argument. The citizenship of these men is admitted once to have existed, else the act of Congress could not take it away. It existed under the Constitution of the United States. Now, under the Constitution of the United States, is it competent for the Congress of the United States or any other power to take away that citizenship except by due process of law? The Constitution declares that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor shall any person be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation. Now, citizenship under the Constitution is neither life nor property, but it is liberty. It is exactly that which makes a man a citizen in every State in the Union and gives him the liberty of an American citizen. It is that which we value and which all foreigners who come and apply for naturalization under our laws value, and which I trust we never shall cease to prize. It is a part of a man's liberty; it belongs to him, inheres in him. Now, says the Constitution, it shall not be taken from him except by due process of law. That means by courts and juries.

Mr. BENTON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. How is it that under the Constitution slavery existed in this country?

Mr. WOODWARD. That is a large question, and I submit it is an irrelevant one. However, if you will give me time I will answer it, or any other question. Slavery never was established by the Constitution.

Mr. BENTON. Then I will vary the question. Does the gentleman claim that the blacks can legally be deprived of their right of voting to affect their liberty?

Mr. WOODWARD. You see the difficulty. I am limited to ten minutes, which are nearly run out. I am endeavoring to state the law in this case. It will give me great pleasure to discuss the question the gentleman propounds whenever I have time. I now wish to rivet the attention of gentlemen to this point: that these deserters were once citizens of the United States; that that citizenship was a part of their liberty; and that the Constitution of the United States, which we have all sworn to support, solemnly declares that citizenship shall not be taken from any one except by due process of law.

Judge Strong, in his opinion in the case to which reference has been made, declares the same thing, and tells us what "process of law" is within the meaning of the Constitution.

In this case where is your "process of law?" Where were these men stripped of their citizenship by "due process of law?" Neither of the gentlemen will say that the decision of the board of election officers was "due process of law," within the meaning of the Constitution. If they will, I will give up this case. But they will not say that, because every lawyer in this House knows that that expression in the Constitution of the United States—"due process of law"—means a judicial proceeding, and not a proceeding before a board of election officers.

Then we are brought to this point: General Morgan, the sitting member, is entitled to retain the seat which he has adorned ever since this Congress opened, unless these deserters have been established as deserters by "due process of law." The only alternative is to trample the Constitution of the United States under foot. We must either leave General Morgan in his seat or find that the 200 voters have been deprived of citizenship by due process of law, because, as I have said, this question about the deserters decides his right to the seat; if there were no deserters then General Morgan is the member; if there were deserters, you must show some judicial ascertainment of the fact, or else you will violate the plain provision of the Constitution of the United States. If I apprehend correctly the statement of the chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] there is no escape from these conclusions.

He says these officers of election are competent to ascertain the fact of desertion. Grant it. But they are not competent to strip American citizens of their citizenship. Nor can Congress do it. Nothing but a judicial proceeding can strip citizens of their citizenship. That judicial proceeding is utterly wanting here, and because it is wanting there are no deserters in the case, and because there are no deserters in this case General Morgan's seat is beyond question his.

These are the two points which I desired to state. No doubt I shall be answered, and very clearly, I trust. I hope I am understood on these two points; they are the only two of which I intended to speak. If I am answered on these two points correctly by gentlemen, I do not know but they will get my vote for ousting General Morgan from his seat. If I am not answered satisfactorily, then I hope gentlemen will not vote in favor of ousting him, because his liability to be ousted, it seems to me, depends upon a clear statement of the law and of the Constitution of the country upon these two points. I pause for a reply.

Mr. MORGAN next addressed the House. Without concluding, he yielded to Mr. KERR. Has it been determined to have a session to-night?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not. Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn. The gentleman from Ohio would prefer to finish his speech in the morning, and there certainly is no quorum here.

Mr. MORGAN. I am sorry my argument has had the effect of emptying the seats on the Republican side of the House. How much more time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has twenty-two minutes.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I trust that we shall close the debate to-night, so that the vote may be taken in the morning.

Mr. MORGAN. I am unwilling to make my speech to empty chairs. I am very anxious that gentlemen should understand what they are voting on when the vote is taken. When they assume the responsibility I wish them to understand what the responsibility is.

The question was taken on Mr. ELDRIDGE's motion, and it was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of laboring men at the national cemetery at Fredericksburg, Virginia, late United States soldiers, for an increase of their pay.

Also, the petition of citizens of Nueces county, Texas, for a division of said State.

By Mr. BEAMAN: The remonstrance of Russell & Angel, of Adrian, Michigan, against the renewal of the patent of Anson Atwood, for an improvement in cast iron car-wheels.

By Mr. BUCKLAND: The petition of Wayne & Houk, and others manufacturers of cigars and dealers in cigars and tobacco, of Tiffin, Ohio, against the increase of the tax on cigars, and for a change of the system of collecting the revenue on cigars.

By Mr. CULLOM: The petition of sundry citizens of Bloomington, Illinois, asking that the tax on cigars be retained as it is, and that the tax be collected by the use of revenue stamps.

By Mr. ECKLEY: The petition of the cigar-makers of Nellsville, Ohio, remonstrating against the proposed change in the tax on cigars.

By Mr. FERRY: The petition of O. R. Goodno, George E. Dowling, J. D. Pullman, S. H. Lasley, and 28 others, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Montague, in Muskegon county, via Brown's Mills, Stebbinsville, Hesperia, and Martinsburg, to Stanley, in Newaygo county, Michigan.

By Mr. GLOSSBRENNER: A memorial of John T. Tait, William M. Abbey, and others, a committee on behalf of the Philadelphia tobacco trade, remonstrating against certain proposed changes in the internal revenue tax upon tobacco and cigars.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut: A remonstrance of sundry citizens of Enfield, Connecticut, against increase of tax on cigars.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia: The petition of Thomas Jefferson and 80 other persons, citizens of Wheeling, West Virginia, engaged in the manufacture of cigars, representing that the increase of tax on cigars from five to ten dollars per thousand will be very injurious to the business of those engaged in the manufacture of cigars from tobacco of home growth, and asking that the tax on that kind of cigars be reduced rather than increased.

By Mr. JUDD: The petition of John C. Partridge & Co. and others, asking that the present tax on cigars be retained.

By Mr. LINCOLN: The petition of Dwight G. Hull, asking that sailors in the United States Navy have bounty money allowed them.

By Mr. MAYNARD: The petition of John C. Richard, of No. 60 John street, New York, praying a reduction in the duty on imported lead pencils and colored crayons in wood.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: The petition, of George B. Lindsay and 100 others, journeymen cigar-makers of the city of Pittsburg and its vicinity, protesting against the provisions of the new tax bill which require a bond for $2,000 and $100 additional for each hand employed; also, against the license of one dollar per year for cigar-makers, but approving of the tax of five dollars per thousand.

By Mr. NICHOLSON: The petition of Henry Fothergill and 71 others, workers in iron at Wilmington, Delaware, representing that the industry of the country is paralyzed for want of protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries, and praying that Congress will resume consideration of the tariff bill which was passed by the Senate, but failed in the House March, 1867, for want of time, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petition of William Maxwell and 35 others, cotton-spinners of Wilmington, Delaware, complaining that the productive interests of the country are suffering and its industry paralyzed for want of efficient protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries, and praying that Congress will resume consideration of the tariff bill which passed the Senate, but failed in the House March, 1867, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petition of carriage-makers in the State of Delaware, representing that the productive interests of the country are suffering for want of efficient protection against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries, and praying that Congress will resume consideration of the tariff bill which failed in the House of Representatives, March, 1867, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. SELYE: A remonstrance of cigar-makers and tobacco-growers in the county of Monroe, State of New York, praying that no higher rate of taxes be imposed than is now required by law.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 3, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DRAKE. I present the memorial of the presidents of more than fifty railroad companies, praying Congress to extend the subsidy of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, upon the terms proposed in the bill therefor, now pending in Congress. And, Mr. President, I ask that the Senate would so far depart from its accustomed practice in cases of this kind as to allow this memorial to be printed. The subject is one of great importance, and the persons that sign it are persons representing great interests; and, if there be no objection, I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLE presented the petition of Perry McDonough Collins, of California, praying aid for a project for a telegraph, by way of the North Pacific ocean to Asia, by a subsidy for Government business, by conferring exclusive rights of way from 54° 40' north latitude to and including the island of Attan, and a survey and soundings of the proposed route; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to present the memorial of E. R. Knorr, hydrographer, praying that all the plates bought from E. & G. W.

Blunt by the honorable Secretary of the Navy be destroyed, and that in place of them new charts, not copies of the English, but improvements on them, be prepared from reliable data; and he sets forth what he states to be facts in regard to them rendering such course expedient in his judgment. As these plates seem to be in the possession of the Navy Department, I suppose it would be as well to refer the memorial to the Committee on Naval Affairs; and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a letter addressed by the Secretary of State to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, transmitting correspondence with the State Department in relation to the injurious effect upon the Nova Scotia coal trade occasioned by the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty; which was ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 119) authorizing the Secretary of War to take charge of the Gettysburg and Antietam national cemeteries, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, reported amendments to be proposed to the bill (S. No. 180) relating to United States notes; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 509) in addition to an act passed March 26, 1864, entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,'" reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. THAYER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 512) granting land to the Iowa and Missouri State Line Railroad Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 140) relating to traveling expenses of California and Nevada volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill to remove the disability of certain citizens of Georgia. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I would say to the committee that these persons have been elected to the Legislature and other offices in that State, and it is important that the bill should be acted upon at the earliest possible moment.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 511) to remove the disability of certain citizens of Georgia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will remark, in reply to what was said by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the committee have been engaged upon that subject, and have directed a bill to be reported, which I suppose one of the members of the committee will report this morning.

Mr. WILSON. As to Georgia?

Mr. TRUMBULL. As to several of the States; but this is a very grave subject. There are perhaps a thousand names before the Senate, and it has been with a great deal of difficulty that we have been able to ascertain sufficient facts so as to act intelligently in regard to them. There is a disposition in the committee, I believe, with all its members, to act liberally in this respect; but we receive information both ways in regard to a great many persons, and it is a matter that is involved in a good deal of difficulty, and it has taken some time and much labor to investigate the various names that have been sent to us.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say in regard to this bill that it includes only such persons as have been elected under the constitution to office in that State, and the Legislature itself cannot proceed to do any business until some action of this kind is taken. I have a large list of other persons sent here. Some have been presented. I presented several, I know, and sent them to the Committee on the Judiciary. I move that the bill be printed and referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

RESPONSIBILITY OF SENATORS.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolutions, which were read:

Resolutions declaring the constitutional responsibility of Senators for their votes on impeachment.

Whereas a pretension has been put forth to the effect that the vote of a Senator on an impeachment is so far different in character from his vote on any other question that the people have no right to criticize or consider it; and whereas such pretension, if not discountenanced, is calculated to impair that freedom of judgment which belongs to the people on all that is done by their Representatives: Therefore, in order to remove all doubts on this question, and to declare the constitutional right of the people in cases of impeachment—

1. Resolved, That, even assuming that the Senate is a court in the exercise of judicial power, Senators cannot claim that their votes are exempt from the judgment of the people; that the Supreme Court, when it has undertaken to act on questions essentially political in character, has not escaped this judgment; that the decisions of this high tribunal in support of slavery have been openly condemned; that the memorable utterance known as the Dred Scott decision was indignantly denounced and repudiated, while the Chief Justice who pronounced it became a mark for censure and rebuke; and that plainly the votes of Senators on an impeachment cannot enjoy an immunity from popular judgment which has been denied to the Supreme Court, with Taney as Chief Justice.

2. Resolved, That the Senate is not at any time a court, invested with judicial power, but that it is always a Senate with specific functions, declared by the Constitution; that according to express words, the judicial power of the United States is vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish, while it is further provided that "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments," thus positively making a distinction between the judicial power and the power to try impeachments; that the Senate, on an impeachment, does not exercise any portion of the judicial power, but another and different power, exclusively delegated to the Senate, having for its sole object removal from office and disqualification; therefore, that, by the terms of the Constitution, there may be, after conviction on impeachment, a further trial and punishment "according to law," thus making a discrimination between a proceeding by impeachment and a proceeding "according to law," that the proceeding by impeachment is not "according to law" and is not attended by legal punishment, but is of an opposite character, and from beginning to end political, being instituted by a political body, on account of political offenses, being conducted before another political body having political power only, and ending in a judgment which is political only; and therefore the vote of a Senator on impeachment, though different in form, is not different in responsibility from his vote on any other political question; nor can any Senator on such an occasion claim immunity from that just accountability which the representative at all times owes to his constituents.

3. Resolved, That Senators in all that they do under the constant obligation of an oath, binding them to the strictest rectitude; that on an impeachment they take a further oath, according to the requirement of the Constitution, which says, "Senators, when sitting to try impeachment, shall be on oath or affirmation;" that this simple requirement was never intended to change the character of the Senate as a political body, and cannot have any such operation; and therefore, Senators, whether before or after the supplementary oath, are equally responsible to the people for their votes, it being the constitutional right of the people at all times to sit in judgment on their representatives.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that those resolutions be printed, so as to be in order to be called up hereafter.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMERCE ON THE LAKES.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the bill (S. No. 266) to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that motion will not prevail. Indeed, I supposed it would be withdrawn. The other Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] has, since the bill was up before, consulted with some agents of the Treasury, and prepared some amendments that I should like to have him submit now, and I think that then, perhaps, the bill will be entirely satisfactory to every member of the body.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As the matter has been examined by the committee, and they have amendments to submit, I am willing to withdraw my motion to recommit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to recommit being withdrawn, the question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have looked through this bill for the purpose of proposing some amendments, but I have found so much objection to it that I can hardly leave much of it after the amendments which I shall propose are adopted, if they shall be adopted. In section five—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator that the question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce, which is a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Vermont can move to amend the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The proposition of the Senator from Vermont is to amend the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The great change proposed here is to allow vessels to touch at as many ports as they please without stopping to make any entry, to get any permit or any clearance, and to leave the master of the vessel to make and amend his manifest as he pleases or as the facts may authorize. It seems to me that this would leave the master to perpetrate frauds if he so pleases, and it will certainly leave all the ports without any record of the business transacted. The trade can only be ascertained thereafter by examining the manifests as returned to the last port or place of entry, not by any record made at the respective places. On the lakes, Lake Champlain, Lake Erie, Lake Ontario, Lake Huron, and Lake Michigan, where the vessels touch at a great number of ports, and where, in some instances, the distance from the Canadian shore is very short, and the facilities for the illicit introduction of foreign goods will be exceedingly great, it seems to me that if the Senator from Michigan could relieve this trade from paying any charges at these various ports, he might be willing at least that they should stop and make their formal entry, so that the Government would know what they were doing. It strikes me that while it would be a relief unquestionably to the master of a vessel not to be compelled to make these entries and to get a clearance and a permit, as he is now required to do, yet that it is indispensable to the Government that they shall be made to do it, or we may as well give up any idea of having our customs laws executed with any fidelity upon the lakes. All customs laws are inconvenient, but we cannot be expected to abolish them entirely for that reason, so long as we must have some revenue for the support of our Government.

In section five I notice that the penalty is reduced from $100 to twenty dollars; so that if the master of any vessel shall fail to comply with the provisions of the act he shall only forfeit twenty dollars. It seems to me that that is a very great reduction; and I will add that, in my judgment, the penalty of $100 as it exists in the present law is none too much.

Then, when you come to the fee bill, I understood the Senator from Michigan, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, to intimate that in his opinion the fee bill as here proposed was not reduced more than about five per cent. I suppose that if the fee bill should remain the same that by existing laws it now is, and these vessels should only be required to pay fees at one port, while they may touch at three or four or a dozen, the amount of fees will be reduced at least one half; but, in point of fact, the fees are very largely reduced by this bill, as I have ascertained by making a comparison of it with the law which we passed March 3, 1865. I find in almost every instance, or in a great number of instances, that the fees are very much reduced. For instance, "for certificate of enrollment, including bond and oath," the fee as proposed in this amendment is one dollar; but in the existing law it is for a vessel not over fifty tons, one dollar; for a vessel over fifty and not over one hundred and fifty tons, $1 50; and for a vessel over one hundred and fifty tons, two dollars. Then "for granting license, including bond and oath, if not over twenty tons," the fee proposed by this measure is forty-five cents. Under the existing law it is for vessels under one hundred and fifty tons, one dollar, and over one hundred and fifty tons, $1 50. "For receiving manifest, including master's oath, on arrival of a vessel from one collection district to another, whether touching at foreign intermediate ports or not, under fifty tons," it is proposed to make the fee twenty-five cents; under the existing law it is seventy-five cents. "For receiving manifest, including master's oath, on arrival of a vessel from one collection district to another, whether touching at foreign intermediate ports or not, over fifty tons," it is proposed to put the fees at fifty cents; it is now one dollar.

Then I find that there is an increase in one part of the bill of fees. "For the entry of a vessel above fifty tons direct from a foreign port," the fee is to be $2 50; under the existing law it is only one dollar; clearance to a foreign port is also raised from one dollar to two and a half. I do not see the propriety of increasing these fees merely because vessels come from a foreign port. It is opposed to our system in relation to the foreign trade generally. I do not think this change ought to be made. It would be a very great hardship to compel these vessels of small burden, when they leave for or touch a foreign port, to pay $2 50; and where they do it, as they do in some instances very frequently or several times a day, it amounts to a very grievous burden.

I could go through the whole of this section and show that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce is certainly mistaken in relation to the amount of the reduction. Having, as Congress did, very carefully considered this matter in the law of March 3, 1865, I think it would be unwise for us so soon thereafter to make a change. Those fees are now well understood, and, so far as I know, they are very generally satisfactory. They were satisfactory at the time they were made, and I see no reason for any change. It is important that we make these fees, so far as possible, self-sustaining to the officers that are required to execute these laws. I think it therefore imprudent for us at this time to reduce these fees so that the officers on all the lake ports will become a direct charge upon the Treasury.

The last section of the bill, I find, totally revolutionizes the mode of distribution of forfeitures and penalties. Under the existing law one fourth part goes to the officers, one fourth part to the United States, and one half to the informer. This last section proposes to make a radical change. It provides—"That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have authority to ascertain the facts upon all applications for remission of fines or penalties incurred under the provisions of this act, where the amount in question does not exceed $1,000, in such manner and under such regulations as he may deem proper, and he may thereupon remit or mitigate such fines or penalties if, in his opinion, the same shall have been incurred without willful negligence or intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same," &c.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me it would be exceedingly imprudent for us to place this authority in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and impose this duty upon him, in all cases where the penalties and forfeitures did not exceed $1,000, of distributing those penalties to whomsoever he pleased, giving all to one party or none at all. It strikes me that we ought to allow the law on that subject to remain as it is; and there is no reason for changing the distribution of these fines and penalties on the lakes any more than on our ocean commerce. For these reasons, unless the bill be amended, I hope it will not pass.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I have given this bill some little attention since the objections were made the other day, and I think it may be obnoxious to some of the objections brought against it by the Senator from Vermont. The object of the bill, however, I take to be a good one. It applies particularly to the commerce of the lakes, and the situation of that commerce is a little peculiar. The chief feature of the bill is to relieve it from the burdens which are now imposed upon it by the law of 1866, by which each vessel is required to take out a manifest at every port at which it touches. For instance, a vessel leaving Detroit and bound for Chicago would touch at very many points; I do not know how many, but a large number, more or less. Now, as the law stands, she is obliged to take out a manifest at each of those intermediate ports. Manifests there can be no object in that. It imposes a great burden, it causes delays, and great expense is consequent upon it. Any one will see at a glance that that is an imposition of a needless burden on the commerce of the lakes. It gives no security whatever to the revenues of the country, and is a gratuitous burden upon the commerce of that section. The bill was drawn to obviate that difficulty, but I am inclined to think that it was not altogether well protected in that respect, and to obviate the difficulties suggested by the Senator from Vermont I propose to move a few amendments. In line fifteen of the first section of the substitute reported by the Committee on Commerce, I propose to insert after the words "United States" the words "and shall not touch at a foreign port or place on its passage." The effect of that will be that a vessel starting from Detroit and bound for Chicago takes her clearance or her manifest, and if she touches at any intermediate port her commander is obliged, by the provisions of this bill, to enter on her manifest whatever that vessel takes on at the intermediate port, but he is not obliged to report to the custom-house officer.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I would suggest to my friend from Maine that he alter his amendment somewhat, so as to insert after the word "port," in line eighteen, the words "not having touched at any foreign port." There will be a little confusion if he puts the amendment in the place where he proposes to insert it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well; I am inclined to think that is better, and I accept that modification. I move to insert after the word "port," in line eighteen of the first section, the words "not having touched at any foreign port or place," so as to read:

And in case such vessel shall touch at any intermediate port in the United States, and there discharge cargo taken on board at an American port, or at such intermediate ports shall take on cargo destined for an American port, not having touched at any foreign port or place, the master of such vessel shall not be required to report such lading or unloading at such intermediate ports, but shall enter the same on his manifest, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I propose another amendment, to obviate a difficulty suggested by the Senator from Vermont, in the fifth section. It is said that the fifth section alters the penalty. I do not know whether that ought to be so or not, but perhaps it is immaterial. I move to amend the section by striking out in line five the word "twenty" and inserting "one hundred," so as to make the penalty $100.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That is right. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. A further suggestion of the Senator is that this changes the fee bill. I do not understand that it does very materially; but I am inclined to think in one or two particulars it may be burdensome to commerce. For instance, on the tenth page: "For the entry of a vessel above fifty tons direct from a foreign port, $2 50." And further down: "For the clearance of a vessel above fifty tons, direct to a foreign port, $2 50. That may be very onerous on the commerce of that section, and I am inclined to think it would be wrong. But I doubt if there is any great necessity for a revision of the fee bill at all, and therefore I move to strike out the seventh section entire, excepting that part beginning on the tenth page, at the forty-seventh line, after the word "provided," down to and including line fifty, so as to strike out everything relating to fees, and leave the section provide simply—

That vessels departing to or arriving from a port in one district to or from a port in an adjoining district, and touching at intermediate foreign ports, are exempted from the payment of the entry fees.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to amend the section by inserting before the word "and" in line forty-nine the words "between the ports of entry thereof."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to strike out the ninth section, which is another section objected to by the Senator from Vermont. That is in regard to the fines and penalties.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Now, I ask my friend from Maine if he will not consent to strike out the third section in relation to steam-tugs. I can conceive of no particular benefit in it, and certainly it may be liable to a great deal of abuse.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would state that there are a class of vessels, and a very large class, engaged exclusively in towing. If they take on board freights they are not included in this section. It simply includes those tugs that are engaged exclusively in towing. There are fifty or one hundred on the Detroit river and the river St. Clair. There seems to be no reason why those tugs, every time they touch a port, as they carry no merchandise, should take out a permit.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask my friend if he does not see that they might be tempted very strongly to carry a little merchandise if they were not watched.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would say to my friend from Vermont that they are liable to seizure and forfeiture for any act of that kind. Their reporting to the custom-house, every time they touch, is no sort of protection against smuggling. If they do smuggle, they are liable to be seized and forfeited to the Government. It is simply an annoyance without any apparent object. I should dislike to see that section stricken out, because I see no danger to the revenue in it. I agree with the Senator from Vermont in trying to guard and protect the revenue against smuggling in every possible way, but I see no benefit from striking out this section.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is obvious, and must be so to the Senator from Michigan, that if these vessels are not required to touch, they never come within the purview of any officer to be examined at all, and they may therefore evade the law with the utmost facility. I do not see that it is a very great hardship for them to call, like other vessels. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will strike out the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out the third section.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that will not be stricken out.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

It is to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the master of every vessel enrolled or licensed to engage in the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States shall, before the departure of his vessel from a port in one collection district to a port in another collection district, present to the collector at the port of departure duplicate manifests of his cargo, or, if he have no cargo, duplicate manifests setting forth that fact, which manifests shall be subscribed and sworn or affirmed to by the master before the collector, who shall indorse thereon his certificate of clearance, retaining one for the files of his office, the other he shall deliver for the use of the master. And in case such vessel shall touch at any intermediate port in the United States, and there discharge cargo taken on board at an American port, or at such intermediate ports shall take on board cargo destined for an American port not having touched at any foreign port or place, the master of such vessel shall not be required to report such lading or unloading at such intermediate ports, but shall enter the same on his manifest obtained at the original port of departure, which he shall deliver to the collector of the port at which the unloading of the cargo is completed within twenty-four hours after arrival, and shall subscribe and make oath (or affirm) as to the truth and correctness of the same. And the master of such vessel shall, before departing from a port in one collection district to a place in another collection district where there is no custom-house, file his manifest and obtain a clearance in manner aforesaid, and make oath or affirmation to the manifest aforesaid, which manifest and clearance shall be delivered to the proper officer of customs at the port at which said vessel next arrives after leaving the place of destination specified in said clearance: Provided, That the master of any vessel with cargo, passengers, or baggage from any foreign port or place, shall obtain a permit and comply with existing laws before discharging or landing the same: And provided further, That nothing in this section contained shall exempt masters of vessels from reporting, as now required by law, any goods, wares, or merchandise destined for any foreign port: And be it further provided, That no permit shall be required for the unloading of cargo brought from an American port.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the master of any vessel enrolled or licensed as aforesaid, destined with cargo from a place in the United States at which there may be no custom-house to a port where there may be a custom-house, shall, within twenty-four hours after arrival at the port of destination, deliver to the proper officer of the customs a manifest, subscribed by him, setting forth the cargo laden at the place of departure, or laden or unladen at any intermediate port or place, to the truth of which manifest he shall make oath or affirm before such officer: Provided, That if said vessel have no cargo the master shall not be required to deliver such manifest.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That steam-tugs duly enrolled and licensed to engage in the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, when exclusively employed in towing vessels, shall not be required to report and clear at the custom-house: Provided, That when said steam-tugs shall be employed in towing rafts or other vessels without sail or steam motive-power, not required to be enrolled or licensed under existing laws, they shall be required to report and clear in the same manner as is hereinbefore provided in similar cases for other vessels.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the manifests, certificates of clearance, oaths, or affirmations provided for by this act shall be in such form, and prepared, filled up, and executed in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if the master of any enrolled or licensed vessel, as aforesaid, shall neglect or fail to comply with any of the provisions or requirements of the foregoing sections of this act, such master shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every failure or neglect, and for which sum the vessel shall be liable, and may be summarily proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That in case the master or owner of any vessel shall willfully and falsely swear or affirm to any of the matters or facts herein required to be sworn or affirmed to, said master or owner shall be deemed to be guilty of perjury, and shall be liable to all the fines and penalties imposed by existing laws punishing such offenses.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That vessels departing to or arriving from a port in one district to or from a port in an adjoining district and between the ports of entry thereof, touching at intermediate foreign ports, are exempted from the payment of the entry fees.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That section one of an act entitled "An act to further provide for the collection of the revenue upon the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1862; and section six of an act entitled "An act to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1864; and so much of an act entitled "An act to regulate the fees of custom-house officers on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States," approved March 8, 1865, and all other acts or parts of acts conflicting with or supplied by this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 252) to establish an additional land district in the State of Minnesota. It is a bill that was agreed to unanimously by the Committee on Public Lands, and will occupy but little time of the Senate. It was introduced by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. RAMSEY,] and he desires to have it passed.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to establish an additional land district in Minnesota, embracing all that part of the present northwestern land district which lies north of township No. 126 north, and west of range No. 35, west of the fifth principal meridian, and to fix from time to time the boundaries thereof, which district shall be named after the place at which the office shall first be established; and the President is to have power to fix from time to time the location of the office for such district. The President is to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and receiver for this land district, who shall be required to reside at the site of the land office, who shall be subject to the same laws and responsibilities, and whose compensation respectively shall be the same as that now allowed by law to other land officers in said State.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. There is a misprint in the bill. In the seventh line the word "six" should be "four," so as to read "north of township No. 124, north."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be considered as made, and it is made accordingly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should really like to know what the necessity is of establishing a new land district in the State of Minnesota. What do you call a land district? What officers does it involve the appointment of?

Mr. POMEROY. This is a section of country, embracing about a third of the State, which has never had any land district in it. A land district is a section of a State where there is a land office, to which settlers go to enter their lands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It involves the appointment of a register and receiver, I suppose.

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is that all?

Mr. POMEROY. That is all. It is a matter of convenience to settlers not to have to go more than fifty or one hundred miles to a land office. In my State, in some instances, they have to go over one hundred miles.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Has it been customary to establish several land offices in one State?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir; and to discontinue them from time to time as the lands are settled and entered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, sir; if the committee recommend the bill I make no objection.

Mr. POMEROY. This bill creates a register and receiver, but their salaries are only $500 a year each.

Mr. JOHNSON. But besides that they get fees.

Mr. POMEROY. The rest of their compensation is paid by fees for the business they do.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to extend the time for the construction of the Southern Pacific railroad, in the State of California, reported yesterday from the Committee on Public Lands. It will not occupy much time.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, of the State of California, shall, instead of the times now fixed by law for the construction of the first section of its road and telegraph line, have until the 1st of July, 1870, for the construction of the first thirty miles, and shall be required to construct at least twenty miles every year thereafter, and the whole line of the road within the time now provided by law.

Mr. CONNESS. I will simply say, in explanation, that a grant of lands was made in 1866 to aid in the construction of this road; that the company are now engaged in it, and have contracted for the construction of thirty miles, and this is to extend their time, as done in other cases.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the entire time within which the road is to be completed?

Mr. CONNESS. By 1872, I think.

Mr. JOHNSON. This does not change that.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President, I understand that a portion of this road is contracted for and operations have been commenced, and that it will be completed within the present summer, early in the summer.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. I would ask my colleague if the time extended is not rather too long; the bill proposes until 1870. Would not a shorter time answer every purpose?

Mr. CONNESS. It is an extension for only two years, which is the extension usually given. The probability is that they may have the thirty miles constructed within the next year; but as the next session of Congress is to be a very short one and probably crowded with business, there may be difficulty in getting a further extension of time if it should be necessary. So we thought it was best to ask for this extension now.

Mr. COLE. But the first thirty miles are to be completed within a few months, as I understand.

Mr. CONNESS. Not within a few months.

Mr. COLE. I understand so; they are to be completed this summer. I have no objection to the extension of time; but if there is any way to expedite the construction of the road I would gladly see that object accomplished.

Mr. POMEROY. The company are not obliged to take the time.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all; they will not take it probably.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNION CHAPEL.

Mr. WILLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 433.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 433) authorizing the trustees of Union Chapel, of the Methodist Episcopal church, in the city of Washington, to mortgage their property for church purposes, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize George Reindhart, John Byram, John B. Hines, William Worth, and George T. McGlue, trustees of Union Chapel, of the Methodist Episcopal church, in the city of Washington, to execute and deliver a mortgage on lot No. 28 and lot No. 29, in square No. 101, belonging to that church in the city of Washington, in order thereby to enable these trustees to procure money for the purpose of erecting a parsonage on those lots and otherwise improving them, for the use and benefit of the church, in manner and form as the legally constituted authorities of the church shall prescribe and direct.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS OF COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to have a day set apart for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Commerce; and I move that Saturday next, if that be agreeable to the Senate, be set apart for the consideration of the business from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONNESS. I, of course, have no objection, but the Senator, it appears to me, for commerce, takes a good deal of time. He has occupied all this morning and a morning a few days since with a very important bill from that committee, and if he is to have a day set apart for him he ought not to poach upon other time; the Senator will forgive the use of that word.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator evidently does not comprehend the entire commercial interests of the United States, [laughter,] or he would understand that they require a little more time than a half hour in the morning. However, if Saturday is not agreeable to the Senate, I will name any other day, but I mentioned Saturday in the hope that it would be agreeable to the Senate. I move that Saturday be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

TERRITORY OF WYOMING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate, the morning hour having expired, being the bill (S. No. 357) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming. This bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The bill was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Territories have reported the bill with several amendments, which will be reported.

Mr. YATES. Before the amendments are reported I will state that there is nothing material in those amendments; and before they are read, I desire to make a very brief statement, from the tables and representations laid before the committee, of the extent, resources, and population of this new Territory.

Dakota Territory, which comprises almost all the proposed Territory of Lincoln, is composed of two immense areas almost distinct from each other; more distinct than the territories of Wisconsin and Illinois or Missouri and Iowa, for the latter States join each other contiguously in their whole breadth, while the two divisions of Dakota only touch each other for about one quarter of the extent of the Territory north and south—for only about two degrees on the 104th meridian of west longitude. The eastern division is nearly four hundred miles square, extending from latitude 43° north to 49° north, and from longitude 96° and some minutes west to longitude 104° west. In this area, and near the eastern boundary, is Yanc-ton, the capital of the Territory. The other area extends from latitude 41° to 45° north, and from longitude 104° to 111° west, being about three hundred and fifty miles long and three hundred wide, and out of this latter area it is proposed to constitute the Territory of Lincoln. If symmetry is to be regarded in carving out these embryo States the proposed division at a glance upon the map fully commends itself.

The population of the proposed Territory is estimated at not less than twenty thousand at the present time, which is a much larger portion than the eastern division is reported to contain. These twenty thousand people are practically without the benefits of civil government in the Territory on account of the immense distance from Yanc-ton, the territorial seat of government, the distance being about seven hundred miles by the nearest route of travel. The intervening country is infested by Indians, who render travel insecure and expensive. Add to this the inclemency of winter and the great length of the journey, and it is found that the proper administration of justice through the territorial courts in the western part of Dakota is almost impossible and attended with enormous expense both to litigants and (in criminal cases) to the Government. Under these circumstances there is apprehension and real danger that the people in that remote region in necessary self-defense will resort to vigilance committees and lynch-law unless Congress provides against it by increased judicial facilities or a separate territorial organization.

The resources of the proposed Territory are represented to us as large and rapidly developing, through the enterprise of the hardy pioneers, who are gathering there by thousands, attracted by the discovery of gold deposits, which in richness are unsurpassed on the continent. There are also valuable springs of petroleum, which will prove a source of wealth, and provide for the profitable employment of emigrants. Coal deposits also of large extent, which must furnish fuel for the Union Pacific railroad, and for the population along its line for hundreds of miles, have been discovered, and are being successfully worked. This is an item of great importance, resulting from the scarcity of timber in that region.

The rapid construction of the Pacific railroad in the direction of this Territory is without a parallel. Less than a year ago not a mile of railway was constructed. By the next autumn there will be completed four hundred miles stretching across the Territory. There are already twenty thousand people living on this line; and unquestionably this number will be doubled, perhaps trebled, within the present year.

In addition to the large mining interests, and the impetus to trade which is given by this great national highway, the Territory abounds in rich valleys, capable of supporting a large pastoral population. Cities and towns are springing up, and dot the plain for hundreds of miles. Cheyenne City, which was laid out on the 4th day of July, 1867, has already five thousand inhabitants; and habitations have continued to be erected throughout the present winter. South Pass City, laid out in November last, has six hundred people, and is rapidly increasing; and so of various towns and villages.

The bill proposes to detach a small portion of territory now included under the organization of Utah. It is but one degree in extent from north to south, and the same from east to west. In this little square is located Fort Bridger, a military post of some importance. The population to be thus transferred from Utah to the new Territory—with a single exception—is entirely gentile, as they are designated by Mormons, and have petitioned us for the transfer. It is also proposed to transfer an irregularly-shaped strip of territory nearly a degree in width, and something over two degrees in length from north to south, now attached to Idaho. This was deemed proper by the committee in order to attain symmetry in the geographical boundaries of the new Territory. The committee was not advised that there is a dissenting voice among the inhabitants of the portion of Utah to the proposed change. On the contrary, being separated by a lofty range of mountains from their territorial seat of government, they eagerly accept the change. The committee are told that there is not a single inhabitant in the portion of Idaho transferred by this bill, therefore no opposition can come from that quarter.

The citizens and authorities of Dakota Territory express a strong desire that this bill may have the approval of Congress.

Looking at its resources and the prospective early completion of the Union Pacific railroad through its entire breadth, and the rapidity with which emigration is seeking its borders, I cannot doubt that in a few years it will become one of our most prosperous western States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Territories will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read the first amendment, which was in section one, line three, after the words "all part of the" to strike out the following words:

Territory now known as Dakota, lying west of the one hundred and fourth degree of west longitude, be, and the same is hereby, organized into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Wyoming.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

United States, described as follows: commencing at the intersection of the twenty-seventh meridian of longitude west from Washington with the forty-fifth degree of north latitude, and running thence west to the thirty-fourth meridian of west longitude, thence south to the forty-first degree of north latitude, thence east to the twenty-seventh meridian of west longitude, and thence north to the place of beginning, be, and the same is hereby, organized into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Lincoln.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose the chairman of the Committee on Territories has examined this description with care.

Mr. YATES. Yes, sir; very carefully.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But it would not do at all according to Johnson's Atlas.

Mr. YATES. What is the matter with it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. It does not fall in the section of the country where it is proposed to establish this Territory.

Mr. YATES. The Senator will find that it is all right. I will state that the committee examined it from the new maps prepared, and we had the newly-elected delegate from the Territory before us. I hope the bill will not be delayed. It will have to go to the House of Representatives, and I trust the Senate will pass it to-day. The map which the Senator has before him does not show the true state of the case at all. We have a new map.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This description of the new Territory will leave a singular-shaped Territory for Idaho, a little on the north, and a little on the south, and a little on the west of the new Territory.

Mr. YATES. I assure the honorable Senator that when he comes to examine the new map, he will be satisfied; if not, it can be corrected afterward.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think we ought to pass the bill until it is right.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me there cannot be any mistake about the boundaries as they are here described. It is a mere parallelogram; the latitudes and longitudes are given:

Commencing at the intersection of the twenty-seventh meridian of longitude west from Washington with the forty-fifth degree of north latitude—

That is a point fixed exactly, of course—and running thence west to the thirty-fourth meridian of west longitude—

That is plain—thence south to the forty-first degree of north latitude

That is square—thence east to the twenty-seventh meridian of west longitude—

The same meridian they commenced on—and thence north to the place of beginning.

It is utterly impossible that this description should be wrong, because it is four degrees of latitude wide and seven degrees of longitude—a square form. There cannot be any mistake about the boundaries. It is a parallelogram, parallel lines, not a square exactly, but a parallelogram as near as geographical lines ever are.

[A large map, the one referred to by Mr. YATES, was brought into the Chamber, and Senators gathered in a group around it, examining it.]

Mr. YATES. The Senator from Indiana, I believe, is satisfied that the description in the bill is right.

Mr. HENDRICKS. From an examination of the map prepared at the Indian office, which I presume is correct, the description seems to be correct as contained in the bill. Judging, however, from Johnson's Atlas, it would not be at all correct. For the present, therefore, I do not object to the description of the Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SUMNER. On that amendment I desire simply to call the attention of my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Territories, to that part which relates to the change of name. I observe that the House of Representatives, in the bill as it comes from their committee, call this Territory by the Indian name of Wyoming. Our committee proposes a substitute for Wyoming. Of course, it is impossible for me to make any suggestion that shall be in any way disparaging of the name that is proposed by our committee; but I have always thought that in naming these Territories, destined, of course, hereafter to be States, we should, if possible, select names that belong to the soil; that are, if I may so say, aboriginal; that grow out of the country itself; in other words, the Indian names. They are generally more beautiful; they are certainly more original and interesting. I do not wish to make any opposition to the recommendation of the committee, and if my friend thinks it advisable to persevere in the proposed change, and substitute Lincoln for Wyoming, I, of course, should yield. I content myself with calling attention to the proposed change; and that is all I shall do.

Mr. YATES. I do not know that the committee were particularly tenacious as regards the name. It was not considered that there was any particular reason, from locality or otherwise, why this Territory should be called Wyoming, and the committee were unanimous in agreeing that it should be called Lincoln. For myself, I should prefer an Indian name, wherever it is to be had, especially one that was applicable to the Territory, by which some original tribe of the Indians was called.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why not call it Cheyenne? That is the name of the Indian tribe who have from time immemorial existed there, or just south of there.

Mr. NYE. What does that name mean? What is the signification of it?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it means snakes.

Mr. NYE. We do not want any snakes.

[Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Cheyenne is a very pretty name. The name of Mississippi has a very bad signification. Look at the name of the Ohio. That is called the beautiful river. There is not a more pretty name in our language than Chicago, but it is a very bad one in the Indian tongue.

Mr. NYE. In my opinion, if the name is to be changed at all, from what the committee propose, it had better be Wyoming.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the chairman if the name of Wyoming is not found in the Territory?

Mr. YATES. No, sir; it belongs to Pennsylvania.

Mr. SUMNER. I know, originally; but then what suggested this name for this Territory?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It was suggested by General Ashley.

Mr. SUMNER. But what suggested it to General Ashley?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Because it is a beautiful name.

Mr. YATES. I was about to remark that although individually I might prefer an Indian name, yet there was some propriety in calling this Territory after Mr. Lincoln. We have but one Territory called after an individual, and that is Washington. The circumstances attending the death of Mr. Lincoln, his assassination, and the high esteem in which he was held by the country, not only by his own party, but by the opposite party, suggested his name as a very appropriate one, and I think the committee were unanimous in reporting the name of Lincoln instead of Wyoming.

Mr. POMEROY. If this Territory is to have a new name, if it is to be named after any man, perhaps the name of Lincoln is as unobjectionable as any; but we have generally named the States, when they became States, after the name of the Territories of which they were composed. We have never had any State named after any man, however good or great.

We have the Territory of Washington, to be sure; but when it becomes a State I doubt very much whether it will be called the State of Washington. While I have no particular passion for Indian names, and do not think they are any better because they are Indian, at the same time I would name a Territory after some conspicuous place or event connected with it. You find that all the States bear the name either of some river or some mountain or some scene connected with their history. In no instance that I know of have we named either Territories or States after any distinguished man, with the bare exception of Washington Territory, which, perhaps, was named after the Father of his Country.

Mr. YATES. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that, as far as I can gather from persons from the Territory, the name of Cheyenne is more popular there. That was the tribe, as I am informed, which originally occupied the country, and who were driven out by the Sioux. That seems to be the name which the people of the Territory would prefer.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to go on with this bill, and leave the question of the name until we come to the title of the bill. I should not like to have it passed upon at this moment, nor should I like to occupy the time of the Senate upon it now, because there are a great many amendments to this bill to be considered, and I should prefer to have them considered first.

Mr. SUMNER. But the Senator will bear in mind that the name is in the very amendment now under consideration. That is the reason I called attention to it.

Mr. POMEROY. It can be passed by for the present, so far as the name is concerned.

Mr. YATES. This amendment only relates to the boundaries and the name, and the question of the name can be passed over if gentlemen wish it.

Mr. SUMNER. If there be an understanding to the effect that the question of the name is reserved to the end, there is no objection to that course.

Mr. YATES. I have no objection to that.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have that question thoroughly considered, because I have great doubt whether we should name States or Territories after any man.

Mr. MORTON. I will go as far as any Senator to honor the name of Mr. Lincoln; but his fame does not require this recognition, and I think the example would be unfortunate to name States after our public men. We have adopted the system, I believe, and carried it out, as far as we could, of naming the western and northwestern States after Indian tribes, or giving to them the same names that the Indians gave them, and in that way we have obtained beautiful names for nearly all the western States. I do not think a prettier name could be found than that of Wyoming, and for one I would prefer giving this Territory that name.

Mr. FERRY. Why give the name of a place in Pennsylvania to this Territory off among the Rocky mountains? I think if we are going to have an Indian name we should take one from that region.

Mr. MORTON. Very well.

Mr. RAMSEY. Why not take the name of Shoshonee? The Shoshonees are a most powerful tribe of Indians in the western part of the Territory.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is there any way of spelling that? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes.

Mr. MORTON. I think it is important to get a name easily spelled, easily pronounced, and beautiful in sound.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Cheyennes never occupied this Territory, I believe; they were east and south of it; but the Shoshonees occupied the western part of it, and there might be some propriety in calling it Shoshonee, which is certainly as musical and as soft as Cheyenne.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BUCKALEW. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fixing the name and boundaries of the Territory.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to strike out the name for the present. We can act on the boundaries now, and leave the name blank.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have it left blank for the present.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I suggest that we leave the name of Wyoming until we agree upon something better. It is certainly a very beautiful name, and very convenient for use.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio move to amend the amendment by striking out the name?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. POMEROY. In order to pass the amendment without the name, we shall have to strike out the name of Lincoln in the amendment. I move to amend the amendment by striking out that name.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. Is the name blank now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The name is blank.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I move to insert "Cheyenne." It seems to be generally agreeable, and we may as well adopt it.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator will allow us to dispose of the other amendment first.

Mr. RAMSEY. Very well; I withdraw the motion for the present.

The next amendment was in section one, line twenty-four, to strike out "Wyoming" and insert "Lincoln."

Mr. POMEROY. Let that be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment, and all similar amendments relating simply to the name of the Territory, will be passed over for the present.

The next amendment was in section four, line eleven, to strike out "one year" and insert "two years;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the legislative power and authority of said Territory shall be vested in the Governor and Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly shall consist of a Council and House of Representatives. The Council shall consist of nine members, which may be increased to thirteen, having the qualifications of voters as hereinafter prescribed, whose term of service shall continue two years. The House of Representatives shall consist of thirteen members, which may be increased to twenty-seven, possessing the same qualifications as prescribed for members of the Council, and whose term of service shall continue two years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think this amendment is a departure from the precedents on this subject. There may be some reason for it, and if there is, of course I shall acquiesce in the amendment. It provides that members of the Council, as I understand it, shall hold their office for two years, and that the members of the House of Representatives shall also hold their office for two years, making the term for the members of the Council and members of the House of Representatives identically the same. So far as I know, in all bills heretofore passed for the organization of Territories the members of the Council have held their offices in some cases four years and the members of the House for two years, and in other cases the members of the Council for two years and the members of the House for one year. But this amendment provides, contrary to the precedents in such cases, and, I think, contrary to the constitutions of all the States, that they shall hold their offices, both the members of the Council and the members of the House, for the same length of time. It seems to me that it is desirable to have a difference in the tenure of office, so that both Houses may not be elected at the same election, but at different elections. I cannot find in this bill that there is any provision made as to sessions of the Legislative Assembly. That seems to be left altogether to the action of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory, so that they may hold sessions every year or biennially, as they may see proper. I should prefer, so far as I am concerned, to have the bill stand as it was originally framed, authorizing the members of the Council to hold for two years and the members of the House for one.

Mr. NYE. That is a point upon which the simple question of convenience was consulted. I know how difficult and expensive it is to hold elections every year in these wide-spread Territories. This amendment was simply put in as a matter of convenience and to save expense to the Territory. My own experience has been that these elections are very expensive and very troublesome; and, considering the slight experience they get the first year, having so short a session, I think it is hardly worth while to change them every year. If, however, the Senator from Oregon raises an objection to it, he can move an amendment providing that the Council shall hold for two years and the House for one. There is no tenacity about that point.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the provision of the bill as it originally stood, and the committee propose to amend it by inserting two years. I should prefer, as far as I am concerned, to have the sessions of the Legislature biennial.

Mr. NYE. There is no objection to letting the bill stand as it was if there is any opposition to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment was in section five, line one, to strike out the word "free" before the word "male," and in line four, after the word "act," to strike out the words "and who did not bear arms against the United States during the late rebellion;" so as to make the section read:

That every male inhabitant of the United States above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of the said Territory at the time of the passage of this act, shall be entitled to vote at the first and all subsequent elections in the Territory, and shall be eligible to hold any office in said Territory, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section five, line sixteen, after "United States" to strike out the words "and that they have never borne arms against the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section six:

Every bill which shall have passed the Council and the House of Representatives of said Territory shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor of the Territory. If he approves, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections to the House in which it originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their Journal and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, to be entered on the Journal of each House, respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the Governor within three days (Sunday excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Assembly, by adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

Mr. NYE. By consent of the chairman of the committee, I move to strike out the word "three" in the amendment, and insert "five." I make the motion for the reason that most of the bills that come to the Governor from the territorial Legislature come within the two or three last days of the session, and they will have to establish here a civil practice act, which will take five or six hundred sections, and leave the Governor hardly time to give it such examination as ought to be given to it in order to approve or disapprove it. I move, therefore, on the part of the committee, to strike out "three" and insert "five" days.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YATES. I ask to have the Secretary correct the word "approves" in the fifteenth line. It should be "approve."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section nine, line eighteen, after the word "justices" to insert the words "of the peace."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be considered as agreed to unless objection is made.

The next amendment was in section eleven, line thirty-three, to strike out "three" and insert "four;" so that the clause will read:

The members of the Legislative Assembly shall be entitled to receive four dollars each per day.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Territories are now gone through with, with the exception of those as to the question of the name.

Mr. YATES. I now move to insert, wherever the name of "Wyoming" or "Lincoln" occurs, the name of "Cheyenne." I make this motion because I have been informed repeatedly, and know the fact, that the people of the Territory prefer that name as applicable to the Territory. They call their principal city by that name. I am informed by Mr. Chaffee, the Senator-elect from Colorado, that he is familiar with the facts of the case, knows the people there, and knows that they would prefer that name to any other, unless it may be that of "Lincoln."

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say one word on this subject, because I traveled through this Territory once, and therefore feel an interest in it. The name of Cheyenne is now all over on the geography of that country. There is Cheyenne Pass; there is Cheyenne City, the principal town; there is Cheyenne river, with five or six branches; the Big Fork of the Cheyenne, the Little Cheyenne, and the Cheyenne mountain; and it is the name of the tribe that occupied the whole of that country.

Mr. POMEROY. How do you spell it?

Mr. SHERMAN. C-h-e-y-e-n-n-e. I think that would be a very appropriate name.

Mr. CONNESS. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to fill the blank in the fifteenth line of the first section by inserting the word "Cheyenne."

Mr. MORTON. It occurs to me that this word is not a very handsome one. There are some words in the language which are never dignified and cannot be made so; some sounds that in one language are dignified and are not so in another. You cannot make a very handsome word of Chien.

Mr. SHERMAN. Cheyenne, [pronouncing it as if spelled shay-en.]

Mr. MORTON. I understand the Senator from Minnesota says it is Cheyenne, [Shy-en.]

Mr. RAMSEY. That is the common pronunciation, ["Shy-en"]. We have the Cheyenne river in Minnesota, a branch of the Red river of the North, and Cheyenne on the Missouri, again, coming in from the west side. It is a common name.

Mr. MORTON. The name would be pronounced as if spelled "Shy-en."

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state another fact to show its derivation. I supposed it was derived from the word "snake," but I find it has a more appropriate derivation. It is derived from the Chien or prairie dog, which abounds all over that vast country. The word "Chien" is "dog" in the Indian language.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we had better cur-tail that name. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. It is derived from the word "Chien," or prairie dog, or squirrel.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I do not think you can derive an argument against this name from its derivation. There is not any reason why its derivation should not be what the Senator has stated it to be, and yet be entitled to respect.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I think there is a great object and purpose, and great propriety in preserving the nomenclature for our western States derived from Indian history. This term "Cheyenne" is the name of one of the most extensive Indian tribes of the West.

Mr. FERRY. A French name.

Mr. CONNESS. It is French. I confess that while I am a great lover of the memory and fame of our late martyr President, I do not wish that any other Territory or State shall be organized in the country bearing any man's name. We have one; it was deemed proper to name a Territory after Washington. I have no comment to make upon that; but yet if I had my choice it would be changed, because we are not wanting in the means of perpetuating the memories and greatness of the patriotic men to whom we are indebted from time to time for the institutions under which we live and their perpetuation, other than the mere perpetuation of their names as applied to towns, cities, or States.

I hope that we shall not name this Territory after any man. It is proposed to call it Wyoming Territory. Wyoming is a good name. There is a euphony about it that is pleasant; but it is derived from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON. Good for that.

Mr. CONNESS. My friend from Pennsylvania says "good for that." I do not know whether he means "good for Pennsylvania" or "good for Wyoming."

Mr. CAMERON. Good for Wyoming.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not regard that as an objection to it, but there is a question of propriety about going to the East to find a name for one of the new Commonwealths of the West. I confess that I think, out of the multitude of Indian names properly belonging to the West, we can find one that will be acceptable; and I have no objection to the one proposed by the honorable Senator who has charge of this bill, Cheyenne. As to the derivation of this word, let me make a suggestion. There is a county in the State that I am here representing in part, which is known as Mono county. Mono is the Spanish, I believe, for monkey, but it was not deemed an inappropriate name for a county in that State, where the names of our counties perhaps compare most favorably with those of any other State in the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think my friend from California misunderstood me. He seems to think that I cast reproach on the name proposed because it was derived from the household animal of the Indians.

Mr. CONNESS. I thought so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all; on the contrary most of our beautiful names are derived from the Indian names for animals, and sometimes very offensive animals. For instance, Chicago has a special name of that kind, and so the State of Mississippi. I was merely giving the origin of the name as furnished by the librarian.

Mr. CONNESS. I am very glad to be corrected by the Senator.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I should like to ask the Senator from California a question. I ask if this is a native Indian name, or a name applied to the tribe by the French?

Mr. CONNESS. In either case if they are known to us by that name I suppose the purpose is answered. I presume it is a name applied by the French to them.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Can the Senator give the Indian name of the tribe, the name which they bore antecedent to the time when the French applied this name to them?

Mr. CONNESS. I do not know it. If I were a member of the Committee on Territories I should certainly have hunted this case up and found the proper Indian name.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, on the first use of Indian names they are generally not agreeable or acceptable. On the Illinois Central railroad the stations and villages were named after the Indian names, and they were not acceptable at first and did not appear to be euphonious, but when the people became accustomed to them they rather liked them—such names as Pana, Wapello, Tolona, Tuscola, Tallulah, Wenona. These are names derived from Indian tribes formerly in Illinois. So the name of Cheyenne, when you become accustomed to it, will not be a homely name by any means. It is not so considered by the persons who reside in this Territory, and I am informed that they rather take pride in the name. So far as the derivation of names is concerned, the name of the city of Chicago—and I believe that is considered rather a handsome name now—is derived from an animal so odious as not to be named in the Senate Chamber, or scarcely anywhere else.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President, the question is often asked "What's in a name?" with the intention of giving the impression that there is not much weight to be placed in a name; but in this case, it seems to me, we might make very much of a mistake in calling this Territory Cheyenne. The very fact that different pronunciations are given to the word to my mind is a sufficient objection to its being accepted as the name of a State or Territory. We all ought to know what it is called, from the spelling of it, when the name is selected. I am not myself prepared to suggest a name at this time; but there is a large river rising in this Territory, or which passes through it, the Platte river. We have the Mississippi river, and a State named the same; we have the Missouri river and the State of Missouri; and perhaps it might be as well to call this the Territory of Platte, after the Platte river. It means, I believe, a broad river. I think nearly all these names come from the French. If we are to take an Indian name, I should prefer Pawnee, so as to name it after some tribe of Indians the name of which we could pronounce, and where there would be no mistake as to the pronunciation. There is another name belonging to the whole tribe of which the Cheyennes are but a branch. I refer to the Sioux, as they are commonly called. That also is a name of French origin. I do not remember exactly how it originated; but even that, I think, would be a preferable name to the one that is being discussed at present—Cheyenne. I am, for my part, very much opposed to accepting as the name of a Territory or State so uneuphonious a word as Cheyenne.

Mr. CORBETT. I notice that the Snake river has its rise in this Territory, and that it is called the Snake or Shoshonee. It seems to me that Shoshonee is a prettier name and more easily pronounced than Cheyenne or Cayenne, as some pronounce it, and as there is a large river by the name of the Snake or the Shoshonee, and it is identified with the history of one of our powerful tribes of Indians in that country, I think it would not be an inappropriate name for this Territory, and I therefore suggest the name of Shoshonee.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, it seems to me that this Territory should be named, and I think if we stop here to learn the derivation of every name proposed it will become a State before it finds a name as a Territory. The original name by which it was proposed to call this Territory was Wyoming. If there is any name in the Indian catalogue of names that is famous in song and story and legend, if there is any Indian name that has become a common household word, it is the name Wyoming. I think there seems to be so strong an attachment to Indian names that we had better take the most euphonious one, and one with which the ear is most familiar. I therefore hope that this discussion may be stopped by adopting the name that was originally intended to be given to this Territory, Wyoming. It will have two good effects; it will make the history of Pennsylvania (if she claims the paternity of the name) familiar on the plains, and if the name is desirable it is one with which we are entirely familiar; and in the next place it will make all the Senators read Campbell again, and it will revive the legends of the valley of Wyoming.

I hope, sir, that we can agree upon that name, as it is very important that the bill should be christened now. Let us call it Wyoming. I confess I do not like that word Cheyenne, or, as the Senator from Oregon says some would call it, Cayenne, which is very offensive to me. [Laughter.] I do not like it; it makes the world sneeze. [Laughter.] I propose, therefore, that we call it Wyoming. Then all men will know where they are when they get into it. It is so important that this Territory should be now not only born but christened at once that I hope we may adopt that name. I should have liked to have it called Lincoln; I should like to perpetuate that name not only by monuments but in States, in counties, and in towns, but—

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will my honorable friend allow me to suggest a name to him with which, I presume, he will be much more identified? As there is doubt now what this Territory should be called, I suggest to my friend that perhaps he should name it "Ad interim." [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. That, Mr. President, would bring "the eyes of Delaware" upon us at once, [laughter;] the terrible scrutiny of that majestic State, the size of which would not make a county in Wyoming. I prefer not to adopt the name. The State would "stand firm" under the eye of Delaware, but I do not like that scrutiny. My friend will excuse me, therefore, for not adopting the favorite name of Delaware, "Ad Interim." It is obnoxious to me. I have said, sir, all I desire to say. I hope we may agree on this name.

Mr. POMEROY. If we are to adopt the name of either of the tribes of Indians in this Territory—for there are two there, the Arapahoes and Cheyennes—I prefer the name Arapaho.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the term "Cheyenne" is not an Indian name at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have got Schoolcraft here, and Hayden.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. "Chien" is simply the French name for a female dog. [Laughter.] That is the truth about it, whether Schoolcraft says it or not; but Arapaho is an Indian name.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does that mean?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know the meaning of it. It is the name of a tribe of Indians.

But, Mr. President, there are three considerable sized rivers rising in this Territory. There is the Platte river, and with all propriety the Territory might be named from the river itself. There is the Yellow Stone, which rises there. There is, also, the Big Horn river rising there and the Sweet Water. Then there is a range of mountains there. But the Platte, which is a river running through nearly the whole length of this Territory, along the mountain passes, would be a very proper name. If, however, we give it an Indian name I prefer Arapaho to Cheyenne, because Cheyenne is simply a variation of chien, the French name for female dog.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply want to correct a misapprehension into which the Senator has fallen. For the purpose of getting the derivation of the name I sent to our Librarian, Mr. Spofford, a very competent person to find out any matter of this kind or any other to be found in books, and here is his note. I asked him for the derivation of the word "Cheyenne," and he says:

The highest authority, Schoolcraft, (corroborated by Hayden,) on the Philology of the Indian Tribes, says: "This nation has received a variety of names from travelers and the neighboring tribes, as Shyennes, Shyennes, Cheyennes, Chayennes, Shorons, Shoshays, Shoshais, and by the different bands of the Dakotas, Shat-en-na or Shatela, the meaning of which is not known." A. R. SPOFFORD.

It has sometimes been derived from the French chien, a dog, but on no authority that I can discover.

I here desire to say, also, that the word "Cheyenne" is found more frequently in describing the mountains and rivers of this Territory than any other name. The name of Platte and Sweet Water are found there; but there is a river Cheyenne with many tributaries; there is a mountain Cheyenne, there is a pass Cheyenne, there is a town Cheyenne, and, I think, the true spelling, according to Mr. Spofford, is the first name he gives, Shyennes.

Mr. SUMNER. That is the spelling of the river on the map.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the spelling by Schoolcraft. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I do not think there was any occasion for the amendment proposed by the committee. The name contained in the bill in the first place was very beautiful, familiar to everybody in this country; and I accept the proposition of the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. NYE;] we had better stand by that name. The fact that it comes from Pennsylvania is no objection. I am willing, if there be any honor in it, that that grand Commonwealth shall have whatever credit there may be connected with the giving of a name to a great western State. It is altogether the most beautiful name that is proposed. It is connected with an interesting incident in our history, made memorable by the poem to which the Senator from Nevada has referred. I think we had better just adopt that and have all dignified names and nothing else.

Mr. CONKLING. I agree entirely with what has been said by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Indiana, and I rise for the purpose of making one additional suggestion. Nothing is more important about a name than its convenience; its convenience in respect to pronunciation and in respect to spelling. There are all sorts of spelling of Cheyenne or Cayenne or Chien or whatever it may be, and I doubt very much whether before this bill was called up this morning a majority of the Senate could have spelled in the most accepted mode that word. Nobody can doubt how to spell Wyoming. It is clear on its face according to the rules of spelling, with which we are all familiar. Nobody doubts how it is to be pronounced; nobody, as the Senator from Nevada so well illustrated in what he said, can find difficulty in its public pronunciation. It is not only euphonious, but a word adapted to the use we are able to make, in speaking the English language, of our vocal powers.

It is convenient and it is right, it seems to me, in all respects. But I rose more particularly to make this suggestion: I have taken pains to inquire into the derivation of this word, too, and it comes from an Indian word which means "large plains" or "wide plains;" and if derivation is to be invoked, I submit that nothing could be more appropriate. This is a very wide plain; a plain so wide, an area so great, that it has been unknown in the legislation of the world for purposes like this, as far as we know, until in very modern times. Now, I think that adds a little to the propriety of the name, and I hope that we shall end by adopting the name which occurred to those who originally drew this bill as the proper thing both in respect to propriety and convenience.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, as the State I have the honor in part to represent is a neighbor to this new Territory, I may be pardoned for saying a word. I have understood from the people of that region that Wyoming was the name to which they were attached, and recently in conversation with a prominent citizen and an editor in the new Territory I was under the impression from him that they desired no other name than the name of Wyoming. I hope, therefore, that that name will obtain.

Mr. YATES. I withdraw my amendment for the sake of stopping the debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say that I am very much obliged to the Senators who have so ably and properly defended the name originally proposed for this new Territory. I say so as a representative from Pennsylvania. I think there can be no more appropriate name than that first proposed. The valley of Wyoming in Pennsylvania is one of the most beautiful in the State; it is renowned in our history and in the history of the Indian wars. The men of that valley have been among the bravest people of this country, as they have evinced on every fitting occasion, and its women are among the handsomest. The Indians who went by the name of the Wyomings have traveled west, and possibly many of their descendants are now living in that "great plain" which it is proposed to make a Territory.

Besides that, I may say that Pennsylvania has some claim on the great West. There is not a State in all the West that is not made up in part, and largely, by people from Pennsylvania. There has not been a constitution formed in any of the western States which was not formed in part by the minds and the activity of men from Pennsylvania. I see around me on this floor a number of Senators who are descendants of men who first settled in Pennsylvania, and who went out to the West carrying with them the principles which they had imbibed in Pennsylvania, and they have done much for the West, because they learned their principles from their progenitors in Pennsylvania. I think the name of Wyoming is most proper for this Territory, and if it is intended as a compliment to Pennsylvania I regard it as very proper, and I thank the Senators for it.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, the selection of the names of our western Territories and States has always been settled by some local consideration, the residence of an Indian tribe or a river or a lake. I think we should not at this time depart from that custom. While the name of Wyoming is beautiful it will never suggest anything there. It is a name derived, as has been stated, from Pennsylvania. Now, you have in the immediate vicinity of this new organization, and in fact upon its territory, a powerful Indian tribe who have been known to history in past time as having given this Government as much trouble as any other Indian tribe on the Plains—the Cheyennes. By giving the name of Cheyenne to this Territory you will preserve that fact in the recollection of this people. In the course of time, these Indians will be lost; they will disappear as many other tribes have done who are now only known and remembered by the names given to other western States and Territories. There was once a famous nation of Indians known as the Illinois. They are gone, but you have the name they gave to the river which flows through that State. The Indians gave the name to the river, and the river to the State, and that is all that is left of the tribe. The Iowas have disappeared almost entirely, but a State of this Union is known by their name. The name of the State of Wisconsin is taken from the Wisconsin river, given to it by the French. The State of Minnesota is named from the Minnesota river, which name was given to that river by the Indians. Dakota Territory is of course named from the great Dakota tribe. Now, in regard to this proposed new Territory, as it is the scene of the exploits of the Cheyenne Indians, why not preserve that name? It is as musical as any of the rest, and the time will come when it will be the only land-mark we shall have of that tribe. Everything else will have disappeared but the name. I think it will be a great mistake to go East to find a proper name for the Territory, when you have so many around and about it, and the practice of the Government in the past should be preserved in naming this Territory, I think.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand the Senator from Illinois to have withdrawn his amendment, so that there is no amendment now pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the first section be further amended by striking out of it all after the word "Indians," in the nineteenth line. The words which I propose to strike out form a clause which has crept into all our territorial bills, providing that no Indians shall be included within the Territory if by treaty stipulation the Government of the United States has provided that they shall not be included without their consent. The difficulty arising from such a provision is that if the Indian reservations are not included within the jurisdiction of the Territory its authorities can exercise no jurisdiction there; criminals run over, get on the reservations, and escape punishment.

Mr. CONNESS. And treaties follow.

Mr. POMEROY. But there are no such treaties in the Territory to which this applies. I should like to have these words stricken out unless there be some objection on the part of the committee that I cannot comprehend.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to know from those having the bill in charge whether there are any such treaties. I supposed from seeing this provision in the bill that there were treaties which provided that jurisdiction should not be extended over the Indians.

Mr. POMEROY. This is the old phraseology drawn from bills applicable to Territories where the Indian tribes had specific stipulations in a treaty that they should never be included within any State or Territory. The draftsman of this bill simply copied those words. They are not applicable to this place, and ought not to be used, because if you cannot extend the jurisdiction of a Territory over an Indian reservation you cannot catch a criminal on that reservation, and if the Indians are not included in this jurisdiction you have no Territory there, because it is almost all Indian land at present.

Mr. NYE. I suppose that the reason for this provision is that some of the recent treaties made by the commissioners sent out do include a portion of the Indians in this Territory.

Mr. POMEROY. I apprehend that there is no distinctive reservation for these Indians under any treaty by which it is provided that they shall never be included within the jurisdiction of any State or Territory. If there is such a provision it is against the public interest and against public policy, and ought not to be made.

Mr. NYE. The honorable Senator will remember that there is a proposition now pending and commissioners are treating about locating in the northern part of this Territory tribes which it has been proposed to remove there.

Mr. YATES. This provision was proposed with reference to that.

Mr. NYE. Whether that treaty is complete, whether the reservation is located or not, I do not know; but if there is no treaty this provision amounts to nothing and can do no harm. To my knowledge, there is no treaty existing which would require this provision in the bill; but the particular provision was left in on the supposition that before the bill passed a reservation would perhaps be located there by the commissioners now in that region.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will examine this language, he will see that it says that all such land as comes within the description shall be excepted out of the boundaries, and shall constitute no part of the new Territory. What kind of boundaries are you going to have for this Territory if you have such a provision in the bill?

Mr. NYE. The clause rests on the hypothesis that the existing Indian treaty has that provision in it.

Mr. POMEROY. There is no such thing.

Mr. NYE. If there is not the provision cannot do any hurt, and if there happens to be such a treaty it covers it.

Mr. POMEROY. If this provision was not in the bill, and we should afterward consent to a treaty containing such a stipulation, that would be in the nature of a law, and would cover this question. But suppose you put this provision in the bill and it becomes a law, and hereafter commissioners make a treaty that will repeal or modify it, then the question is whether the treaty-making power can abrogate a law of Congress, and you have a more difficult question than you have if these words be left out. Leave them out entirely, and then you have nothing against what a treaty may provide, and if the Senate hereafter make a treaty of the kind supposed there will be no law to conflict with it.

Mr. NYE. On the part of the committee there is no desire to retain this phraseology if it is objectionable, but I think it is entirely harmless. It is useless if no such treaty exists; but I was informed at the Department that probably before this bill passed there would be a treaty existing by which a reservation in this Territory would be set apart for certain Indians. As the Senator must know, this is the very region of country where it is proposed to make that reservation, in the northern part of the Territory, to which to move the tribes from the South.

Mr. POMEROY. If you strike out these words, and such a treaty shall be made, there will be no law to interfere with it.

Mr. NYE. It strikes me the other way.

Mr. POMEROY. There will be no law on the subject, and therefore nothing in the way of making the treaty.

Mr. YATES. The committee were informed that there were several tribes of Indians in Dakota and Montana whom it was desirable to remove to a reservation, and that the commission sent out there for that purpose could find no other Territory so suitable for the purpose as this. The committee, therefore, thought it best to so frame the bill that in case such a reservation should be necessary the act itself would not interfere with it. I cannot see any possible objection to this, because if no such reservation is made this provision will have no effect. I think the amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. POMEROY. The difficulty I have always found with this phraseology is, that if we live up to our agreements, which we never do, we put it into the power of an Indian tribe to say that a State government shall never be extended over them. You commence in the beginning by saying that they shall never be included within the boundaries of any State or Territory without their consent. If that means anything, if we live up to it in the future, it means that unless some little Indian tribe consents, this Government of the United States shall never extend jurisdiction over that Territory. The principle is wrong. The United States has jurisdiction over all this territory, and it is unnecessary to put into a bill of this kind a provision that the tribe must consent in order to have jurisdiction extended over them.

Mr. YATES. What is the proposed amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

Mr. POMEROY. I want to strike out this language, because it is unnecessary. I do not care anything about it, but I think it is entirely unnecessary.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the bill by striking out in the first section all after the word "Indians" in the nineteenth line. The words proposed to be stricken out are as follows:

Or to include any territory which, by treaty with any Indian tribe, is not, without the consent of said tribe, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries and constitute no part of the Territory of (Wyoming) Lincoln, until said tribe shall signify their assent to the President of the United States to be included within the said Territory, or to affect the authority of the Government of the United States to make any regulations respecting said Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, by treaty, law, or otherwise, which it would have been competent for the Government to make if this act had never passed: Provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to inhibit the Government of the United States from dividing said Territory into two or more Territories in such manner and at such time as Congress shall deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion thereof to any other Territory or State.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not care about striking out the proviso. My amendment was intended only to apply to striking out the words as far as the proviso, and I so modify it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. When General Sherman was here he was before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and, if I understood distinctly, the proposition was on the part of the commissioners, of whom he was one, to try to set apart a territory in the North for the northern Indians, or the Indians of the Plains, the Sioux, the Arapahoes, the Cheyennes, &c., to get them away from the great routes of travel by giving to them a territory in the North, the same as we have given to the southern Indians a territory in the South. It may be necessary, in order to come to an arrangement with these great and powerful tribes, for these commissioners to enter into a treaty negotiation by which they will agree that the Indians shall hold the territory which we give them in perpetuity, and that we shall never embrace them within the territorial jurisdiction of a State or Territory without their consent. You may not be able to make treaties with these great and powerful tribes unless you tender to them this kind of a provision for their permanent home. Should that be so, it would be necessary that some such provision as this should be in the bill, and I think the committee have wisely left it in the bill. But if you strike it out, then the jurisdiction of this territorial government, extending over the whole territory, if you come to make a treaty that interferes with the bill itself the Indians may not consent to bring themselves under the territorial jurisdiction.

Mr. RAMSEY. The probability is that these great and powerful tribes will never know anything about it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If my honorable friend thinks the Sioux, the Arapahoes, and the Cheyennes do not know what they are treating about he is very much mistaken.

Mr. RAMSEY. They will probably not know anything about this bill, and not know that these imaginary lines are drawn about certain portions of country.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Wisconsin will read the language of the bill he will find that it only applies to existing treaties. It does not apply to treaties that may be made in the future, and therefore his remarks do not apply to this case.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator from Wisconsin, as well as the Senator from Kansas, knows very well that within the well-defined boundaries of States and Territories are Indian tribes located, and you do not disturb their government or powers at all. They are there, and have been all the time. For instance, the Sioux and the Dakotas were inside the State of Minnesota since its organization as a State, and they were there while it was a Territory. Indians have had reservations marked out within State limits, and the Indian department exercised its powers and jurisdiction over them. That has continued ever since our admission with some Indians in the State. The State or territorial government does not interfere with them in the slightest degree. I would advise the committee to strike out these words as proposed by the Senator from Kansas. The erection of a territorial government does not affect the Indians at all, and therefore the provision is unnecessary.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If there be no such treaty, and no such treaty shall be made, then, as a matter of course, this provision standing in the bill has no effect at all; but if the commission, of which General Sherman is a member, should make such a treaty, and in the treaty agree, as was agreed with the Cherokees, the Choctaws, and the other Indian tribes in the southern Indian territory, that we will not extend a territorial government over them without their consent, if the commission should find it necessary to make such a treaty this provision would be a good provision in the bill, and would be operative; otherwise it would not.

Mr. POMEROY. But this only applies to treaties already existing.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is by no means certain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think that this portion of the section should certainly be stricken out; otherwise it will be impossible to administer justice in this Territory. The boundaries are defined, and the Territory is to be divided into judicial districts, and then the section provides that if any portion of the Territory is in the possession of the Indians, and no treaty is made with those Indians, that portion of the Territory shall not be included within the original boundaries, and shall constitute no part of the Territory. Of course, if it is not a part of the Territory, the jurisdiction of the courts does not extend to that portion which is in the possession of the Indians, and it will make it a city of refuge for criminals and others to avoid punishment for crime or escape the service of process. I think there ought to be no provision in this bill that deprives any portion of the country within these boundaries from the protection which the laws and the courts give to the people of the Territory. If this is allowed to stand, then there may be a portion of the Territory on the southern boundary to which the jurisdiction of the courts does not extend, because there is a tribe of Indians that do not make any treaty with the United States, and there may be another portion of the Territory on the northern boundary in the same condition; and so the Territory will be parceled up, and it will be impossible to tell where the jurisdiction of the courts does or does not extend. I think this provision ought to be stricken out on that ground.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. POMEROY.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to strike out the seventeenth section.

The section was read as follows:

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a surveyor general for the said Territory, who shall locate his office at such place as the Secretary of the Interior shall from time to time direct, and whose duties, powers, obligations, responsibilities, compensation, and allowances for clerk hire, office rent, fuel, and incidental expenses shall be the same as those of the Territory of Dakota, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and such instructions as he from time to time may deem it advisable to give him.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I intend to follow this motion, should it be sustained, by a similar motion to strike out the eighteenth and nineteenth sections, which propose to establish land districts in this Territory. It is not usual in bills organizing territorial governments which are intended to be political in their character—I do not mean in any party sense, but intended merely to establish governments—to provide for the disposal of the public lands. A bill establishing a surveyor general's office, and also establishing local land offices, should be separate, and should be considered by the Committee on Public Lands. It is a subject that does not properly belong to this bill, and is not properly to be considered by the Committee on Territories. I am not prepared to say that there should be an additional surveyor general's office. The probabilities are that for some years to come the surveying operations in this new Territory ought to be very limited; but a very small sum should be appropriated for surveys in this Territory; and they should be expended, of course, in those localities where the settlements are being most rapidly formed. There is no inconvenience in carrying on these surveys through the office already established in the Territory of Dakota.

It is not an unusual, but a very common thing, that the same surveyor general's office shall extend to more than one Territory, and it may very well perhaps be the case here. The establishment of a surveyor general's office involves a good deal of expense, and should not be made except upon a clear case of necessity. I suggest to the Senators having this bill in charge, that these sections be omitted, and that, according to the custom, we provide for the disposal of the public lands in other bills.

Mr. YATES. I have no particular objection to the amendment, and I presume the committee have none. The Senator is mistaken, however, in supposing that this provision is unprecedented. It is copied, I think, from the bill for the organization of the Territory of Dakota, but there is no particular reason perhaps why it should be here.

Mr. POMEROY. I agree with the Senator from Indiana that the seventeenth and nineteenth sections should be stricken out. The eighteenth section, however, I think involves no expense. It provides that the Territory shall be formed into a land district at such time as the President may direct, and that a land office shall be located at such point as the President may direct, and shall be removed from time to time under his direction. Every Territory should have one land district, but I would not provide in this case for the appointment of a register and receiver until after the surveys have been made, and there can be no surveys until after a surveyor general is appointed, so that perhaps all three sections may as well be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to strike out the seventeenth section of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I make the same motion in regard to the eighteenth and nineteenth sections, to strike them out.

The motion was agreed to.

The sections stricken out are as follows:

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That the Territory of Wyoming shall be formed into a land district at such time as the President may direct, the land office for which shall be located at such point as the President may direct, and shall be removed from time to time to other points within said district whenever, in his opinion, it may be expedient.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, a register and receiver for said district, who shall respectively be required to reside at the site of said office, and who shall have the same powers, perform the same duties, and receive the same compensation as are or may be prescribed by law in relation to other land offices of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. I desire now to move an amendment which I think will occasion no debate. I have submitted it to the chairman of the Committee on Territories, and he has no objection to it. I move this amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after the time when the executive and judicial officers herein provided for shall have been duly appointed and qualified: Provided, That all territorial laws in force in any portion of said Territory of Wyoming at the time this act shall take effect shall continue in force until repealed by the legislative authority of said Territory.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that will not be done, or at least that some modification of the amendment will be made. The Territory of Dakota has undertaken to pass a mining code which is as unlike anything that is useful for that purpose as any code that could be well conceived of. It is in conflict with the law of Congress. It is cumbersome and inconvenient. The people in this Territory have held several meetings on the subject, and passed resolutions which have been sent to me asking that Congress shall interfere and abrogate these laws altogether. They are very bad laws.

Mr. HOWE. Very well, Mr. President, as soon as they have a Legislature they can repeal those laws. If you do not adopt this provision they will not have any laws.

Mr. STEWART. They are not in need of any of these laws.

Mr. HOWE. But they ought to have some laws.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will put in his amendment a proviso abrogating those mining laws, I shall consent to it; but certainly I would not fasten on that people that system of mining laws. Under this provision, without some modification, you will fasten those laws upon them for nearly a year. They have disregarded them as being in conflict with the law of the United States, and a letter has been addressed to me inquiring whether these laws were operative, inasmuch as they inaugurated a different system from that established by the law of the United States. I advised that the congressional code should be followed. This provision, however, as it stands, might legalize the Dakota code, and lead to great difficulty.

Mr. HOWE. Not at all. It only continues such laws as are in force at this time. If you do not do that, you leave these people without any laws from the time the act takes effect. We cannot go through the existing codes and separate what are good laws from what are bad.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that a portion of the present Territory of Utah falls within the limits of this new Territory. He knows very well that there are very great peculiarities in the code of Utah, and I do not for one feel like confirming or affirming in any way any portion of the code of that famous Territory. Of course I do not refer to polygamy, which is already rendered unlawful by law, although I believe it is yet practiced in the Territory of Utah, the law being entirely impotent to check that vice. But does the Senator from Wisconsin intend that the Territory of Wyoming shall thus embrace within its limits a variety of laws, laws which may be inconsistent with each other in many respects? The largest portion of the Territory is carved out of the old Territory of Dakota, and it embraces part of the Dakota code and part of the code of Utah. I inquire of the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. NYE,] whether a portion of the Territory of Utah does not fall within the limits of the new Territory of Wyoming, and a very considerable portion of it.

Mr. NYE. To relieve the honorable Senator of any particular apprehension on that subject, I beg to inform him that that portion of the Territory of Utah, as far as can be ascertained by the committee, does not contain over four or five beings—I believe one single family. I see great propriety in the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin. You must have some laws for the time being. When the Territory of Nevada was formed, there was no such provision made, and I found no other way in the exercise of the little power conferred upon me, than to use such of the laws of Utah as were in existence up to the time our Legislature met and made laws of their own. I think there is great wisdom in this proposition.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator from Wisconsin will so frame his amendment that these laws shall remain in existence until a certain period when the Legislature of the new Territory shall have organized for business, that will do; but he goes further than that, and says that they shall be laws until repealed. It is easier to pass a law than to repeal one. In other words, it is easier to keep a law in existence, even if it be an offensive one, than it is to enact a bad law. If the Senator will modify his amendment to that extent I think it will be unobjectionable.

Mr. STEWART. I would suggest a modification that will remedy my difficulty, and that is to add at the end of the amendment these words: "except such laws as relate to the possession and occupation of mines or mining claims." The laws of Dakota in regard to mining are bad, and do not suit a single person in this district. The people there have gone on under the national laws in regard to mining claims, and the only trouble they have now is the fear that they may be dragged off several hundred miles to comply with some arbitrary rules of recording or filing, which are very inconvenient to them. These laws undertake to regulate the size of claims and a great many other subjects which interfere with the legitimate business of the people, and the quicker they are abrogated and the miners in this Territory are left to the general laws of Congress, as other miners are, the better it will be.

Mr. WILSON. What laws does the Senator refer to?

Mr. STEWART. The mining laws of Dakota passed a thousand miles from the mining region, and which are not acceptable to the miners.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say, in addition to what the Senator from Nevada has stated, that many of the territorial Legislatures have passed very offensive and objectionable laws on this subject. Persons easily get into territorial Legislatures who are largely interested in passing such laws as give them a local legal possession of valuable mines; and it is certainly necessary to do what we can do to make the general laws which Congress has passed on the subject, which are just and equal to all, obtain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWE. Of course, I cannot have the slightest objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada; that is to say, I cannot have the slightest objection to excepting from the operation of this provision any law in the codes of any of the Territories any portion of which is to be embraced in the Territory of Wyoming, which this body undertakes to know is an improper law; and Senators in whose opinions I have entire confidence say they do know that the Dakota laws on the subject of mining are improper. I have no opinion about that, because I do not know anything about the laws. If the Senate are content with that statement, I certainly am.

I want Senators to understand distinctly what the purpose of my amendment was. It was simply to guard against leaving the people of Wyoming without a code after this act shall take effect. To do that we have to continue in existence the laws which are in existence there now or provide a new code, or take this course and take the existing code with such exceptions as can be named on the spur of the moment. That is pretty risky; but there is probably no sort of reason in excepting this, from what Senators about me say. I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NYE. I wish to ask my colleague if he thinks that the word "possession" is exactly the right word in this amendment? I suppose if the Territory of Dakota has passed mining laws, and possession of mines has been obtained under them, my colleague does not intend by this exception to destroy the title or color of title that the occupant or possessor may have acquired by law.

Mr. CONNESS. Allow me to answer the question. The answer to it, I will say, is this: in 1866 Congress passed a law confirming to the then existing possessors their respective mining claims according to the local laws and usages of each mining locality; so that they would hold under that law of 1866.

Mr. NYE. That law of 1866, the Senator from California will remember, was based upon the local laws, not of States, not of Territories, but of the local mining districts. Whether they have these local laws in this Territory I am not aware. I should not like to see a man having possession of a good mine under the law thrown out of it.

Mr. CONNESS. This will not disturb anybody.

Mr. NYE. Then I am satisfied.

Mr. STEWART. I will say to my colleague that I am very confident that this amendment will not disturb any one in possession. So far as my experience has gone, every Territory which has attempted to legislate on this subject has got into great confusion. Our own State passed a mining law which was on the statute-book but one year. It was found very necessary to repeal it, and by common consent undo everything that had been done under it during the year. These parties are all protected in their possession under the general law of Congress, and we had better have but one system. I have been in correspondence with a large number of persons in this region who state the inconveniences to which this code of Dakota would subject them. They do not want the Dakota laws sanctioned by Congress, and they have made a special request that in the organizing of this new Territory we should not give those laws congressional sanction. They have not given them any local sanction yet, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask now for the reading of the amendment as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, as amended, will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after the time when the executive and judicial officers herein provided for shall have been duly appointed and qualified: Provided, That all territorial laws in force in any portion of the said Territory of Wyoming at the time this act shall take effect, shall continue in force until repealed by the legislative authority of said Territory, except such laws as relate to the possession or occupation of mines or mining claims.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend the amendment by inserting before the word "laws" the word "general," and after the word "laws" the words "of the Territory of Dakota," for this reason: the Territory of Dakota has a very respectable code of laws at present, and I believe they are very acceptably administered. Probably nine tenths of the new Territory is carved out of the Territory of Dakota; and the people have been accustomed to and well acquainted with the laws of the Territory of Dakota, while the remainder of the new Territory is within the present Territory of Utah, which is governed by a distinct and separate code of laws, many of which are very peculiar in their nature and very objectionable. I would therefore adapt the territorial code of Dakota to the government of the new Territory of Wyoming, so that there shall be really but one code of laws in the Territory. Otherwise there will be a conflict between the Utah laws and the Dakota laws, which is to be avoided, if possible. I hope that the amendment will be accepted. I also move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "force" the words "throughout the Territory of Wyoming."

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. YATES. In the third line of section sixteen the word "applicable" should be "inapplicable."

Mr. POMEROY. I noticed that; it is a clerical error. The section should read "not locally inapplicable."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, there being no objection.

Mr. POMEROY. There is a slight amendment necessary in the second section to make the bill harmonious with the amendment adopted to the sixth section. The clause beginning in line ten should read: "The Governor shall approve all laws passed by the Legislative Assembly before they take effect, unless the same shall be passed by a two-thirds vote, as provided in section six of this act." My amendment is after "effect" to insert "unless the same shall be passed by a two-thirds vote, as provided in section six of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Illinois will notice that the fourth section of the bill, in the twelfth line, provides: "An apportionment shall be made as nearly equal as practicable." It should be "An apportionment shall be made by the Governor," &c. This first election is held under an apportionment made by the Governor. All subsequent elections are to be held under the law of the Territory. I suppose it would be understood that the Governor should make the apportionment; but it is usual, that there may be no doubt about it, to put it into the bill. So I will move to insert after the word "made" the words "by the Governor."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. In the eleventh section I notice that the Governor and secretary may be sworn in before a justice of the peace. I know that has been in other bills, and I will not move to amend it; but still if I were writing this bill I would not have a justice of the peace in a Territory authorized to swear in the Governor or secretary. But I will not move any amendment.

Mr. NYE. If the honorable Senator should go into a Territory where there was no other officer within eighty or a hundred miles he would be glad to swear before anybody. [Laughter.]

Mr. POMEROY. But the Governor goes to the capital, and a judge of one of the district courts ought to be there.

Mr. NYE. He cannot swear himself.

Mr. POMEROY. One of the judges of the district court is always at the capital, or should be. I see that this bill provides that the chief justice and associate justices shall have a salary of $1,800 a year. I submit whether you can expect to have any justice administered by a man who will serve in this Territory for $1,800 a year. Certainly a salary of $1,800 is inadequate for a judge in this Territory. In the eleventh section it is provided that the Governor shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum, and $1,000 as superintendent of Indian affairs. I do not object to that, but then it goes on to provide that the chief justice and associate justices shall each have a salary of $1,800. I submit that if you select a man from the Territory capable of being chief justice, and give him only $1,800 a year, you offer him no inducement. That is no inducement for a man to go there to fill the position; and if you take a man there, it is no inducement for him to devote himself exclusively to that office. I desire to have proper men to administer justice, and I should prefer to have them taken from the Territory, if suitable persons can be had there; but $1,800 will not command their services, and ought not to do so. If you are to have justice administered at all, it should be administered by competent men, and a decent salary should be provided for them.

Mr. NYE. I think that there was a mistake in fixing it at that. The intention was to fix it the same as the salaries of the judges in Dakota, that is $2,500 each, and I think that is as little as they should have. No person can live properly on $1,800 there. I move to strike out "eighteen" and insert "twenty-five;" that was the design.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the bill by striking out so much of section two as makes the Governor of the Territory superintendent of Indian affairs ex officio. I do not think that is a system which ought to be continued. My amendment is to strike out in the eighth and ninth lines of the second section the words, "shall perform the duties and receive the emoluments of superintendent of Indian affairs." I simply wish to say that it has been quite customary to unite the duties of Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs in the Territories. So far as I know anything about it, that has not been promotive of the good of the public service. I think the system ought to be abandoned and that the superintendent of Indian affairs ought to be directly responsible to the proper Department for the discharge of his duties, and ought not to come before that Department with the dignity of the office of Governor of a Territory. He ought to be held to a strict responsibility, much more strict than can be secured where the Governor discharges the duties. By him they are discharged as subordinate duties, and not as his principal duties.

Mr. YATES. I will state simply that this is the usual provision made in territorial bills. These duties have to be performed by somebody. The Governor is there, well acquainted with Indian affairs in the Territory, and if he does not perform these duties, a separate agent will have to perform them and be sent there for that purpose. Moreover the salary of the Governor is only $2,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. We can change that.

Mr. YATES. I see no good reason why the Governor may not perform these duties more satisfactorily than an agent appointed here at Washington.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The simple reason is that the Governor is appointed under the Department of State and is responsible to and reports to the Department of State; the superintendent of Indian affairs reports to the Secretary of the Interior, and it has been found practically that the Governor of a Territory who reports to the Secretary of State, and holds, so to speak, his office under him, does not properly report to the Secretary of the Interior, and that Department finds it sometimes next to impossible to get any report at all from some of these Governors who are superintendents of Indian affairs. That is the practical working of it.

Mr. RAMSEY. The practice in all the earlier territorial organizations was to confer this additional duty upon the Governor, whose civil duties are very light. He has scarcely anything to do. He enters upon his duties as Governor of the Territory, and the Legislature is not convened until months after. In the meantime he has nothing to do but to wait for the territorial Legislature. When they meet the session is a short one, and when he has signed the bills and the Legislature have adjourned there is nothing further for him to do for some time. Hence we have wisely imposed on him the additional duties of superintendent of Indian affairs, which he can very well perform. There is no difficulty in his reporting to the Secretary of the Interior. There has not been usually much difficulty in that respect. The Governors of the Territories have attended to their duties as superintendents of Indian affairs as well as to their civil duties. The civil duties of the Governor of a Territory are very light, and almost his whole time is taken up in attending to Indian affairs in the western Territories.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will add but a word, sir. The Governor of a Territory, as is known to Senators, is appointed almost altogether from political considerations. The office itself is political in its character, and there can be no objection to the appointment of a man because of political considerations, as we now understand these matters. He goes to the Territory expecting that appointment of Governor of the Territory to be a stepping-stone either to the House of Representatives or to the Senate. He administers his office with a view to that. I speak of it practically as it is, and as it is known to Senators. I say that the administration of Indian affairs ought not to come under such an influence. I think I know of some instances in which the Indians have been sacrificed in bloody cruelty to gratify what was supposed to be a popular demand. I want to see the Indians placed under a man who is responsible for nothing except the care that is to be taken of them. I want somebody appointed who stands between the Indians and the white people. The Governor depends for his future political promotion upon the white people. He is a candidate for Congress from the day he goes there, is a candidate for the Senate from the day he goes there, and the Indian becomes the sacrifice of his ambition. I do not want to see it continued, sir. I want to see some man have charge of the Indians who has nothing to look after except the interests of the Indians and the conflicts between the two races. I think this amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, the superintendent of Indian affairs is but a supervising officer. The immediate charge of the Indians is with the agents scattered over the Territory. Almost every superintendent, whether he is a Governor or otherwise, has two, three, four, or half a dozen agents under his care. He supervises what they do; but the immediate charge of the Indians is with the agents, not with the superintendent.

Again, why would not a superintendent of Indian affairs, if he was such alone and not also Governor, be actuated by the same motives of ambition as a Governor?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That does not seem to have been the fact practically.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, I shall support this amendment. I have had some little experience in watching the workings of Indian affairs where the Governor has been the superintendent. I believe the duties of the two positions are incompatible. I think that where a man is superintendent of Indian affairs, he ought to devote his whole time to that business, and he ought to be a suitable man for that special task. A man may be a suitable man for Governor of a Territory, and yet entirely unsuitable to be superintendent of Indian affairs. I would vote to-day to separate these offices in all the Territories we have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HENDRICKS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. STEWART. I shall vote for this amendment, and I will state in a few words the reason why. I do not approve of the Indian system at all, and I hope that, as the Senator from Indiana has suggested, we shall have the Indians put in charge of men not looking for political places and disconnected with politics. I want the Indians removed from politics if possible, and I hope the Senator will cooperate with me at some future day in turning them over to the War Department. I do not want a large army in the Indian country, because if the army is there for any purpose it is to fight the Indians, and in that service they never accomplish anything but they cost a great deal of money. There is no necessity for an army in the Indian country in my estimation; but if you have a few Army officers who are honest and just men they will manage the Indian service economically and justly, and if they want any fighting done with the Indians they can call out volunteers for twenty, thirty, or sixty days as may be required, and whip the Indians at once, and save you the expense of keeping up a large army there that accomplishes no good. These same army officers can stand between the whites and the Indians, and see that justice is done to both. If we can have a system of that kind, and have men not connected with politics or with making money out of these transactions, in charge of the Indians, I think there will be no difficulty in managing the Indians.

I will not now go into that question at length, but I do not wish to see the Governor of the Territory mixed up with Indian affairs, and I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, because I want to remove the Indians, as far as I can, from politics; but I do not think you have made the requisite change when you have simply separated the Indian superintendency from the office of Governor of the Territory. I think you will have to go still further if you are to have a disinterested and fair administration of the system. I think the present system is a failure, costing from fifteen to thirty millions a year, and the results achieved could, under a proper system, be certainly accomplished with a great deal better satisfaction both to the Indians and to the whites for one tenth of the amount. Other countries get along with their Indians.

Great Britain right on our North has a system simple and effective. She employs no large army to look after the Indians, no horde of Indian agents to manage them, but controls at a very small expenditure, savage Indians who are a great deal worse than those we have. When the Kern river mines were discovered in British territory there was a very large emigration from our country; thousands of Californians went up there; and when those who had been accustomed to our Indian system went there and compared it with theirs and came back, they told our people that the British knew how to manage Indians and we did not. They said it was done by a few military men who enforced the laws of justice both against the Indians and against the whites. You do not want a large army in the Indian country to be supplied at great expense. It is entirely useless for any practical purpose. If you have any fighting to do with Indians you can get an army of volunteers in ten days or one day almost, sufficient for your purpose, and you can discharge them as soon as you are done with them, and they will do your fighting while you want fighting done; but you want the very best army officers, the most discreet men you have, to take charge of Indian affairs and see that justice is done between the Indians and the whites.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, in answer to the position taken by my colleague, I would suggest one or two views that have not been expressed by other Senators, in favor of the proposition to confer the management of Indian Affairs in the Territory on the Governor of the Territory. He is more directly interested in the country, and in the peace of the Territory, than any traveling or foreign Indian superintendent or agent can be. So far as my knowledge of the management of Indian affairs goes, persons procure appointments as superintendents and Indian agents for the purpose of making fortunes out of them, and I believe generally succeed. The Governor of the Territory, whether he be appointed on account of politics or not, ought to be a man of some character, and if, as my colleague suggests, he expects to rise to political power from that Territory, he is interested in the preservation of its peace above all other considerations, that emigration may go there, and that the country may grow up and prosper. He has also some character, which a great many Indian agents and superintendents have not, or which they care nothing about, as they simply expect to make money out of it. It seems to me that there are reasons why there would be an advantage in conferring this power upon the Governor of the Territory. He is interested in the country, in its growth, and this can only be promoted by the peace of the Territory, and the proper and wholesome management of the Indians.

Mr. President, the present system of Indian management I regard as a bloody failure and a costly failure. I believe that it would be better to turn the whole concern over to the Army than to maintain the present system; but I believe I could name among my acquaintances in the Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, ten men who could more successfully manage the Indians, if the power was given to them than the Army. They are the only body of men that ever did manage the Indians without bloodshed and without difficulty and effort. I believe that now a commission could be selected from that Society that could convert war into peace, men who would do justly by the Indians and by the Government. But that, perhaps, cannot be accomplished. It seems to me—and the experience of some of our States, I think, corroborates it—that there are sound reasons for putting the management of Indian affairs into the hands of men living in the Territory who have an interest in its peace and in its growth and prosperity, and who are not professional Indian managers and do not go there simply for the purpose of making fortunes out of the Indians.

Mr. COLE. I do not feel like letting the remarks of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] go forth without some dissent. I do not believe that either economy or humanity requires that the Indians should be turned over to the military department; on the contrary, I believe that it would be by far the most expensive disposition that could be made of these wards of the nation. The Indians in Arizona are costing us per year, under Army management, much more than the whole Indian service is costing us; and they are doing but little, nothing, so far as I know, in the way of improving the condition of those Indians. We have, moreover, a slight example of the management of Indians by the War Department in the Bosque Redondo case. We have another example of it in the Chivington massacre. I am very much opposed, so far as at present advised, to turning over the Indian service to the War Department. That question, however, is not before the Senate on this bill; but I make the remark because of what has been said by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. TIPTON. I suggest that if the motion to strike out does not prevail we ought to insert immediately following the clause which it is proposed to strike out the words "and in said capacity shall report to the Secretary of the Interior." By making this amendment you make him responsible to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RAMSEY. He reports to the Secretary of the Interior, as a matter of course.

Mr. NYE. Having had a little experience in this matter, I shall be exceedingly glad to agree with the honorable Senator from Indiana. However honestly a Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs may discharge his duty there are always plenty to cry out that he is a thief and dishonest. Mr. President, dishonesty in the Indian department is not with its agents and superintendents; they have no chance to steal unless they are the recipients of large amounts of money with which to fulfill treaty stipulations. I suppose that the object of making the territorial Governor ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs is twofold: first, the Governor is necessarily the head of the Territory. His house becomes a hospital, a hotel, and everything else; and every complaint, from that of a sick Indian to that of the wearied, worn, and exhausted traveler, is presented to the Governor for relief. He being regarded as the head of the Territory, it is important that he should have some power to control the only dangerous element in these Territories, the Indians. A superintendent of Indian affairs is subject to the same weaknesses, both politically and morally, that a Governor is. You send a Governor out upon a salary of $2,000 year. While I had the honor to hold that office in the Territory of Nevada, the money which I was paid brought me in the currency which the people would accept in that country thirty-eight cents on the dollar, or $380 per $1,000. Three times that amount, receiving $1,000 additional for superintending Indian affairs, was all I received. The honorable Senator can count it for himself. No Governor can live upon a salary of that kind.

This combination of duties is based upon the economy of the thing. The Governor can discharge the duties of superintendent, and thereby save money. A Governor in a new Territory can live just as cheap as a superintendent of Indian affairs, if he chooses; and to have two officers for this business makes too many heads. If trouble arises the superintendent of Indian affairs is in one portion of the Territory, six hundred or seven hundred or eight hundred miles from the Governor, with no means to confer with him, and the Governor is powerless to act. The Indians are upon the war-path, and the superintendent of Indian affairs is as far from the Indians as the Governor is from the superintendent. In this condition of things what are you going to do? If there is to be a separate officer superintending Indian affairs, there should be some one head to control all. Divide it, and the security against Indian depredations is gone. This combination of duties saves two or three thousand dollars a year in the expenses of the Territory; it gives unity of action and secures all the efficiency that two separate officers would have, and I think much more.

Mr. RAMSEY. Senators know very well that the whole West has grown up under the system contemplated in this bill. General Cass was Governor of Michigan Territory and ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs. General St. Clair was Governor of Ohio and ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs. General Harrison was Governor of Indiana and ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs. Through the agency of these Governors the great bulk of the Indian titles to the land in the western States were extinguished. General Cass was almost constantly employed in his capacity of superintendent of Indian affairs. When a great number of Indians are concentrated in any one Territory having special relations to the Indian Department, being located on reservations, they may then require the special services of a superintendent; but otherwise not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I would not add another word except that I feel that it is perhaps proper to do so to exclude a conclusion. I hope the distinguished Senators from Minnesota and Nevada will not think that any remark I made had any allusion to their former connection with these two offices, or that it was at all in my mind that the Senator from Nevada as Governor of the Territory and as superintendent of Indian affairs received his pay in depreciated currency so that it was not sufficient unless there was connection with the Governor's office also the office of superintendent of Indian affairs.

Mr. NYE. That only made about three hundred dollars a year difference.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Only $300 out of the $1,000. I dare say it was all satisfactory in Nevada; I have heard of no troubles between the Indians and the white people there, but I have heard of trouble elsewhere, where these offices were connected.

The Senator from California, [Mr. COLE,] in his answer to the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] a few moments ago, did injustice to the regular Army in connecting the Chivington massacre, that most horrible, bloody, foul spot upon our history, at all with officers of the regular Army. I do not understand that massacre to have been brought about or countenanced by the officers of the regular Army; it seems to have been under local control; but I do not choose to discuss it to-day. It has been discussed in the Senate heretofore, and I believe that Senators generally understand the merits of that question.

I simply wish now, after excluding all possible conclusion that I refer to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] or to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. RAMSEY] in any remarks that I make, to repeat what I believe on this question, that these two offices ought to be separated. The Indians ought not to be under the control of the Governor of the Territory, because, in the first place, his office does not properly connect him with that service; and, in the second place, the temptations of political preferment and hopes of ambition disqualify him, in my judgment, for the delicate duty of deciding the many questions that arise between the settler and the Indian; and I will add, as is suggested to me, that the Governor of one Territory, Montana, I now understand asks to be relieved from this duty—the care of the Indians—on the ground that it is inconsistent to some extent with his other official duties.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I am not prepared for quite so radical a change in our Indian affairs as is suggested by the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Indiana. The practice of uniting in one and the same person the governorship of a Territory and the superintendency of Indian affairs is a very ancient one, commencing with the commencement of our national existence. The Governor of the Northwestern Territory in ancient days was also superintendent of Indian affairs for that immense Territory which has already become an empire. The Governor of the Territory of Indiana, when it was a Territory, was also superintendent of Indian affairs. The same is true of Michigan, of Wisconsin, and indeed of all the new Territories that have been carved out since the beginning of the Government; and I believe that our Indian affairs on the whole were well administered when taken care of by the Governors of those ancient Territories. I know that for sixteen years while General Cass was Governor of the Territory of Michigan he conducted the Indian affairs of that Territory with a great deal of skill, and I believe to the entire satisfaction of the Government and the country.

I am not prepared now to change this ancient system. I think there is danger in introducing such an innovation. The Governor of a Territory is looked up to by all persons within its limits as the principal man, and he is especially so regarded by the Indians. As has been very properly remarked by the Senator from Nevada, he is at once the keeper of a hotel and the keeper of a hospital. He is the principal man to whom the traveler applies and to whom the pioneer applies, and of all men in the Territory he is most likely to exert a good salutary influence over the Indian tribes. It is also, on the score of economy, a saving to vest the authority of superintendent of Indian affairs in the Governor. It tends to diminish offices and office-seekers. It tends to simplify the Indian system of the Territories; and for one I must vote against this amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. YATES. I simply desire to say that under the bill as it stands the Governor is superintendent of Indian affairs, and if you adopt this system of sending an agent there it will produce antagonism. The Governor being more acquainted with the people, and being looked up to by the people, should be at the head, and this antagonism should be prevented. I hope the question will be taken and that the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conness, Corbett, Doolittle, Hendricks, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of Tennessee, Van Winkle, and Vickers—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Chandler, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Johnson, Norton, Ross, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, and Willey—19.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the phraseology of the fourteenth section, the section reserving the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections for school purposes. I desire to insert the word "public" before "schools," because it has been held in some of the Territories that these lands might ultimately be used for seminaries and private schools, and I think that is a perversion of the intention of Congress. I therefore move to insert the word "public" before "schools."

Mr. YATES. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to offer another amendment in the same section. As it now stands the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections cannot be reserved until after the survey, and that will take a long time, and in the meanwhile every sixteenth and thirty-sixth section that is valuable will be held by a squatter against the interest of the public schools; but if the section can be amended, as I suggest, the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections will be reserved from the date of the act and can be held only for the purposes herein reserved, that is, for public schools. I move to strike out after the word "that," in the first line, the words "when the lands in said Territory shall be surveyed, under the direction of the Government of the United States, preparatory to bringing the same into market;" so that the section will read:

That sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in each township in said Territory shall be, and the same are hereby, reserved for the purpose of being applied to public schools in the State or States hereafter to be erected out of the same.

That reserves them now from the passage of the act; but the section as it stands only reserves them after survey, and that will be too late; the best of them will be gone then. I therefore move to strike out the words which I have indicated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How can you determine where the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections are unless the lands are surveyed?

Mr. POMEROY. You cannot determine it.

Mr. CONNESS. You cannot determine it in either case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know but that the amendment is right; but it seems to me that under it a person might go into this Territory and settle upon the land and make valuable improvements, as they do in all new countries, and when the land is surveyed, if the man is found to be upon the sixteenth or thirty-sixth section his land and his improvements are all taken from him; he is turned out of doors.

Mr. POMEROY. If he is on the sixteenth or thirty-sixth section then he settles with the superintendent or trustees of the schools, whoever they may be, as appointed by the Legislature. The Government cannot drive him off. He must settle with the school interests of his State.

Mr. CONNESS. He holds it under them.

Mr. POMEROY. And he has the opportunity of buying it under such regulations as the State may prescribe after it becomes a State; but unless this amendment be made he can hold the sixteenth and thirty-sixth section against the interest of the schools and in defiance of the State.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I will suggest one other amendment. I am sorry to have noticed the bill so critically. In the second line of the fifth section I move to strike out the word "inhabitant," and insert the word "citizen." As it now reads every male inhabitant in the new Territory may vote. In our new Territories there is a class of inhabitants who are not citizens. I believe the ballot should be in the hands of citizens. The Chinese are inhabitants, and there may be persons of other nations there who are inhabitants. I do not believe it is the intention of Congress to allow inhabitants simply to vote; but citizens, the American citizens, whether native-born or naturalized. It makes no difference to me which they are, but they should be citizens to have the ballot. I therefore move to strike out the word "inhabitant" and insert the word "citizen."

Mr. YATES. There is no objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is provided for in the proviso, I will state to the Senator. It reads:

Provided, That the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States, &c.

Mr. POMEROY. Then all I have to say is, the first part of the section is in conflict with the proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, there is a difficulty about that amendment, as the Senator will see. The first part of the section provides that "every male inhabitant of the United States above the age of twenty-one years" shall vote. As now amended it declares that only citizens shall be allowed to vote or be eligible to hold office in the Territory. That is the law of Ohio; but in all the new Territories, those who have declared their intentions to become citizens, are allowed to vote and hold office, and the proviso limits it to persons who are either citizens or have declared their intention to become such. I have no objection in the organization of new Territories, a new country, to allow the people who go there and take an oath that they intend to become citizens, to participate in the local government.

Mr. POMEROY. I had an amendment which I intended to offer as soon as the previous one was adopted, so that the section should read something like this:

That every citizen of the United States above the age of twenty-one years, or person who shall have declared his intention to become a citizen, and who shall have been a resident of the said Territory at the time of the passage of this act, shall be entitled to vote.

After the words "citizen of the United States" the words "and those who have declared their intention to become such" should be inserted.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the proviso makes it so, and it reads better.

Mr. POMEROY. The proviso was in conflict with the other portion of the section, and I wish to make it in harmony.

Mr. NYE. The Senator will find that the word "inhabitant" is used in seven out of ten of these territorial forms. It is merely the vote preliminarily to the organization of the Territory.

Mr. CONNESS. But you are organizing now on the Pacific, where there are Chinese.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This Territory is not on the Pacific; it is on this side of the mountains.

Mr. POMEROY. To make the section complete, in harmony with the proviso, I move after the word "years" to insert "and persons who shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States." Then it will be exactly in harmony with the proviso. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to call the attention of the chairman to a misprint on the fifteenth page, in the first part of the sixteenth section. It reads:

That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally applicable shall have the same force and effect, &c.

Mr. YATES. That has been corrected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not aware of it. Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to call the attention of the committee to line forty-four, on page 10, which provides for an appeal from the supreme court of this Territory to the Supreme Court of the United States in all cases "where the value of the property, or the amount in controversy, to be ascertained by the oath or affirmation of either party, or other competent witness, shall exceed $1,000."

Mr. CONNESS. That is too much.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Too much! I think it is a lower sum than has heretofore been put in territorial bills.

Mr. CONNESS. That is what I mean.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think heretofore it was necessary that the amount should be $2,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the general law; but in some of these territorial laws I am sure it has been put at $1,000.

Mr. YATES. It is fixed at $1,000 in several of them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think appeals from the supreme court of the Territory to the Supreme Court of the United States ought to be encouraged. In my opinion, it enables persons who have money to defeat litigation by poorer persons.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1059) to relieve certain citizens of North Carolina of disabilities, reported it with an amendment.

EIGHT-HOUR LABOR SYSTEM.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to take up House bill No. 365.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is the territorial bill passed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is, and the Senator from Indiana moves to take up the bill mentioned by him, which will be read by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not ask us to take up any other bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the title of the bill be read, so that the Senate can understand what it is.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 365) constituting eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the United States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On this subject I wish to say just a word or two, not to occupy the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill for consideration.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir. During this session very many petitions have come from different parts of the country upon this subject. Those petitions have been referred, in part at least, to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That committee, up to this time, has been unable to report upon it. Some of the petitions have come from the State of Indiana and have been presented by myself. Out of respect to the sentiment thus coming to us I have felt it to be my duty to call this bill up as an important measure. It does not propose to regulate the number of hours which shall constitute a legal day's work except in the employment of the Government of the United States. That, sir, we clearly have the right to provide for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it is in order, on a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill, to enter into a debate on its merits. The new rules expressly declare, in order to save time, that that shall not be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules so prescribe, to be sure; but it is impossible for the Chair to say what arguments shall be made. Each Senator must judge for himself, remembering that the rule is intended to restrict debate upon taking up a bill, and confine him to such facts and circumstances as he supposes may be necessary to show that it should or should not be taken up.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will answer the Senator from Vermont by saying that I tried to be within the rule. I was endeavoring to suggest to the Senate the reasons why I thought this bill should be taken up and considered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, because you thought it was meritorious.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is a very strong reason, certainly, in favor of taking up a bill; and when the question shall come before the Senate whether this bill or some other bill shall be taken up, a comparison becomes almost necessary. But I do not care about discussing that at any length.

It is proper for me to say that petitions have come to us from almost every State of the Union on this subject, and they have not received the attention of the Senate up to this time. At an early period of the session, among the first acts passed by the House of Representatives, this act was passed; but it has laid on the table; it has not even been referred to a committee. Now, sir, in response and in respect to the sentiment of the country, so generally expressed upon this subject, I have felt it my duty to call the measure up and to ask the consideration of the bill itself.

I am asked if I intend to move its reference to a committee. It is proper for me to say that I do not intend to make that motion. The bill is very brief, but a few lines, confined in its operation to the employees of the Government of the United States, the laborers of the Government of the United States, and proposing to fix what shall be a day's work in the employment of the Government. That bill can be considered, in my judgment, without a reference to a committee. Petitions have gone to the committees, and of course have, to some extent, been considered by the committees; but this House bill has not been referred, and I think it need not be referred. Therefore I move to take the bill up with a view of putting it upon its passage.

Mr. CONNESS. I only wish to say, for the information of the Senator, that a corresponding bill to this, which passed the House at a previous session, was referred by this body to the Committee on Finance, only, however, by a majority of one vote. Within one of the number of the Senate present preferred to proceed with its consideration. When this bill came into the Senate I moved that it go upon the table, because I believed the subject was sufficiently understood, and I am very glad the honorable Senator has called it up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that bill will not be taken up now. I am anxious to get the attention of the Senate to House bill No. 1058, to admit North Carolina and other States to representation in Congress. I desired to bring it up at one o'clock to-day, but this territorial bill had precedence from yesterday. I hope that the Senate will now take up no other business until the readmission measure is disposed of.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us get a vote on this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You cannot get a vote on it. It will take as long as the territorial bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Oh, no.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senate will not take it up.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it is in order I desire to make a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to know whether the Senator desires to have that report considered at this time?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a matter of privilege.

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. According to the practice of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. Not in the midst of other business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know whether it is a privileged question or not. I ask to make this report, if there is no objection, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to considering the report of the committee of conference at this time?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That will not displace my motion, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not disturb the motion of the Senator. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I submit the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 658) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first, second, third, fourth, and sixth amendments to the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from so much of their fifth amendment as proposes to insert words in lieu of the words stricken out, and the House agree to said amendment as so modified.

L. M. MORRILL,

HENRY WILSON,

TIMOTHY O. HOWE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. G. BLAINE,

CHARLES E. PHELPS,

J. A. GARFIELD,

Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to hear it explained.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will explain it. The first amendment of the Senate was on page 2, line one, after the word "source," to insert "except appropriations made by act of March 2, 1867." That was non-concurred in by the House. The House now recede from that disagreement and concur in the amendment. The effect of it is to except from the operation of the bill certain funds appropriated by that act for these specific objects: "artificial limbs for soldiers, the Army Medical Museum, and medical works for the library."

The second amendment was in the same line, after the word "hereby" to insert "directed to," so that it will read "hereby directed to be covered into the Treasury." That is a mere verbal charge.

The third amendment was verbal merely. It was to insert in the same line after the word

"Treasury" the words "at the close of the current fiscal year," requiring that the funds shall be covered into the Treasury at the close of the present fiscal year.

The fourth amendment was on page 2, lines seven and eight, to strike out, "for expenses of the signal service of the Army, $5,000." That was struck out by the House and disagreed to by the House. The House now recede from their disagreement and concur in the amendment.

The fifth amendment was to strike out all of the second section and insert a substitute. The second section was a provision for covering into the Treasury certain unexpected balances, which the Senate struck out, and inserted in lieu of it what I will now read:

That from the sums appropriated for each of the several items contained in this act there be deducted the unexpended balance for such item which may remain in the Treasury on the 30th of June, 1868.

The House disagreed to that, but in the conference it was agreed that the Senate recede from its amendment to strike out the section to which I have referred. The Senate agrees to recede from its amendment, the effect of which is to leave the bill without either the provision made in the House or in the Senate. That leaves the appropriation without any especial regulation by this act. The committee found it quite impossible to agree otherwise; and then there were some difficulties about putting such a provision upon this act. There are some unexpended balances which by either provision would be covered into the Treasury to the detriment of the service. I could specify, if it were necessary, particulars. Besides, it was found that the Committee on Appropriations in the House have reported a bill with special reference to remedying the difficulties supposed to have been covered by these provisions; and on the whole the conference committee agreed to this report.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no doubt that the report of this committee is right, and I shall vote for it. I want it distinctly understood, however, that any explanation made by the chairman does not bind the Senate. I have no objection to the report, but I simply wish to put in this disclaimer, that I am not bound by any explanations the chairman of the committee of conference may make. It was held in a certain case that because the chairman of a conference committee explained a thing that committed us to that view. I dissent from any assertion of that character.

The report was concurred in.

EIGHT-HOUR LABOR SYSTEM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] to take up the bill (H. R. No. 365) constituting eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States.

The question being put, it was declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. HENDRICKS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to say that the reason I object to taking up that bill at this time is because I wish to consider—and I think the Senate has manifested that intention heretofore—the bills to admit the rebel States to representation in Congress. They are pressing upon us, and they come here with constitutions framed in accordance with our laws, and it is due to them that we should take action at an early day. However meritorious the bill may be which the Senator from Indiana moves to take up, this is not the proper time to consider it when there is a matter pressing upon us of this character.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It is now a quarter past four o'clock, and it is very evident that no progress can be made to-day, or very little, in the consideration of the bill to which the Senator from Illinois refers. I think, therefore, he is unreasonable in asking us to devote the remaining fragment of this day's session to the bill which he has mentioned. On the other hand, this other question, I suppose, can be acted upon and possibly determined before we adjourn. At all events, there is this consideration to be taken into account: the bill for the reorganization, or rather the readmission, of the southern States is one of that character that it will command attention and will command the action of the Senate; there is no probability, no possibility even, that we shall adjourn this session without acting upon that question; whereas, on the other hand, this other bill seems to have but few advocates interested in its fortunes, and if we let it go by now, when the question is distinctly raised on considering it, it is not likely that we shall hear of it again this session. Inasmuch, then, as the bill of the Senator from Illinois will come up at all events, come up very soon, and command the attention and action of the Senate, there is no reason why the bill to which the motion of the Senator from Indiana refers should be pushed aside for the remainder of this afternoon's session. I shall vote, therefore, with my friend, the Senator from Indiana, to take up his bill.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Pennsylvania, I think, is rather mistaken as to the number of friends this bill, in behalf of the laborer to which he alludes, has.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I beg leave to explain. I desire to correct my expression. I do not mean to deny the friendliness of the gentleman. Perhaps I should have said "active friends;" that is, friends that act.

Mr. STEWART. I accept the Senator's apology. I am glad to see that he is becoming active in that behalf, and I hope he will be hereafter. He seems to be a new convert to speedy action on that bill just at this peculiar time when it was understood—I had the understanding at least—that the bills for the reorganization of the southern States were to be pressed until we got through with them. It is important to have action upon them speedily. There is plenty of time to pass the other bill, and I shall be a friend of it whenever it is in proper time; but at this time I think we had better go on with the business that is pressing upon the country in a peculiar manner. These States are ready for admission; the committee have reported, after careful examination, in favor of their admission; and we should act on no other business until we have the Union restored, so far as it is in the power of Congress to do it.

Mr. CONNESS. I think the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania placed himself in a very queer position when he said that my friend from Nevada was a friend of the bill referred to, and at the same time suggested that he was not an active friend. The whole Senate knew that when a friend at all, he is an active friend, for he is always active.

Now, Mr. President, I do not think the honorable Senator did us justice in this matter. I know that prior to an election it might be thought that the Senator from Pennsylvania had some object in calling up this bill, or at least in advocating its immediate consideration; but not being disposed to accuse my friend of anything sinister, the evidence of which I have never yet seen in any case, whatever the fact may be, I will not make the accusation in that way.

It certainly cannot be said of me that I am not an active and earnest friend of this bill. When it came to us from the House of Representatives, I moved that it be laid on the table, so that it should not be buried in a committee; and but for the impeachment trial and the incidents connected with it, I should have called it up long ago.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to know why it has been called up by the honorable Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CONNESS. I will answer that question. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to the same exemption at my hands that the Senator from Pennsylvania is, and under the same rule I will say that I cannot attribute anything sinister to my friend, although he is now a candidate for public station, and very high public station, nominated I believe for Governor of the great State that he so ably represents here.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is satisfactory.

Mr. CONNESS. Oh, but I am not satisfied yet; and the prospective candidate of the party to which he belongs for President of the United States. Mr. President, I will not say, for I do not think it would be doing my friend justice, that his candidacy or position leads him in any respect to call this bill up to-day, or that he ever contemplated depriving myself, who am a candidate for nothing, of the credit of calling the attention of the Senate to this bill; but I am glad that he has called the attention of the Senate to it. Nevertheless, I think he will agree with me now perhaps, as he feels an equal interest with myself in the bill, not to oppose it at the present moment to the consideration of the reconstruction acts, because it will unquestionably do this measure great injury if we shall pit it against, and oppose it to, acts which are to provide for the admission of those States into the Union which have been kept from representation so long. Therefore, with all my favor to this bill, I shall now, of course, decline further to oppose it to the reconstruction bill; and in its behalf I appeal to my friend from Indiana and the Senator from Pennsylvania, as we love this bill and desire it to become a law, that we, its friends, not enemies, let it go for the present and call it up at an early day.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am sorry to see these two measures antagonized against each other. There are tens of thousands of poor laboring men without employment, who have been dismissed from employment for voting according to their convictions. There are committees here from several States begging money; and I am writing to my friends to contribute money to keep men from starvation. Humanity, and everything that can appeal to the human heart, and the feelings of every man who respects the laboring men of the country, should impel us to pass these reconstruction measures, and let those people have governments that will protect them at the earliest moment.

As to this other measure, as a practical fact at this time, there is nothing to be specially gained by it. We have but a few hundred men in the Government employment. I have been for years ready to try the eight-hour experiment whenever I could; and I shall vote for the measure whenever it comes up; but I shall not vote for it with the expectation that anything is to come from it. No man or set of men in this country will ever make a vote by voting in that direction. This labor question is a matter in which I have had some experience during the last thirty years.

I therefore hope we shall take up the bill admitting these States, and try to settle the difficulties that are pressing upon us, and are pressing upon us with tenfold force and a thousand times more bitterness since an event that happened here the other day. I hope we shall take it up, and then that we shall take up this other measure at some time when we can consider it. I will give my vote to try that experiment at any time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is now half past four o'clock, and we have passed several bills to-day. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 3, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, upon the recommendation of General Grant, a communication from Major General Sheridan, commanding the department of the Missouri, relative to Government aid to the Union Pacific railroad, (eastern division;) which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

ELECTIONS IN NORTH AND SOUTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the General of the Army, in further answer to House resolution of the 13th ultimo, transmitting an abstract from General Canby, commanding second military district, relative to the recent elections in the States of North Carolina and South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

WEST VIRGINIA INDEPENDENT EXEMPTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of the Adjutant General respecting the claim of company O, independent exempts, West Virginia volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MRS. LOUISA FITCH.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Mrs. Louisa Fitch, widow of the late Captain E. P. Fitch, praying that her name may be placed on the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ELECTION CONTEST—CHAVES VS. CLEVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House additional evidence in the election contest of Chaves vs. Clever, New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

ELECTION IN OREGON.

Mr. BURR. I desire to congratulate the House and the country on the first gun from the Pacific, announcing that on last Monday the Democracy achieved a glorious victory in the State of Oregon.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I call for the regular order of business.

ELECTION CONTEST—DELANO VS. MORGAN.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order this morning is the further consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election of Delano vs. Morgan, from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

The resolutions reported from the Committee of Elections were as follows:

Resolved, That George W. Morgan is not entitled to a seat in the Fortieth Congress from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

Resolved, That Columbus Delano is entitled to a seat in the Fortieth Congress from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

The pending question was upon the adoption of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. KERR, on behalf of the minority of the Committee of Elections, as a substitute for the first resolution reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That George W. Morgan was duly elected and is entitled to retain his seat in the Fortieth Congress, from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MORGAN] is entitled to the floor for twenty-two minutes remaining of his hour.

Mr. WOODWARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to make an explanation of a matter of fact, in regard to which I fell into an error yesterday, and also led my friend from Indiana [Mr. KERR] into an error. The gentleman from Indiana asked me if the opinion of the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the decision of the case of Hubert vs. Reilly was a unanimous opinion. Not remembering at the time that there was any dissenting opinion, and having seen the opinion only in manuscript upon which no dissent was marked, I answered that it was a unanimous opinion. Since that time I have obtained the volume containing the report of that case; and I find by reference to it that Justices Read and Agnew did not concur in the opinion of the majority of the court. I wish to make that correction of a matter of fact to go upon the record.

Mr. MORGAN then resumed and concluded his remarks, begun yesterday. [The speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy the attention of the House but a few minutes, and I propose to confine myself entirely to the consideration of one point involved in this case. The decision of the case must turn, in a good degree, upon the question whether the committee did right in rejecting the votes of certain men charged as deserters from the Army of the United States, or with having gone to a foreign country to avoid the draft, and failed to return under the provisions of law in that case made.

At my own town, Mr. Speaker, there is a branch of the national asylum for disabled volunteer soldiers. In that institution at this time there are more than eight hundred disabled men who fought in the cause of the country. Some ninety of them have lost an arm; some ninety have lost a leg; several have lost both arms; and several have lost both legs. And all these men, thus bearing upon their bodies the proof of what they did and periled for the country, have been by act of the present Legislature of Ohio disfranchised. What I mean by that is this: drawn from their various homes in that and neighboring States to find a home there provided for them by the Government, our Legislature—a Republican Legislature—passed an act so construing "residence" as that they might be regarded, when they had been over a year at this home, as residents for the purpose of suffrage. A Democratic Legislature, not liking the kind of votes that they would probably cast, have repealed that law, so that these soldiers, crippled as they are, must be driven back to their own humble places of residence, if they have any, and many of them out upon the world, where they have no residence other than that provided for them by the Government, or else submit to stay there, unable to take any part in the government of that country for which they fought.

Now, sir, my sympathies have been much excited in reference to that class of people; but I have no particular sympathy for any effort made to secure, under any strict construction of law, the right of suffrage peculiarly for those who deserted us in that hour of need. And yet if they have strictly that right, however they may have cast their votes let those votes be counted.

Now, have they the right? What is the law upon this subject as applied to a contested-election case coming up from the State of Ohio? By the constitution of Ohio, in order that a man shall be a voter he must fall within this clause:

"Every male white citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of the State one year next preceding the election, and of the county, township, or ward in which he resides, such time as may be provided by law, shall have the qualifications of an elector, and be entitled to vote at all elections."

It is necessary, among other qualifications, that he shall be a citizen of the United States. But Ohio, by her constitution and by her laws, can no more than any other State settle the question who are to be regarded in law as citizens of the United States. That is left to the legislative power vested in the Congress. Congress in 1865 passed an act containing that upon which a question is raised here, and it is in these terms: that in addition to the other lawful penalties for the crime of desertion from the military or naval service—

"All persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service or report to a provost marshal within sixty days after the proclamation hereinafter mentioned, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their rights to become citizens." &c.

A further provision extends it to those who go to a foreign country in order to avoid the draft. The question, then, is reduced to the simple one: if, by that act of Congress of 1865, men who deserted from the ranks of our Army, failing to return when an opportunity was afforded them to do so, ceased on that account to be citizens of the United States, they cannot be permitted to vote in Ohio, because Ohio requires a man to be a citizen of the United States in order to exercise at elections there the right of suffrage.

Now, sir, how is it in Ohio? This question whether a man has deserted or not I say is a question of fact, and as a question of fact is to be tried at the polls, like any other question of fact, affecting or determining the right of a person who offers to vote to exercise the right of suffrage.

But gentlemen who argue in behalf of the sitting member say not so. They say that a man cannot be held to have deserted until it has been judicially ascertained by sentence of a court-martial, or some other proper tribunal, that he is a deserter. I deny that; I hold that it is a question of fact raised by the language of the statute of the United States, to be determined like any other question of fact by the triers of that fact at the polls. If the construction of the law contended for by them be the true one, how then shall we understand it? What is the provision of the law?

"That in addition to the other lawful penalties of the crime of desertion from the military or naval service, all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service, or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after the proclamation hereinafter mentioned, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship," &c.

Gentlemen say that means all persons who have been criminally convicted; all persons who have been convicted of the crime of desertion. Sir, if that be the construction of the law, then how should the statute read in order to clearly bear that interpretation?

"All persons who have been convicted of the crime of desertion from the military or naval service of the United States, and who shall not return to said service or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after proclamation issued, shall be deemed and taken to have relinquished their rights of citizenship," &c.

Gentlemen would have us believe that the law-making power here in Congress was not treating the act of desertion as a mere fact, but was intending to regard it as an existing fact only when it should have been ascertained by the sentence of a court-martial or other proper tribunal. If so, then we have this inconsistent proposition, that a person shall actually desert, shall be arrested, tried, and convicted of the crime of desertion, shall be, perhaps, sentenced to death, and then report himself to a provost marshal in order to make out the case.

Now, if you take this interpretation of gentlemen and apply it to the reading of the statute it becomes most manifest that Congress could have intended no such thing, but that they meant that the act of deserting, or the act of going to a foreign country, either act being complete, and the party refusing to return upon opportunity being offered, or the act of deserting taking place after the passage of the law, (for both classes of cases were provided for,) then so much was done as to amount to a declaration on the part of the person so doing the act that he was willing to give up his right to citizenship.

Mark you, there is nothing ex post facto about this. It is all carefully prospective, and the relinquishment of citizenship is under the statute a voluntary act by the party, either by not returning after due notice or by going away after the passage of the law.

If, then, it be a question of fact, I hold that in Ohio it is to be tried at the polls, like any other question of fact involving the right to vote.

In Ohio we have no registry law. The consequence is that the officers whom we call the judges of election perform the double functions of registrars and of inspectors and receivers of the votes. Whatever questions as to the right to vote would be settled in advance by a board of registration, are in Ohio settled at the polls by the judges of election. If a voter be objected to on account of color, if he be objected to on account of age, if he be objected to on account of residence, all these are questions of fact, and they are to be decided upon the spot by the judges of election at their peril. It is true that if the judges can be shown to have acted maliciously and wantonly, if it can be shown that they have rejected voters which were properly admissible, they may be held in the courts to answer in damages. But their judgment upon the question of admissibility is unquestionably a judgment legally and legitimately exercised; and it is well exercised when they decide upon a fact which clearly disqualifies a man from exercising the right of voting.

Thus, then, the question of fact, whether a man has voluntarily consented to relinquish his citizenship under the law of the United States, (which can alone control in this matter,) by going away or by refusing to return, is like other questions of fact, such as age, color, residence, &c., to be settled by the triers of these facts at the polls. Hence, I say, that this pretext as to the necessity of a judicial finding is no more applicable to the question whether a man has gone off and voluntarily relinquished his citizenship than it is to any other question of fact connected with the history of the party and affecting his right to vote.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy only two or three minutes. The sitting member yesterday in the course of his argument stated with a great deal of emphasis that I did not understand his case, although I had attempted to discuss it. I noticed that he repeated the remark two or three times, addressing me instead of the Speaker. I supposed at the time that the gentleman, in the heat of his passion, designed simply to be severe; and regarding his remarks in that light, and being as a lawyer accustomed to such remarks from my opponents, especially when a man is pleading his own cause, I did not design to say anything upon the subject. But I am told that the sitting member had probably got in his mind an idea that I had never taken up his case and investigated the facts in detail, but had derived my information from the brief of the contestant, or in a lump from somebody. I wish to say that when my fellow-members of the committee intrusted to me the duty of examining the facts in this case, I took both the brief of the contestant and that of the sitting member, and made a list of 418 names of persons whom either one party or the other alleged to be disqualified as voters for one cause or another. I ran over the whole evidence with regard to each name, and after collecting the evidence as to whether he was disqualified, whether he voted and for whom he voted, I marked the name for rejection or allowance as I thought the proof required. Thus I went over the whole list of 418 names—a labor I never shall perform again—a labor such as I believe no man in this House has heretofore performed or ever will perform.

In deciding upon the correctness of my judgment upon this evidence, the House must, I admit, be governed by its opinion as to my fairness. I intended to be fair. I knew very well that the House could never go over this long list. The minority of the committee have not done it; the sitting member himself has not done it. It would occupy at least a month if I should undertake to review and explain these facts as I went over them at my room. But the principles upon which the decision of the majority of the committee rests are all discussed in the report, brief as it is. I made the report brief, because I knew members would not read a long one; and it is my custom in all matters to be brief, as every member will bear me witness. All the principles governing the case are presented in the report as I discussed them yesterday, with the single exception of the question of pleading involved in the matter of notice.

I had learned from experience that the House gave but little attention to that. No man has more than one contest, except perhaps I except our veteran contestant from Missouri, and every man who comes with a contest is unacquainted with the business he has undertaken. He has one in his life. He has no lawyer, because in his county or district a contest never occurred before. The notice and answer, as you may say, are made by men unaccustomed to their business. And when we have such cases we expect to waste before the committee two or three days in discussion on points which the committee have decided over and over again, and with which they are as familiar as with their alphabet. The committee decide these questions about notice and answer, and never trouble the House about them.

I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I yield the time allowed me by the rules for closing this debate to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the committee.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to participate in the debate on this case, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] amply able at all times to take care of what he undertakes, had consented in the midst of the very arduous duties imposed on me to take off my hands; and it is only now at his request that I venture to beg the attention of the House for a few moments to such considerations as in my mind seem proper to be presented at this time.

It has been said that the case is a long one. More than a thousand witnesses have been examined; two thousand pages of printed matter were submitted to the House and referred to the committee for their consideration; and three weeks of constant argument before the committee were necessary for the elucidation of the questions submitted. It was necessary for the committee to go through with all this work; but happily and fortunately for the House such have been the conclusions of the whole committee, the majority and minority, that there are left for the consideration of the House but three points in this case. And on these three points of law turns the result of all this labor and investigation.

They are points of law, Mr. Speaker, applicable to the facts which in the main are not disputed—the essentials of which are admitted on all sides. Therefore what I may offer to the consideration of the House will be dull and dry in the extreme. But the House would be unable to come to a satisfactory conclusion on this case without each gentleman settling for himself the questions which arise on these three points.

The first point is what disposition shall be made of the votes cast at this election by these persons denominated by both parties as "deserters." The second is what shall be done with the vote cast at Pike township. The third is what shall be done with the vote cast at Mount Vernon. These three questions are all there is in this case. As was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD,] on the other side of the House, in point of fact the determination of the first determines the whole case.

What shall be done, therefore, with the vote of those persons denominated as "deserters?" It is claimed by the contestant that they are not legal voters and by the sitting member that they are. What is the law by which you are to determine whether they are legal voters or not? They are persons who failed to report themselves for military duty under the proclamation of the President of the United States, made in pursuance of the act of the 3d of March, 1865. It is claimed by the contestant that these persons, for that reason, are not citizens of the United States; and it being admitted that no person not a citizen of the United States can vote in the State of Ohio, he claims these persons, therefore, were not legal voters. It is claimed by the sitting member, first, that the law of March 3, 1865, from which this result is claimed, is an unconstitutional law, as applicable to these parties, because it is an ex post facto law; and secondly, if it be not an ex post facto law, that no man is, for the purpose of this discussion and this question, to be decided an alien unless upon the conviction of a court martial appointed to try the question. Mr. Speaker, both these positions, I apprehend, are untenable. I apprehend that the reading of the statute itself, to a judicial mind, must carry the conviction that it is applicable to this man in no sense of ex post facto, and that it is in no sense such a law that the effect to be produced by it is only upon the result of a conviction of an offense under it.

My distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD,] late chief justice of that State, put to me, coupling me with two other members of the Committee of Elections on our side, certain interrogatories yesterday, to which he demanded a categorical answer; and he announced to the House his conviction that, notwithstanding this demand, no one of us would venture to attempt an answer. Why we three were selected of all this House I am unable to say. If it was because he thought we should appropriate to ourselves the kind terms in which he addressed us to the exclusion of our associates on the committee, even to the exclusion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] who was standing by his side, and to whom the whole drift of his remarks were just as applicable as to ourselves, I am unable to say. But I venture myself to attempt a reply, and as my friend promised me that he would give his vote for the contestant if I should satisfy him that the reply I made was sound in law, I enter upon it with the confidence that when the final vote shall be called even his name will be found recorded upon the side of the law in this case and for the contestant.

The gentleman put his interrogatory substantially in this way: "I hold in my hand the opinion of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, the highest tribunal in the State of Pennsylvania, the only one that has put a construction upon this law, and I put it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] and to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and to the learned gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] to answer me yea or nay whether that opinion is not binding upon them." I do not know what the answer of either of my colleagues may be, but before I seek to answer it I would really like, if I only had time, to have the gentleman from Pennsylvania answer me whether he really believes that upon a question of the qualification and election of a member of this House, upon which the Constitution of the United States has made us sole judges, that to the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania even he is called upon to surrender his private judgment. Upon a question upon which no law, save our own organic law, can bind the private honest judgment of every individual member of this House, he asks me as a lawyer if I dare stand up and say to this House that the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania is not binding on me.

That is the first question. The next is this: I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the reason why my friend thinks the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania is binding upon these three unfortunate gentlemen here, is not because it is the opinion of that particular tribunal, but because it is the opinion of the highest court of judicature in one of the States of this Union. Not that State any more than any other—just as much as that State, or any other, and no more. I have only to ask him if, when the supreme court of the State of Wisconsin, the highest court of judicature in that State, pronounced the fugitive slave law unconstitutional, in his opinion that decision was binding on him. And following out this line a little further, suppose the supreme court of Ohio should pronounce upon this very law just the opposite decision from that pronounced by the court of Pennsylvania, would that be binding on him, too? And how would we three gentlemen, who stood up here to receive our lessons in this way yesterday, be bound by the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania one way, and the decision of the supreme court of Ohio the other way? How would we vote? Would we not be bound to look into the decision of both those courts, constituted of learned and high-minded judges, to see upon what ground those decisions were made, and to give to them such weight as our own judgments, our own ideas of the law, should dictate to us they were entitled to?

Suppose I were to take the book in which that decision is into a court in Massachusetts, and read it as an authority pending litigation on this question in Massachusetts, would the supreme court in Massachusetts listen to me if I should tell them that it was binding even on that court? Much less in this court, which has its powers granted to it solely by the Constitution, and which it cannot surrender to the court in Pennsylvania, however high may be the respect which we entertain for the individual opinions of the members who constitute that court. And, sir, it is just in that light and to that end and to that extent that the opinion read here by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and by my colleague upon the committee from Indiana is entitled to respect, and it is not, in my opinion, entitled to any of the respect which the gentleman from Indiana sought to give to it by announcing to this House that it was the unanimous opinion of a court constituted of two Democrats and three Republicans. Sir, it adds no weight to a judgment of any court in this land, to my mind, that the judges in pronouncing that judgment have sunk the judge in the politician. If there is anything from which I shrink in utter disgust it is a political judge. The whole history of the jurisprudence in that country from which we derive so large a share of our own law and methods and procedure in courts of justice is strewn thick with the wrecks of political judges. Bacon fell by it; Macclesfield fell by it; Loughborough dishonored himself under it; the brilliant Charles Yorke, the idol of his party and pride of the profession, tempted to betray both of them by the glittering bauble of the chancellorship, reached out his hand to touch it and it fell lifeless by his side, and history has charitably drawn the mantle of mystery over his fate. Mansfield, whenever he descended from the bench and essayed the paths of politics, was sure to slip; within our own day Westbury hid his head in shame and retired from the bench endeavoring to conceal his fall from the public gaze; and I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if in American politics there is anything that gives better assurance of a more successful trial of this experiment on the part of the judiciary here than in the Old World? Are the paths of politics here less devious, less slimy, less fatal in their influence upon the judicial character and upon the ermine than in the Old World. Time, sir, will determine; but to me, if anything can detract from the weight of a judgment of a court it is the announcement on the part of him who cites it that it is the judgment of three Republicans and two Democrats.

I have been led off into this digression by the remark of the gentleman from Indiana. I propose now to look at this judgment itself and see how much weight it is entitled to by the rule which I have laid down. But in point of fact it was not, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana yesterday, the unanimous judgment of the five judges who constituted the court. That was corrected by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] himself this morning, as I understand, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania was a part of that court, and can correct me if I am mistaken. As I have always understood the history of this decision it was that the court stood two and two, finding its judicial conclusions squaring with its political bias, and one judge hovering between the two, sometimes inclining to the one side and sometimes to the other, two of these judges holding that this was an ex post facto, and, therefore, an unconstitutional law, and two of them holding that it was not an ex post facto, but a constitutional law, capable of being enforced in the manner they were seeking to enforce it, and one of them holding the balance between them, so that no judgment could be rendered for a long time. The Legislature of Pennsylvania, as some other Legislatures have done, sought to relieve the court of this dilemma, and put a legislative construction upon that law, and they passed a bill, which went into the hands of the Governor at the close of the session, and he, unwilling to sign it and hoping for a judicial decision that would relieve him from signing it, sought to ascertain what was to be the judgment of the court in vain for weeks and weeks, until the court, putting the papers into the hands of this judge who held the balance of power, told him to make up a judgment; and he made up a judgment just splitting the two questions, deciding with one side that this was not an ex post facto law, and with the other side that a conviction must be had before the judgment could be rendered, and therefore joining the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his colleague on that point, the judgment was rendered. That is the weight to which that judicial decision is entitled—a decision which is paraded here, my friend from Pennsylvania will pardon me for saying, by himself, one of those who constituted the learned tribunal, and he dared his colleagues here upon this floor, his peers in everything pertaining to private judgment, his peers in everything except in learning and ability—with his own opinion thus promulgated in the court of Pennsylvania in his hand, he asks us, with an assurance that rises to sublimity, whether we dare say we are not bound by that opinion of his.

Mr. WOODWARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. If I am not cut short in my time I will.

Mr. WOODWARD. Of course not.

Mr. DAWES. I will yield with the understanding that my time will not be cut short by it.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WOODWARD. As the gentleman has undertaken to answer a question which I submitted to him with great respect, which I submitted to him, because of my great respect, without any such word or thought of such word as "dare," or "challenge," I would like to remind the gentleman what the question was. Since he has answered questions I did not ask, I would be glad if he would address himself to questions I did ask.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will not leap before he gets to the stile, I will endeavor to answer the question he put.

Mr. WOODWARD. I submitted with great respect to the gentleman and to his colleagues, a question which I thought was a fair one. I certainly intended no indignity in submitting the question; it was submitted in terms which were respectful. This assault upon me, growing out of that fact, is not an answer to my question.

If the gentleman will allow me I will restate the question. It is this: whether, where the construction of a statute is involved in any proceeding, the judicial opinion as to the meaning of that statute is not the rule by which the statute is to be read in all cases and by all bodies? My argument was that statute law is to be understood and received as the judicial tribunals of the country construe and expound it. In this particular instance no other judicial tribunal than the supreme court of Pennsylvania having had occasion to expound this statute, that particular decision was cited for that reason; not because of any exalted claims set up on behalf of that court, but for the simple reason that that was the only judicial tribunal that had had occasion to pass upon this question.

Now, the question I submitted to the gentleman with great respect, not as a challenge, but because of his learning, was whether, as a general principle, all men and all bodies having to deal with statute law were not bound to accept that statute in the sense in which the judicial tribunals of the country has expounded it? To that question the gentleman has not addressed himself at all.

Mr. DAWES. Inasmuch as the gentleman says the court, of which he constituted an important part, was the only one that put this construction upon this statute, he puts the question to me whether I am not bound to take as my law here his construction in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WOODWARD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I know it is very easy to so restate a question as to evade it. But the question I put was a distinct one. Is not this House and are not all other men having to do with that statute bound to take it as the judicial tribunals of the country have expounded it? That is my question in substance and almost in form.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman desired to put that question to me, not merely as an abstract question, but as having some reference to what he was himself talking about, then I say to him that, so far as it has any application to the question under discussion, I have answered it. So far as the abstract question is concerned, when the highest tribunal of the land shall have put its construction upon this statute, then I will be governed by it. But in this forum, for this forum, and for the judgment of every member of this forum, there is no tribunal above it.

Mr. WOODWARD. That is true, so far as deciding upon the qualifications of members is concerned. But when in this forum the meaning of the statute is the question which is in issue, is not the judicial opinion conclusive upon this forum? That is my question.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to disabuse the mind of the gentleman. There was not the slightest intention on my part to utter a word that he would take to himself as offensive. I do not fall behind any man in the respect I entertain for the gentleman individually and as a judge. I know two members of the court that delivered this opinion which I hold in my hand—the gentleman who prepared the opinion, and the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania; and for them both, as judges and individuals, I entertain the highest respect. But when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] insists that I shall add to the respect which I have accorded to their learning and private worth deference for their political sentiment, what I have said with regard to the mingling of politics with the judicial character becomes appropriate as illustrating the history of all such attempts in the Old World and in this; and similar, I predict, will be the fate of every judge of any standing who shall undertake to carry at the same time the judicial ermine and the dirty, draggled mantle of politics.

I now proceed to consider the other point which the gentleman from Pennsylvania desired me to answer. He says that this act of 1865 is a law divesting every man to whom it applies of rights of which, under the Constitution, he cannot be deprived without due process of law. He argues that to declare that a man who has once been a citizen shall, if he comes within the definition of the statute, cease to be a citizen without being tried and condemned by a competent court, is to deprive him of his liberty without due process of law. But, sir, in taking this position, the gentleman wholly misunderstands what this law is. It is no such thing as the gentleman claims it to be. It is no law imposing a penalty; it is no law constituting a new crime; it is no law authorizing the deprivation of a man's property, liberty, or life for any act which he may do in violation of it. It is founded upon the principle recognized in this House, more particularly during the present session than at any former time, but always recognized in this land, and constituting at this moment the basis of our complaints on both sides of the House; I mean the principle that a man has a right by his own act to renounce his citizenship. We all acknowledge the principle that a man owing allegiance to any nation on the face of the earth has the right voluntarily to renounce his citizenship. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] himself recognized this principle in an amendment which he offered to the bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs to secure the rights of American citizens.

The gentleman's amendment provided—

"That whenever any citizen of the United States, whether native-born or naturalized, shall remove his domicile to a foreign country in good faith, and with the intention of becoming a citizen or subject thereof, and shall become naturalized under the laws of said foreign country, he shall be considered as having abjured his allegiance to the Government of the United States, with the consent of the said Government, and all claims of the said Government upon the allegiance of said citizen shall forever cease and determine."

Thus the gentleman proposed to incorporate into our laws a provision that a certain thing done by a citizen of the United States shall be taken and deemed to be a renunciation of his citizenship.

Then the Committee on Foreign Affairs, not to be outdone by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, put the declaration in a little stronger language:

"That if any naturalized citizen of the United States shall return to his native country with intent to resume his domicile therein; or if any citizen shall leave the United States with the intention of permanent residence in any foreign State; or shall fail to make annual return of his property for taxation to the assessor of internal revenue for the district of the United States in which said citizen last resided; or shall engage as army or navy belligerent in any foreign war or service, such citizen shall not be entitled to the interposition of the Government in his behalf under the provisions of this act."

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VAN TRUMP,] undertaking to go still further, introduced an amendment, which I do not happen to have before me, but which provided that if a citizen of the United States should perform certain acts he should be deemed to have voluntarily renounced his citizenship. And the gentleman from Rhode Island, who always states his propositions with most admirable clearness, presented a measure affirming still more clearly the same principle, the right of a man to renounce his citizenship and the right of Congress to declare that when a citizen does certain acts they shall be deemed a renunciation of citizenship.

The late Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Black, has put this still stronger. He says:

"There is no statute"—

There was no statute at the time he gave his opinion.

"There is no statute or other law of the United States which prevents either a native"—

There is no statute now to that effect—

"which prevents a native or naturalized citizen from severing his political connection with this Government if he sees proper to do it in time of peace. There is no mode of renunciation prescribed."

There was then no law; there is now.

"In my opinion, if he emigrates, carries his family and effects with him, &c., this would imply dissolution of his previous relations with the United States."

Bearing this in mind, if the House please, this doctrine avowed by every gentleman upon the floor, and which has passed into law so far as this House is concerned, with one, two, or three dissenting voices, that a man could voluntarily renounce his citizenship, and that by doing certain acts they shall be deemed to renounce all citizenship, let me read this law and see what it exactly does. It does this and no more. It says if a citizen of the United States shall do this, that, and the other, he shall be deemed to have severed his relations with the United States.

Mr. WOODWARD. It says these are additional penalties.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will listen to me until I get through, he will be satisfied, if he can be. The law says:

"That in addition to the other lawful penalties of the crime of desertion from the military or naval service"—

That is, in addition to doing something else already prescribed. Now mark. We do not touch the penalties for the crime of desertion. We leave them just as they are. It says in addition:

"All persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after the proclamation hereinafter mentioned, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their right to become citizens; and such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any rights of citizens thereof; and all persons who shall hereafter desert the military or naval service, and all persons who being duly enrolled shall depart the jurisdiction of the district in which he is enrolled, or go beyond the limits of the United States with intent to avoid any draft into the military or naval service duly ordered, shall be liable to the penalties of this section."

This is what they shall do. It is told them beforehand, "here are certain acts, and if you do them the law, as here enacted, tells you what they are evidence of." It is precisely what passed in the bill this session of Congress.

In the State of Massachusetts, and in every other State of the Union, there is prescribed a certain term of residence in the State and town before a man can vote. In the State of Massachusetts a man must reside six months previous to the election in the town where he attempts to vote. Suppose I move out of the town I live in and take up my residence for a month previous to the day of election in a neighboring town, the State of Massachusetts has, by law, declared if I do that I shall be taken and deemed to have voluntarily relinquished my right to vote in that town. That is what the State of Massachusetts says. I venture that is what every State in this Union has enacted—enacted beforehand, that if you do certain things they shall be construed to be evidence that you have renounced and given up your right of citizenship. After doing that, when I appear at the polls and before the judges of election and my vote is challenged, does the gentleman from Pennsylvania stand up in my behalf and say, "The gentleman from Massachusetts has not been indicted and convicted, and he is still a voter in the town, because he has not been indicted and convicted of leaving that town?" There is no provision of law under which I am to be indicted for not coming back to the town and remaining there. There is no provision for trying a man by court-martial for not having returned within sixty days under this proclamation. There is an independent law providing for this trial by court-martial for his original desertion; but if he does not return to the service which he owes to the Government within sixty days then he is to be taken and deemed to have left his citizenship behind him. That is what this law means; that is what is provided. The idea that he is to be convicted of not having come back in 1866 by a court-martial or under a United States court before the question can be tried at the polls whether he is a voter or not is an absurdity. When he comes to the polls, and he is an alien, he stands on all fours with every other alien, and it is a question of fact, both with him and with the son of the Emerald Isle, who may walk with him arm in arm. It is a question of fact to be determined by the judge of elections—and for that purpose he is put there—whether he has about him any disqualification. A is disqualified because he was never naturalized; B because he did not return within sixty days; C because he has a "visible admixture of African blood"; D because he is a minor; E because he went to reside in another town for the space of one month. That disposes of this question.

Mr. Speaker, there is an analogy in the laws of the United States and in the laws of Ohio. The law of Ohio does provide that upon conviction for bribery, and for certain other crimes specified, any man shall be disqualified; i. e., for conviction, without regard to the ground of conviction, whether rightly or wrongly. Another law says if for any reason he shall cease to be a citizen of the United States he is disqualified. The United States passed in 1790 a law providing that upon conviction of offering a bribe to a judge a man should be disqualified from holding office. In 1853 they passed a law that upon conviction of offering a bribe to a member of Congress a man should be disqualified from holding office. A conviction is necessary because the statute says so. But in 1863 Congress passed a law in very different language, the last section of which is in these words:

"And be it further enacted, That every person guilty of either of the offenses described in this act shall be incapable and forever disqualified to hold any office under the Government."

That is not an accidental change of phraseology. It was designed and for a purpose. Why? This act was passed in the midst of the rebellion. It was a prescribed penalty of disqualification upon any man who had been guilty of treason, or misprision of treason, or of giving aid and comfort to the enemy, and it was necessary that it should go further than to say he should be disqualified upon conviction. If it rested on conviction, inasmuch as conviction must be had in the State where the offense was committed, it would have been utterly nugatory to pass such a law, because its State that would elect to an office a man guilty of the offenses described in this statute would of course acquit him when tried. Therefore the law was clothed in that phraseology.

Allow me to read the views of one of the most learned Senators at that time upon this very statute:

"There was the law that created the disability; it was not the law about the oath. Another thing you will observe, Mr. President, that if disaffected States could send men here opposed to the existence of our Government, and who desired its destruction, and if those men could come from the battle-field of yesterday, sit here to-day and confound our councils and return to the battle-field to-morrow, what would be the consequence? These men, we will understand, could never be convicted in States thus sustaining them; and therefore if we were to wait for their conviction we could never be disabused of them in the Senate, could never be expurgated of them. This law was not drawn so as to provide that if a man shall be convicted of treason he shall be disqualified. That is not the expression. It was intended and made for the occasion. It is that 'every person guilty of either of the offenses described in this act shall be forever incapable.'"

That was Mr. Collamer. Such, Mr. Speaker, were precisely the views entertained and announced in this House when this law under consideration was being passed. Upon the report of this bill in reference to deserters, a gentleman from Pennsylvania, not now a member of the House, put a question to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, whether a conviction was necessary, and the present chairman of the committee [Mr. Wilson] told him that that was a question to be settled by the judges of election at the polls. He then offered an amendment to the bill by adding the words "Upon conviction thereof." That amendment was deliberately voted down upon the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] that that was a question to be decided at the polls the same as any other fact touching the qualifications of an elector. That disposes of this question so far as deserters are concerned. It shows conclusively that the whole ground of this claim that they must be first convicted by court-martial, and then the disqualification attaches is upon a mistaken apprehension of the meaning of the law; and the minority of the committee in their report give up the whole case, for they say:

"In Millford township, Knox county, Edward Beach voted for the contestant, but had been previously convicted by the United States district court for the northern district of Ohio of passing counterfeit coin and was unpardoned, which offense is a felony alike under the laws of Ohio and of the United States, and punishable in like manner under each, without disfranchisement under the Federal law. But if the conviction had been under the laws of Ohio, a part of the penalty would have been disfranchisement. The sitting member claims, therefore, that as the voter was a citizen of that State, and the offense was committed therein, the disfranchisement under the State laws attaches and takes effect upon the conviction in the Federal court. We think otherwise. The penalties denounced against any crime by the respective governments can only take effect as to the government under which they are adjudged. Neither government is called upon to enforce the punishments prescribed on conviction of crime by the other. There is believed to be no authority for any other conclusion."

Therefore, according to the doctrine of the minority of the committee, before a man shall cease to be a citizen, cease to be qualified as a voter in Ohio, he must be convicted by court-martial, and when he is, the same minority say it shall have no effect whatever. So that by this process the minority of the committee have succeeded in emasculating the law and rendering it entirely useless and an absurdity.

I now pass to the second point in this case, and that is the vote of Pike township. The vote of that township has been rejected by the committee. Why? Because the only evidence of the vote is through this source. It was taken in violation of the law of the State of Ohio; and while the committee hold—and the authorities are full upon that point—that that does not disqualify a single voter in Pike township who cast his vote, yet it is necessary to prove how men did vote. The defects in the transactions at Pike township are these: the law requires three electors to be judges. There were but two electors and one deserter appointed judges in this township, and those three—two of them eligible to the office and one of them ineligible to the office—acted as judges and decided whose votes should be received. They then made a return in which, instead of certifying according to law that the votes cast were the votes of electors, they did not certify that a single vote cast was the vote of an elector. Now, what shall be done in this case? Shall the men who went in there and honestly voted lose their votes? Certainly not. But what shall we take as evidence? Not the evidence of these three men, because that was not in conformity to law, and besides, by its very terms, their certificate does not show that a single elector voted. So we say that to these parties the name of every man who shows he voted there and was a legal voter shall be counted notwithstanding these judges of election failed to comply with the law and acted in violation of the law, and failed to give the proper evidence. We have got to take one of two methods. Either we have got to throw these parties back upon parol proof of who cast his vote there, or to take that which the law says shall not be evidence—one or the other; and we say to these men, "This is no evidence of who voted in Pike township, but we give you an opportunity to go and prove who voted, and every legal voter whom you show to have voted there we will count." This the parties did in other townships, but they failed to do it in Pike township; and that is the reason why the votes on the one side and on the other cast in Pike township cannot be counted, because neither party has furnished us a particle of legal proof of who did vote there.

A word upon the question whether the proof was legal or not. Two of these judges were qualified. I have heard it said that the third may be treated as a judge de facto. But, Mr. Speaker, while that is true of every man who is capable of holding an office and enters upon it under color of an appointment, it is not true of a man who has not the legal capacity to act; it is not true of a man who has not the elements that the law says shall exist in every officer. It is only in a case where a man otherwise competent by law is only in possession of a color of appointment; but nowhere, as I understand the law, was it ever held that a man whom the law says is not capable of holding the office can by any means legally discharge the duties of that office. That is the reason why this man was incapable of acting even to the extent of a judge de facto. But that does not cure the other defect which the papers show. The papers do not show that a single man who voted there was a legal voter. While we offered to these parties, according to all the precedents in cases of election, to go home and bring evidence of who voted; there, both parties chose to refer their case to this House upon the evidence as they had it.

There is still another objection to the conclusion in reference to Pike township, and that is, that it is claimed on the part of the sitting member that there is nothing in the notice of the contest on the part of the contestant indicating this ground of objection. That was so well argued by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] yesterday that but one other idea is left, and that idea, to my mind, is entirely conclusive. Admitting to be true all that is said upon that point by the minority of the committee, yet they overlook this controlling fact. This evidence touching Pike township was not brought to the attention of the committee by the contestant, but it was brought to their attention by the sitting member himself. Then he could not object to the committee considering the testimony which he himself laid before them, and giving it its legitimate effect. He brought the evidence there, and he did not object; he could not object to its consideration, for he laid it before the committee. But though it might be true, yielding for the sake of argument that it would be true, that the contestant, by reason of this defect in the notice, could not have brought this testimony before the committee, yet it does not lie in the mouth of the sitting member to say that the testimony he himself laid before the committee should not be considered by the committee.

One other point touching Pike township, and I will be through with that part of the case. It is said by the sitting member, and it was also said with great confidence by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] that in point of fact this man, Salathiel Parrish, who sat upon the board of Pike township as a judge of election was not a deserter; that he procured a substitute, and, therefore, ceased to be a deserter. Now, neither of those gentlemen read the testimony upon which they founded that conclusion, but left the House to take it upon the strength of their own statement.

Now, in point of fact not only does the evidence fail to carry out the assertion of the sitting member and of the gentleman from Indiana that this man procured a substitute, but the evidence shows that he did not procure a substitute. The very evidence to which they alluded shows that he did not procure a substitute. This man, Salathiel Parrish, was drafted and ran away, as did a dozen or so other men of the town. The town, in order to fill up its quota of ninety men, was obliged to have resort to Cincinnati, with the exception of two of the deserters who finally furnished substitutes. This deserter, Parrish, was away in foreign lands enjoying the protection of a foreign power and claiming, as he now does, the benefit of an allegiance to that power.

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will allow me to read the testimony first I will yield.

Mr. KERR. I hope the gentleman will read all the testimony, for it sustains me and contradicts him. I want it all read.

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has expired.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the House will indulge me for a few moments longer.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. KERR. I hope it will be done, with the understanding that some one on this side shall be allowed to reply.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] be allowed fifteen minutes additional time.

Mr. KERR. I desire ten minutes to reply to the gentleman.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to that.

Mr. KERR. Then I object to the extension of time asked for by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I think the gentleman from Indiana will hardly insist upon his objection to my paying a few moment's attention to the town of Mount Vernon, after the kindness and indulgence extended to him by this side of the House.

Mr. KERR. I will not object to the gentleman continuing his speech if he proposes to confine his remarks to Mount Vernon township.

Mr. DAWES. I will do so.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is extended fifteen minutes.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, the sitting member complains that we propose to disfranchise a whole township, the township of Pike; yet he himself turns round and proposes to disfranchise a township embracing 1,100 voters. When we offered him an opportunity to prove every vote cast in that township, he turns round and proposes to disfranchise the township; and it is a significant fact that this is the township in which both these gentlemen reside. I do not know that that gives any zeal or unction to the gentleman's desire to disfranchise the voters in that town. The gentleman felt called upon to apologize for taking this position, and the apology was in effect that if he were not situated as he is he would not do it; if he had anything else upon which to rely in this contest as an answer to the contestant he would not take the position he does; but, situated as he is, he is compelled to ask the House to disfranchise more than 1,100 votes in the township of Mount Vernon, the majority there being 400.

The city of Mount Vernon was incorporated by a special act of the Legislature in 1845. It lies in the center of Clinton township, from whose territory it was taken. Under this special charter the township and city were authorized to hold all county, State, and national elections together, and from that time to this all such elections have been so held. Subsequently a law was passed providing—

"That each township in the several counties shall compose an election district, unless such township is now, or shall hereafter be, divided by law into more districts than one, the election to be held at such place in such township or district as the trustees in each township shall direct; and each ward of any city that is or may be divided into wards shall compose an election district; the election therein to be held at such places as the members of the city council for their respective wards shall select."

Now, the construction put upon this statute for fifteen years has been that until the officers of the city government have appointed places in these wards the elections should be held as before at the places appointed by the trustees of the town. Elections have been held every year since the law was enacted, and the officers have never appointed places for the holding of the elections. Members of the Legislature have been thus chosen; the Legislature has recognized them as legally chosen. Such is the construction which was uniformly put upon this act from the time it was passed until the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Morgan,] the sitting member in this case, raised the question that the electors cannot vote except in the ward, and inasmuch as the officers of the city government have never appointed places for voting, therefore the town in which he and the contestant reside should be disfranchised. Upon this new construction for the first time put upon the law by the sitting member he asks this House to reject 1,100 votes.

Sir, I submit that nothing is so strong and satisfactory upon the construction of a statute as the contemporaneous construction of it, the construction given to it at the time of its enactment by the parties whom it affects, because they are supposed to know better than anybody else the meaning of the terms used by the Legislature. This construction having been put upon this statute fifteen years ago, the very year the law was enacted, and having been held by all parties without question from that time to this, it is the strongest evidence in the world that it is the true construction. To support this position I propose to cite a few authorities, and then I shall leave this case.

It is a rule as old as the civil law, originating long before there was any English language in which to write the law, that contemporaneous construction is the best.

And this, in the terse and admirable language of the civil law, is expressed by the maxim contemporanea expositio est fortissima in lege. As we shall see hereafter, this same principle has been applied, to a certain extent in the construction of constitutions. (See Sedgwick on State and Constitution Law, 251.)

So in regard to the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States sitting as circuit judges without distinct commissions for the purpose, it was held by the Supreme Court that a practice and acquiescence under the system for a period of several years, commencing with the organization of the judicial system, afforded an irresistible answer to all objections, and had, indeed, fixed the construction. It was said to be a contemporary interpretation of the highest nature. (Sedgwick on Statute and Constitutional Law, 251; Stuart vs. Laird, 1 Cranch, 299.)

So as to the laws of the colony of Massachusetts in regard to common lands, the supreme court of that State said:

"Of these statutes, a practical construction early and generally obtained, that in the power to dispose of lands, was included a power to sell and convey the common lands." * * * "Were the court now to decide that this construction is not to be supported, very great mischief would follow. And, although if it were res integra, it might be very difficult to maintain such a construction; yet, at this day, the argumentum ab inconvenienti applies with great weight. If this practice originated in error yet the error is now so common that it must have the force of law. We cannot shake a principle which has in practice so long and so extensively prevailed."—Sedgwick, 252; Rogers vs. Goodwin, 2 Massachusetts, 477, 478.

In regard to the statute of frauds the same court said:

"A contemporaneous is generally the best construction of a statute. It gives the sense of a community of the terms made use of by the Legislature." &c.—Sedgwick, 252; Packard vs. Richardson, 17 Massachusetts, 121, 143.

It remained for the sitting member at this late day to set up, in opposition to this contemporaneous construction, a new construction, not in aid of the voter, not to give new facilities to the voter to express his will at the ballot-box, but to disfranchise 1,100 votes of his fellow-townsmen because the necessities of the case are such that he finds it necessary to ask the House to make an extreme departure from the rules of law.

Mr. Speaker, I have gone imperfectly over these three points precisely as the committee have put them in the report. It leaves the contestant with a majority of some 80 odd votes. It disfranchises no votes. It accepts as a voter everybody who could be proved from any evidence to be a legal voter and permits him to cast his vote. The committee hold religiously to the doctrine that all forms must give way to the will of the voter expressed according to law. The only object of investigation before the committee is to go behind all forms and get, if possible, the vote of every legal elector in this district. They took that testimony, and from all that testimony they submit to the House, and confidently submit that no man, unless under the construction of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Kerr,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Woodward,] that all the laws enforcing the draft were unconstitutional and setting them aside, can come to any other conclusion than that at which the committee arrived:

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE and Mr. DELANO (contestant) obtained leave to print, as part of the debates, speeches on the pending resolutions. [See Appendix.]

The question first recurred on the following substitute, submitted by Mr. KERR:

Resolved, That George W. Morgan was duly elected, and is entitled to retain his seat in the Fortieth Congress, from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

Mr. KERR demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 79, not voting 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Driggs, Eldridge, Ferry, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Jones, Kerr, Knott, Loughridge, Marshall, McCormick, Niblack, Nicholson, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Taffe, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auken, Van Trump, Wood, and Woodward—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Griswold, Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, William Lawrence, Logan, Mallory, Maynard, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Nunn, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Plants, Polesy, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Taylor, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader, C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—79.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archer, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Chandler, Churchill, Coburn, Dodge, Ela, Eliot, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Glessbrenner, Gravely, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Kelley, Kelsey, Lakin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Orth, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Poland, Prayn, Robinson, Robinson, Selye, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Thomas, Twichell, Burt Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—73.

So the substitute was disagreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. KERR said: The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GLESSBRENNER] is paired with my colleague, Mr. SHANKS. The former would vote for and the latter against the resolution.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I am paired with Mr. PHELPS. He would vote ay, and I would vote no.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am paired with Mr. AMES. He would vote no, and I would vote ay.

The result having been announced as above, the question recurred on agreeing to the resolutions reported by the committee.

The question was then taken on the first resolution of the committee, as follows:

Resolved, That George W. Morgan is not entitled to a seat in the Fortieth Congress from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

The resolution was agreed to.

The question being stated on agreeing to the second resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Columbus Delano is entitled to a seat in the Fortieth Congress from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

Mr. KERR demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 38, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Griswold, Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kitchen, Koontz, William Lawrence, Logan, Logan, Mallory, Maynard, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Nunn, Paine, Perham, Plants, Polesy, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader, C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—80.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Driggs, Eldridge, Ferry, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Jones, Kerr, Knott, Loughridge, Marshall, McCormick, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Taffe, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auken, Van Trump, Wood, and Woodward—38.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archer, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Chandler, Churchill, Coburn, Dodge, Ela, Eliot, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Glessbrenner, Gravely, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Kelley, Ketcham, Kelsey, Lakin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Poland, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taber, Twichell, Burt Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—70.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, said: I am paired with Mr. PHELPS. He would vote no, and I would vote ay.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am paired with Mr. AMES on all the questions relating to this contested election. He would vote ay, and I would vote no.

Mr. KERR. Mr. GLOSSBRENNER would have voted against the resolution and my colleague, Mr. SHANKS, would have voted for it. They are paired with each other.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DELANO then appeared and was qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. WARE, one of its clerks, announced that that body had passed a bill (S. No. 164) to provide for appeals from the Court of Claims, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1117) to supply partial deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1868, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

It further announced that the Senate insisted upon its second amendment to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of John M. Palmer, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the committee of conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes thereon, and had appointed Messrs. WILLEY, SHERMAN, and MORRILL of Vermont, conferees on the part of the Senate.

DEATH OF EX-PRESIDENT BUCHANAN.

Mr. WOODWARD. I offer the following resolution, and ask the unanimous consent of the House for its consideration at this time:

The House having received with becoming sensibility intelligence of the death of James Buchanan, ex-President of the United States, at his country-seat at Wheatland, on the 1st instant, does hereby resolve:

1. That whatever diversities of opinion may prevail in respect of the administration of Mr. Buchanan as President of the United States, the members of this House can cordially unite in honoring the purity of his private character, the ability and patriotic motives which illustrated his long career of public service, and the dignity which marked the retirement of the latter years of his life.

2. That as a token of honor to the many virtues, public and private, of the illustrious sage and statesman whose death, in the ripeness of his age, has arrested the attention of the nation, the Speaker of the House is requested and authorized to appoint a committee of seven members to attend the funeral of Mr. Buchanan on behalf of the House, and to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the relatives of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the resolutions are before the House.

Mr. WOODWARD. I have nothing to say in support of the resolutions. I hope they will commend themselves to the support of every member of this House. I wish to remark, however, that if the resolutions pass, and the Chair has occasion to appoint a committee, I decline the position to which, I understand, I would be entitled as chairman of the committee, and I suggest that my colleague [Mr. GLOSSBRENNER] be appointed instead of myself.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he modify those resolutions a little. He certainly cannot expect to get a unanimous vote of the House commending the "patriotic motives" which animated Mr. Buchanan at all times in his public career. For one, I certainly cannot vote ay.

Mr. MULLINS. Neither can I.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor if the resolutions are to be debated. They are entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. WOODWARD. I will say for the information of the gentleman from Illinois, and of other gentlemen, that these resolutions were prepared by me at the suggestion of some members of the Pennsylvania delegation; and the first thing I did was to place them in the hands of gentlemen upon the other side of the House. My colleague from Chester county [Mr. BROOMALL] particularly took charge of the resolutions. To my certain knowledge he showed them to several gentlemen on that side of the House, and I desired them to be shown to every gentleman on that side of the House, because I had no purpose of offering any resolutions here that would become matter of debate or dispute.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman hear me one moment?

Mr. WOODWARD. I know what the gentleman from Maine is driving at, and I think it is hardly worth while to yield to him at present. I was saying, for the information of the House, that these resolutions were submitted to gentlemen on the other side of the House, and if they were not shown to every gentleman there it was the neglect of other persons, and not of myself, because they were intended to be submitted to every gentleman there. I know that a number of gentlemen on the other side of the House did examine and approve of them before they were returned to me; and indeed there was stricken out of the draft of the resolutions one resolution at the suggestion of gentlemen on the other side of the House. It is on the paper now, although it has not been read. It was stricken out at the instance of gentlemen on the other side of the House. I understood, therefore, that the resolutions as now presented would not encounter opposition upon that side of the House. I do not know how general that understanding was. I do not say it was universal.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I wish to ask the gentleman if there is any precedent for resolutions of this kind on the death of an ex-President?

Mr. WOODWARD. I believe, though I am not informed in regard to the matter, that whenever an ex-President has died during a session of Congress, Congress has always taken some notice of the fact. If there be no actual case that will be a precedent, it will be found to be that this is the first instance in which an ex-President has died during the session of Congress. But the other departments of the Government are taking notice of the death of Mr. Buchanan. Mr. Buchanan was at one time a distinguished member of this House; he was also a distinguished member of the other branch of the Federal Legislature; he was President of the United States; and he also represented this country at the British Court. He has been a man largely interested in public affairs in this country, and assuredly there is no need of a precedent for this House expressing in general terms its respect for his general character. The resolutions do not contain a syllable that can compromise the political prejudices or opinions of any gentleman in this House. They were carefully drawn with a view to avoid that. They were submitted to gentlemen on the other side, and the only one that was objected to was stricken out, and now to the other two I trust there will be no opposition. I call the previous question.

Mr. BROOMALL. As the gentleman has alluded to me, I hope he will yield to me before he moves the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to lay the resolutions upon the table, unless the gentleman will modify them. I am willing the grave shall bury the man's faults, and to speak only well of him, now that he is dead; but when the gentleman asks me to vote that the motives of Mr. Buchanan were always patriotic and pure he asks me to vote what I believe to be a falsehood, and I cannot do it.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to have read a substitute, which I think would obviate the very disagreeable scene of contending over the body of a dead man? I have a resolution in my hand which I think would secure the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think this scene corresponds with the usual action of this House in such matters.

Mr. MULLINS. Especially on the other side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The substitute cannot be read pending the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. WOODWARD. I will yield to hear the substitute of the gentleman from Maine read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House having received, with becoming sensibility, intelligence of the death of James Buchanan, ex-President of the United States, at his country seat at Wheatland, on the 1st instant, it is hereby

Resolved, That, as a mark of honor to one who has held such eminent public station, the Speaker of the House is requested to appoint a committee of seven members to attend the funeral of Mr. Buchanan, on behalf of the House, and to communicate a copy of this resolution to the relatives of the deceased.

Mr. WOODWARD. I cannot accept that amendment. I call the previous question upon my resolution.

Mr. BLAINE. I suppose if the call for the previous question is voted down, then my resolution would be in order as a substitute.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the resolutions be laid upon the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to make a suggestion.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I object. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] I withdraw the objection.

No further objection being made,

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, said: I ask my colleague [Mr. WOODWARD] to consent to strike out the words "the ability and patriotic motives which illustrated his long career of public service," and let the resolution be adopted without that in it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is what I proposed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read that portion of the resolution as proposed to be modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

That whatever diversities of opinion may prevail in respect to the administration of Mr. Buchanan as President of the United States, the members of this House can cordially unite in honoring the purity of his private character, and the dignity which marked the retirement of the latter years of his life.

Mr. WOODWARD. If the House will strike out the general allusion to the patriotic motives of Mr. Buchanan they can do so, but I cannot consent to do it myself.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield to allow such an amendment to be offered?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I did not propose to offer any amendment for the action of the House. I desired to have my colleague modify the resolution so that the record should not show that any such language had been included in the resolution at all.

Mr. WOODWARD. That clause refers in general terms to the patriotic motives of Mr. Buchanan. I cannot consent to any such amendment or modification.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay the resolutions on the table; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 46, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Broomall, Buckland, Calkins, Chandler, W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Halsey, Harding, Hill, Hopkins, Hunter, Julian, Kitchen, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughbridge, Mallory, Maynard, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Polesley, Pomeroy, Price, Rabin, Schenck, Selye, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Taffey, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader, C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and William Williams—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Butler, Eldridge, Getz, Goldaday, Griswold, Haight, Higby, Holman, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Knott, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, McCormick, Moorhead, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Plants, Randall, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stewart, Taylor, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auken, Van Trump, Wood, and Woodward—46.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archer, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Barnum, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Cary, Chandler, Churchill, Cook, Daws, Dodge, Eli, Elliot, Ferriss, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Gravely, Grover, Hawkins, Hooper, Asahel H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Humphrey, Jencks, Judd, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Laffin, Lincoln, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrissey, Munson, Nunn, Orth, Peters, Pike, Pile, Poland, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taber, John Trimble, Twichell, Elihu B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—60.

So the resolutions were laid on the table.

Mr. PAINE. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to offer a resolution in relation to the death of Mr. Buchanan.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I object.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask leave to offer a resolution on that subject.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I trust I will be allowed to offer the resolution.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I insist upon my objection.

Mr. PAINE. I have been requested to yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to offer a resolution. I will do so if it gives rise to no debate.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] offering the resolution. I will not object to my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS], offering the resolution, for I think he is the proper person to present it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] objects to the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN WYCK] objects to the one proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. BLAINE. I desire it to be noted that if any mark of respect upon the death of ex-President Buchanan is prevented in this House it is prevented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. WARD. I renew it.

ADMISSION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. PAINE. I report back from the Committee on Reconstruction the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1039) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress. I will explain the position of this question. This bill, as passed by the House, contained a certain fundamental condition. The Senate amendment proposes to change the language of that condition. The Committee on Reconstruction recommend an amendment to this amendment. The Senate has also amended the preamble, and in the latter amendment the committee recommend concurrence. I will add that it is expected, and, indeed, desired by the committee, that from the action of the House on this question a committee of conference will result; but it is thought desirable that our action at the present time should take the form proposed by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not propose at this time to ask a committee of conference.

Mr. PAINE. I do not, though it is expected that a conference committee will be the result.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendments of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

First amendment:

Strike out in the bill all after the words "fundamental condition," and insert the following:

That there shall never be in said State any denial or abridgement of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason or on account of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Reconstruction propose to amend this amendment by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting what will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The constitution of said State shall never be amended or changed so as to discriminate in favor of or against any class of citizens of the United States in their right to vote who are now entitled to vote by said constitution, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted; and no person shall ever be held to service or labor as a punishment for crime in said State except by public officers charged with the custody of convicts by the laws thereof.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the second amendment of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in the preamble after the word "republican" the words "in form;" so that it will read as follows:

Whereas the people of Arkansas, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, have framed and adopted a constitution of State government which is republican, and the Legislature of said State has duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen: Therefore.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a privileged question in connection with this bill. There must be some misunderstanding about it. This report does not come from the majority of the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. PAINE. I will explain to the House exactly how the thing stands.

The SPEAKER. If it is disputed whether this is a report from the committee, that question must be submitted to the House.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Certainly this is the report of the committee.

Mr. BROOKS. That is denied by myself, and is not affirmed, I believe, by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE].

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has not been in the committee all day.

Mr. BROOKS. There were four members in the committee; and I, being employed in the Committee of Ways and Means, was to be called in if any action on this subject should be proposed. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] will, I think, confirm the statement I make. On another bill the committee gave permission that a report should be made. I refer to the bill removing disabilities from some persons in Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule to be found on page 35 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

If it is disputed a report has been ordered to be made by a committee the question of reception must be put to the House.

Mr. PAINE. I wish to state before that is put that I met the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] on his way to the committee-room when I came from it, and he told me that he was going to another committee-room, and if the committee wanted him he would attend. I informed the committee of that fact. The chairman stated that the gentleman from New York had, when present, authorized the committee to proceed, counting him as present.

Mr. BROOKS. That is a mistake. I authorized myself to be called in case any vote was to be taken. It appears that but four were present. The committee consists of nine members. I will say that I do not wish to delay action on this subject. If the gentleman will allow it to be presented and taken up at any time, I am willing that shall be done. Let the committee report at any time.

Mr. PAINE. I do not feel at liberty to withdraw the report if I have the right to make it. If I have, I will make it now.

The SPEAKER. The fact being disputed the question must be put to the House.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman who reports it does not say it is from the majority.

The SPEAKER. He reports it in the usual form, and the gentleman disputes the fact.

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman will say that five out of nine were present when the bill was ordered to be reported I will not make, the point.

Mr. PAINE. I do not say that.

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to determine. A committee when full may authorize a smaller number to act.

Mr. BROOKS. I submit that is not a question for the House. When a gentleman rises and says that he is not authorized to report the bill by a majority of the committee, I say that it cannot be received, for a minority cannot report a bill. The gentleman from Vermont, the gentleman from Michigan, the gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from New York, and the gentleman from Massachusetts were not present. A majority was not there to authorize any bill to be reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must state for himself whether he is authorized to report by the committee, whether by the tacit or express consent of the members who were absent. If the gentleman insists on his objection, the question will be put to the House.

Mr. BLAINE. All trouble about this report can be avoided by putting it in such form that we can then concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. PAINE. I am obliged to my friend, but I cannot put it in any such form. I was informed by the chairman of the committee I was authorized to make the report. I thought when I came here that the gentleman from New York had given his authority.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman should take it for granted that he reports it by the consent of the committee and stand by the report without explanation. My colleague on the committee has not deigned to do so, and I ask him to withdraw the report until to-morrow.

Mr. PAINE. I am not willing to comply with the request under the circumstances.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask whether it is for the House to decide whether this report was or not authorized to be made by the committee?

The SPEAKER. The rule is that if it be disputed a report has been ordered to be made by a committee the question of reception must be put to the House. The House has heard the facts and must decide for itself.

Mr. BLAINE. What will be the question pending if the House receives the report?

The SPEAKER. The question on the Senate amendments.

Mr. BLAINE. If the House non-concur the question will come directly upon concurring in the Senate amendments?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Are we to vote whether the report has been properly made to the House or not? I understand there is no controversy about the facts. I understand both of my colleagues on the committee agree that a majority were not present. There were only four members present, not enough to authorize the report to be made. If so, then the report does not come here properly. I ask my friend to withdraw the report and offer it again.

Mr. BLAINE. That is a mere question of form.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Have the amendments been printed.

Mr. PAINE. I decline to withdraw the report. The House can accept it or not.

Mr. BROOKS. I raise the question of order that the gentleman from Wisconsin does not state that he is authorized to make this report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did so state when he rose, as the Chair understood.

Mr. BROOKS. He did not say he was authorized by the majority to make the report.

The SPEAKER. If the House so understands it will vote accordingly.

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman will state positively that he was authorized by the majority to make the report, I will not interpose the point of order, because I have the highest confidence in the gentleman's honor.

Mr. PAINE. I have already stated the facts; now I desire a vote on receiving or rejecting the report. I will state further—

The SPEAKER. No further debate is in order.

The question was taken on receiving the report of the Committee on Reconstruction; and there were—ayes 55, noes 56.

So the House refused to receive the report.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that the amendments be printed.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will it not all appear in the Globe?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. MAYNARD. If it is printed in the Globe that will answer every purpose.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I withdraw the motion.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to have the bill (H. R. No. 1117) to supply partial deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1868, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the internal tax bill.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent, as it was made a special order after the morning hour, and there has as yet been no morning hour.

RECESS TO-DAY.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I desire to say that I wish all general debate on the tax bill may end between now and midnight, and for that purpose, if we cannot get into Committee of the Whole, so as to take a recess at half past four o'clock this afternoon, I propose to move that when the House adjourns this afternoon it take a recess till half past seven this evening, with a view of going into Committee of the Whole on the tax bill. There are some half a dozen gentlemen who desire to speak at more or less length within the hour rule, and I desire they shall have an opportunity. But I feel it incumbent on me to make an effort to-morrow to stop all general debate under the hour rule and proceed with the debate on amendments.

The SPEAKER. The effect of this motion, if agreed to, will be at whatever hour the House sees fit to take a recess to-day, at half past four or five o'clock, it will meet at half past seven in the evening.

The motion to take a recess was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF A SUIT.

Mr. THOMAS. I rise to make a privileged report. I report back from the Committee on the Judiciary the joint resolution (H. R. No. 284) to provide for the removal of a suit pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, West Virginia, to the circuit court of the United States, which was referred to the committee yesterday with authority to report it back at any time. The committee recommend its passage.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that whereas a suit in ejectment is now pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, in West Virginia, against the tenant in possession to recover possession of the Harper's Ferry property, owned by the United States, and it is doubtful whether under any existing law of the United States the said suit can be removed to the circuit court of the United States, it is therefore resolved that it shall be the duty of the circuit court of the United States for the district of West Virginia, if in session, or to the judge thereof in vacation, on the application of the defendant in said suit, showing that the property sought to be recovered by the said suit is owned or claimed by the United States, under color of title, and verifying the facts set out in such application by his affidavit, to issue a writ of certiorari, directed to the said State court, directing it to send the record and proceedings in said suit to the said circuit court of the United States, in duplicate, which writ shall be delivered to the clerk of the said State court or left at his office by the marshal of the said district or his deputy or other person thereto duly authorized, and thereupon the said State court shall stay all further proceedings in said suit, and upon the return of the said writ the said suit shall be docketed in the said circuit court of the United States and there proceeded in according to law; and all further proceedings had therein in the said State court shall be null and void.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMAS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—M'KEE VS. YOUNG.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I am requested by several members of the Committee of Elections to move that the majority and minority reports and the accompanying papers in the case of McKee vs. Young be recommitted to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 266) to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 252) to create an additional land district in the State of Minnesota;

A bill (S. No. 492) to extend the time for the construction of the Southern Pacific railroad in the State of California; and

A bill (S. No. 433) authorizing the trustees of Union chapel of the Methodist Episcopal church in the city of Washington to mortgage their property for church purposes.

FIRST MILITARY DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the general commanding the first military district, with estimates of appropriations required for reconstruction purposes in that district; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION IN ALABAMA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the General of the Army, with a report from Major General Meade, commanding the third military district, relative to the recent election in Alabama, supplemental to his report sent to the House on the 27th of March last; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

POLITICAL DISABILITIES IN VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, at the suggestion of the General of the Army, a communication from the commanding general of the first military district relative to the disqualification of certain civil officers by the State constitution of the State of Virginia; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT TOLEDO, OHIO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of the 18th ultimo, a communication from the supervising architect, recommending the disposal of the present custom-house at Toledo, Ohio, and the erection of another in a more central locality.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that the letter with the accompanying communication be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

SUTRO CANAL.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1158) to aid in the construction of the Sutro canal; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IOWA AND MISSOURI STATE LINE RAILROAD.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 651) granting lands to the Iowa and Missouri State Line Railroad Company, and for other purposes, and moved that the same be recommitted to the committee and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has commenced, and reports are in order from the Committee on the Public Lands.

COMMON SCHOOLS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 248) to grant lands for the aid of common schools in the District of Columbia; and the same was laid on the table.

HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made an adverse report upon the petition of citizens of Nebraska, praying for an amendment to the homestead law; and the same was laid on the table.

GOVERNMENT LANDS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. JULIAN moved that the Committee on the Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of resolutions of the constitutional convention of South Carolina, approving the petition of certain citizens of South Carolina relative to certain lands belonging to the Government, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PROTESTANT UNIVERSITY.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made an adverse report on the memorial of the Protestant University of the United States, praying for a grant of land for educational purposes; and the same was laid on the table.

HEIRS OF PHILLIP RENAULT.

Mr. JULIAN moved that the Committee on the Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the papers in the case of the claim of the heirs of Phillip Renault for certain lands, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

FEMALE COLLEGES.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made an adverse report upon the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, asking grants of land to endow female colleges in the several States; and the same was laid on the table.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF NEBRASKA, ETC.

Mr. JULIAN. I hold in my hand a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in reply to a request of the Committee on the Public Lands, relative to a geological survey of Nebraska and other regions west. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

FORT JESSUP RESERVATION, LOUISIANA.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1154) declaring the lands constituting the Fort Jessup military reservation, in the State of Louisiana, subject to homestead entry and settlement; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length. It provides that the lands constituting the Fort Jessup military reservation, in the State of Louisiana, so far as the same have not been lawfully disposed of since their reservation, are hereby restored to the United States, and made subject to homestead entry and settlement, as other public lands in the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, and Arkansas, under the act of Congress, approved June 21, 1866, amendatory of the homestead law, approved May 20, 1862.

Mr. JULIAN. The military reservation mentioned in this bill is no longer needed for military purposes. The purpose of the bill is set forth in the bill itself; and I demand the previous question.

Mr. PILE. How much land is there embraced in the reservation?

Mr. JULIAN. About six miles square.

Mr. PILE. Are there any improvements on this land?

Mr. JULIAN. None of any considerable value, as I am informed. The object of the bill is simply to declare the reservation at an end, so that the southern homestead law will apply to it.

Mr. PILE. In what part of the State is this reservation? I do not remember the locality.

Mr. JULIAN. I am not aware of the precise locality, but I know it is greatly needed for homesteads, and not needed as a reservation.

Mr. PILE. Does the gentleman know the value of these lands?

Mr. JULIAN. I have no definite information as to the value of these lands, but I understand they are similar in character to other public lands in the same portion of the State which are being settled as homesteads. There can certainly be no objection to subjecting them to the ordinary land policy of the South, which is all that is proposed.

Mr. PILE. If this land is situated in a locality that makes it valuable, where the land has been all taken up for many years past, so that land there is worth, as it is in some localities, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, or thirty dollars an acre, should it not be sold to the highest bidder and the money paid into the Treasury? I think we should not pass this bill until we know the value of the lands to be thus opened to entry and settlement.

Mr. JULIAN. I have numerous letters from freedmen and poor white men in that locality, asking the enactment of this law, so that they may go upon this land, occupy it, and till it. I have no doubt as to the propriety of the measure, but my limited time will not allow any general debate.

Mr. PILE. I have certainly no objection to the passage of such a bill as this, if this land is not very much more valuable than ordinary public lands.

Mr. JULIAN. I have already stated that the land is kindred in character to the public lands in the same vicinity of the State, and needed for settlement.

Mr. PILE. I understand the gentleman to say that he knows nothing about the value of the land, does not even know the part of the State in which the reservation is located, knows nothing about the land adjacent, whether it is held by private owners or not. I wish to suggest to him that if this land is held as a military reservation, and is located in a part of the State where a military reservation would be desirable to the Government, the probability is that the land adjacent thereto has been entered, is now improved, and in a state of cultivation; that this land is not in the condition of other public lands, but is very much more valuable, and that the Government ought to receive more for it than it will receive by opening it up to homestead settlement.

Mr. JULIAN. I have told the gentleman all that I deem it material for the House to know in voting upon the bill. What I have said shows that his apprehensions have no foundation. We have adopted a general homestead law for the South, applicable to all the public lands of that region. The effect of this bill will be to subject this land to the same general land policy under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. This is what the settlers of Louisiana want.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Is this reservation now occupied?

Mr. JULIAN. It is not occupied, except small portions of it that have already been disposed of under military authority. That is my information from the War Department.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. What military authority has power to dispose of such lands?

Mr. JULIAN. I am not aware of the authority under which the land has been disposed of; but in the letter I have received from the Secretary of War on this subject it is stated that small portions have been disposed of since the reservation was made; but no objection is suggested to the measure proposed.

Mr. PILE. I hope the gentleman will allow the bill to go over till to-morrow, so that we may get some information as to what this reservation is worth. There are military reservations in the States of Missouri and Kansas, and I do not see why they should not be opened up to settlement as well as this. In my own city there is a reservation worth $500,000, and we have passed an act providing for its sale. I think we ought to have more information before we pass this bill.

Mr. JULIAN. I demand the previous question.

Mr. PILE. I hope that will not be sustained. On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 44, noes 33; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. JULIAN and Mr. BROOKS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 40.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the bill be laid on the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JULIAN. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] will withdraw his motion, I will move that the bill be recommitted. The House will evidently pass the bill, but more important business of the committee will not justify the loss of time in calling the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROSS. With that understanding I withdraw the motion.

Mr. JULIAN. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND OFFICE IN UTAH TERRITORY.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back without amendment a bill (H. R. No. 202) to create the office of surveyor general in the Territory of Utah, and establish a land office in said Territory, and extend the homestead and preemption laws over the same.

The bill, which was read, proposes, in the first section, to authorize the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint a surveyor general for the Territory of Utah, whose annual salary shall be $3,000, and whose power, authority, and duties shall be the same as those provided by law for the surveyor general of Oregon. He is to have proper allowances for clerk hire, office rent, and fuel, not exceeding what is now allowed by law to the surveyor general of Oregon.

The second section provides that the public land within said Territory of Utah, to which the Indian title is or shall be extinguished, shall constitute a new land district to be called the Utah district, and the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and receiver of public moneys for said district, who shall be required to reside at the places at which said offices shall be located, and they shall have the same powers, perform the same duties, and be entitled to the same compensation as are or may be prescribed by law in relation to land offices of the United States in other Territories.

The third section provides that the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to locate said offices of surveyor general and register and receiver of public moneys at some suitable place or places in said Territory.

And the fourth and last section provides that the preemption and homestead and other laws applicable to the disposal of the public lands, are hereby extended over said district.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, that, I believe, is precisely the bill passed by this House during the Thirty-Ninth Congress toward the close of the last session, and it simply extends the machinery of the General Land Office over the Territory of Utah. The Commissioner of the General Land Office agrees with the Committee on the Public Lands that there is no valid reason why this should not be done. The following is a communication from the Land Office:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.
GENERAL LAND OFFICE, March 20, 1868.

SIR: I had this morning the honor to receive your letter of yesterday desiring for the committee the views of this office as to the early extension of the land system to Utah. I have, therefore, to submit the following:

First. The area of Utah is 88,056 square miles, equal to 56,355,635 acres, according to the act of May 8, 1863, reducing its former limits, of which only 2,517,912 acres have been surveyed, and none disposed of as yet, leaving 53,837,723 acres unsurveyed.

Second. It now constitutes part of the surveying district of "Colorado-Utah," as ordered by the fourth section of the act of Congress, approved March 14, 1862, vide Statutes-at-Large, volume 12, page 369, which status is to continue until otherwise ordered by the President.

Third. In virtue of the act of Congress, approved September 9, 1850, United States Statutes, volume 9, page 453, section 13, reserves in the Territory, for school purposes, sections 16 and 36 in each township. The same is also provided by the second section of an act to establish the office of surveyor general of Utah, and to grant land for school and university purposes, approved February 21, 1855, Statutes-at-Large, volume 10, page 611; and furthermore, section 3 provides two townships of land for the establishment of a university in said Territory. These laws merely reserve but confer no title on the Territory, it being the policy of Congress, as shown by general legislation, to defer the investment of title for school sections until the Territory emerges from political pupillage to the position of a State of the Union. It is understood that the present population of Utah is about 100,000.

The Central Pacific railroad will pass over the country, and the work may take fifteen thousand employees in that region. The influx of such a column of operatives must be felt in the social condition of Utah, and many that may go there in the road service and by general immigration will doubtless remain.

It is the opinion of this office that our laws in respect to the disposal of the public lands should be promptly extended over that Territory and a land office established. No practical difficulty is apprehended in regard to the administration of the pre-emption, homestead, town-site, and other land laws. The principles applicable everywhere in the administration of the land system will of course apply to Utah, and the extension of that system to the Territory will, in the opinion of the undersigned, result in local and national benefit.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH S. WILSON,
Commissioner.

HON. GEORGE W. JULIAN, Chairman Committee on Public Lands, House of Representatives.

I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHEROKEE AND OSAGE LANDS.

Mr. JULIAN, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 286) relative to the lands of the Cherokee and Great and Little Osage Indians; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that the President of the United States shall be directed to withhold the issuing of patents to the purchasers of land heretofore sold, or which may hereafter be sold, under and by virtue of the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Indians concluded on the 19th of July, 1866, and the treaty between the United States and the Great and Little Osage Indians, concluded on the 29th of September, 1865, or under any Indian treaty which may hereafter be concluded until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman for a few minutes.

Mr. JULIAN. I will yield to the gentleman presently.

Mr. Speaker, the Indian tribes of the United States have no power over their lands except the power of cession to the United States. This House so voted on yesterday. They have the right of occupancy merely, the title being in the United States; and up to the year 1860 the practice of the Government was in conformity to the principle which I state. Since that time our Indian treaties have so revolutionized the practice of the Government as to threaten the entire land policy of the Government. For example: in the year 1866 a treaty was made with the Cherokee Indians by which eight hundred thousand acres were authorized to be transferred in a body to a single purchaser at the rate of one dollar per acre, completely withdrawing that portion of what else would have been a part of the public domain from the control of Congress, which has the rightful constitutional power to make needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States. Another treaty, concluded in the year 1865 with the Great and Little Osage Indians, authorizes the disposition, in a peculiar way, of over three million acres. Similar treaties have been made with the Sacs and Foxes, the Delaware, the Kickapoo, and other Indian tribes since the date I have mentioned; and we have the news this morning of the conclusion of another treaty with the Great and Little Osage Indians, by which the remnant of their lands, being eight million acres, are transferred to the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company; the treaty itself, as I am reliably informed, having been fixed up here in Washington last summer by the attorney of Mr. Sturgis, the president of said railroad company, with a view to private and in utter disregard of the public interest. This treaty, should it be ratified by the Senate, will be a complete defiance of the control and jurisdiction of Congress, and commit to the tender mercies of a railroad company this large body of lands.

Mr. Speaker, it is for Congress, and not the treaty-making power, to say whether we will grant lands to aid in building railroads, and how the public domain shall be managed. By the treaty to which I refer two new reservations, still further West, are set apart for our Indian tribes, containing over seventy-three million acres; and if we are to judge the future by the past, in a few years the whole of these lands will be swallowed up by railroad corporations and the Indians driven on to other lands. If this business is to go on in the wretched manner we have been pursuing we might as well abolish the General Land Office or remove it to the Indian Bureau at once and dispense with our land committees. Sir, it is not legally competent—and when I say this I have the concurrence of every lawyer in this House with whom I have conferred—it is not competent by treaty with any Indian tribes to take the disposition of the public domain out of the control of Congress. An Indian treaty cannot repeal the laws of Congress, but must itself conform to those laws.

And as a note of warning to the Senate and to these railroad corporations, whose "Indian ring" threatens to rival the "whisky ring," I have reported from the Committee on the Public Lands the resolution that has been read by the Clerk. Should it become a law, we shall be compelled to return to the old policy by which the Indians will cede their lands directly to the United States, which they are competent to do for a consideration they may agree to accept. Their lands thus ceded will thus fall under the operation of our preemption and homestead laws, and be disposed of as other public lands of the Government. This, Mr. Speaker, is the reason why the committee have reported this resolution, on the passage of which I now demand the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I want to offer an amendment striking out all that relates to the treaty between the Cherokee Indians and the United States; and I desire to state the reason why I offer it.

Mr. JULIAN. How much time?

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope not more than five minutes.

Mr. JULIAN. I will give the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. MAYNARD. The amendment I offer is to strike out of the resolution that which relates to the treaty between the Cherokees and the United States.

Mr. JULIAN. I cannot allow the amendment to be offered. I yield, however, five minutes to allow the gentleman to state his views.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to correct what seems to be an erroneous impression of the House in regard to these lands. By the treaty of 1835, which I have before me, these lands were ceded to the Cherokees by patent in fee-simple. The article of the treaty is in these words:

"Whereas it is apprehended by the Cherokees that in the above cession there is not contained a sufficient quantity of land for the accommodation of the whole nation on their removal west of the Mississippi, the United States, in consideration of the sum of $500,000, therefore hereby covenant and agree to convey to the said Indians and their descendants by patent, in fee-simple, the following tract of land."

That was ratified by an act of Congress which is here before me. Now, this is the very tract of land embraced in this resolution.

Mr. JULIAN. I understand that perfectly well. If the gentleman had listened to the debate here the other day he would have seen that this resolution does not affect the gentleman's position in any way.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman understood this fact and the other supplemental facts he would not feel justified in offering such a resolution as this to the House and ask its passage. If these lands do not belong to the United States, and if the United States can sell and convey anything for a pecuniary consideration to an Indian, if an Indian has "any rights which a white man is bound to respect," we are bound to respect the title to that tract of land. The treaty of 1866 that is spoken of here is one by which the Indians sell back to the United States this tract. They give back the title in trust to be sold to the United States, and they stipulate for a payment for the land, and our action is going to deprive the Indians of the benefit of that treaty. In other words, it is going to take away their lands and give them nothing for it. I would like to have read a portion of a communication, not from speculators, but from the principal chief of that tribe and a number of delegates from the tribe who are here. I think they state their own case with a degree of intelligence that ought to commend it to the attention of the House.

Mr. JULIAN. I have only yielded five minutes.

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana if there is any request from the Cherokee nation, either from its Legislature or from a solitary individual, for the passage of anything of this kind? Has there been presented to the committee anything from the Indian nation on this subject in any form?

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, I have not conversed with any representative of the Cherokee nation on this subject. It was neither material nor necessary that I should. The gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Missouri both seem to misunderstand my position. I agree that by patent this land was conveyed to the Cherokee Indians. I recognize the sacredness of their right thereto. Nobody here controverts it. What I say is that when they see fit to cede their land to the United States they must do so for a consideration agreed upon, and cannot make any conditions of cession that shall deprive Congress of the right thenceforward to dispose of and manage the land thus ceded. The Cherokees have no right to deed their lands to England or France, but only to us, and without any conditions as to what we shall do with them. That is my position. The Indians are mere occupants of the soil, without title, and we are their guardians, and a treaty between these minor children of the nation and the treaty-making power in contravention of the authority of Congress over the public domain, and subversive of our laws, is a spurious treaty, a political abortion, a thing unknown to the Constitution, and unworthy of our respect. That is what I assert; and the effect of passing this joint resolution will be to make such treaties void, to restore to our Indian tribes their valid title to their lands until such time as valid treaties can be made.

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield long enough to have the letter read? It is a communication addressed to the Speaker of the House by the principal chiefs and delegates of the Cherokee nation now in Washington; not minor children, but many of them the intellectual peers of any gentleman upon this floor.

Mr. JULIAN. I suppose the amount of it is that the Cherokee Indians are said to desire the ratification of this treaty.

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri. It explains the whole matter of the title to these lands.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask the gentleman if there is or can be anything in that letter to affect my position that these Indians have no power to dictate our land policy by treaty?

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri. It will enlighten the House on the merits of this question.

Mr. JULIAN. Under the unfortunate limitation of the morning hour the Committee on the Public Lands will never get through their pressing and important business if documents of that kind are to be read.

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri. Then I ask the House not to second the previous question on this resolution. Here is a communication addressed by the authorities of the Cherokee nation to the House, explaining this whole matter from beginning to end, and I undertake to say that if any member will read it it will satisfy them upon this question. Now, I deny that the Cherokee Indians or any person in their interest has asked this, and they are, many of them, educated, and the equals of the gentleman from Indiana and myself in the management of their own business. I will state further that this matter has come up within a very few days upon the representations of outside parties, who have proposed to me that the opposition shall be withdrawn if they are paid a certain sum of money.

I do not suppose that the party to whom I refer has approached the committee in the way he has me, or this resolution would not have been reported; but I ask the House to pass over this matter until all the facts can be laid before them, and I pledge myself to lay the facts before them fully, so as to satisfy them on this question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw that part of the resolution which relates to the Cherokee Indians, as I am satisfied it does injustice to those Indians.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I hope the joint resolution will pass, and I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not withdraw that part of it which relates to the Cherokee neutral lands.

Now, as I understand this question—I do not know that I understand it correctly—a treaty was made authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of these lands, and one clause of it authorized the Secretary to dispose of them in one body, if he saw fit, for one dollar an acre. The lands were so disposed of by Mr. HARLAN, but not in accordance with the terms of the treaty, he giving a long credit for the payment of the entire sum, with the exception of a very small amount. There was a disturbance created about it, and Mr. Browning rescinded that contract and made a new contract with an individual, Mr. James F. Joy, for the transfer of this entire body of land, the former contract having been made with a pretended emigrant company. Mr. James F. Joy, perhaps not having $800,000 on hand, and finding he can make a good thing of it by entering into a compromise with this emigrant company, agrees to have his contract rescinded and come in under the contract with the emigrant company by which he receives the eight hundred thousand acres, and has a long time for payment, and at a very low rate of interest.

The proposition, therefore, is simply whether James F. Joy shall have this land, some eight hundred thousand acres, for the sum of one dollar per acre, on very long time and a very low rate of interest, or whether the Government shall buy these lands for that amount.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri. I desire to state that under this treaty of sale settlers are protected in their rights. Each settler upon the land prior to the ratification of the treaty will be allowed one hundred and sixty acres of land at the appraised value.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Why not let the Government buy this land?

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri. The Indians have been trying for thirty years to sell this land to the Government, and the Government would not buy it.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. JULIAN. Very well.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. It seems to me that the question involved in the bill now before the House is one of vastly more importance than gentlemen are aware of. I think I can state the matter in a very few words, so that it can be understood. Prior to the 19th of July, 1866, the Cherokee Indians owned a tract of land in Kansas known as the "Cherokee neutral lands," the title to which they held under a patent from the United States. I make no question now about the validity of the title. By a treaty entered into on the 19th of July, 1866, the Cherokee Indians ceded these lands to the United States in trust to be sold and the proceeds to be paid over to the Indians.

The seventeenth article of that treaty is as follows:

"ART. XVII. The Cherokee nation hereby cedes, in trust to the United States, the tract of land in the State of Kansas which was sold to the Cherokees by the United States, under the provisions of the second article of the treaty of 1835; and also that strip of the land ceded to the nation by the fourth article of said treaty which is included in the State of Kansas, and the Cherokees consent that said lands may be included in the limits and jurisdiction of the said State.

"The lands herein ceded shall be surveyed as the public lands of the United States are surveyed, under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and shall be appraised by two disinterested persons, one to be designated by the Cherokee national council and one by the Secretary of the Interior, and, in case of disagreement, by a third person, to be mutually selected by the aforesaid appraisers; the appraisement to be not less than an average of $1 25 per acre, exclusive of improvements.

"And the Secretary of the Interior shall, from time to time, as such surveys and appraisements are approved by him, after due advertisements for sealed bids, sell such lands to the highest bidders for cash in parcels not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres and at not less than the appraised value: Provided, That whenever there are improvements of the value of fifty dollars made on the lands not being mineral, and owned and personally occupied by any person for agricultural purposes at the date of the signing hereof, such person so owning, and in person residing on such improvements, shall, after due proof, made under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, be entitled to buy, at the appraised value, the smallest quantity of land in legal subdivisions which will include his improvements, not exceeding in the aggregate one hundred and sixty acres, the expenses of survey and appraisement to be paid by the Secretary out of the proceeds of sale of said land: Provided, That nothing in this article shall prevent the Secretary of the Interior from selling the whole of said neutral lands in a body to any responsible party, for cash, for a sum not less than $800,000."

Under this provision of the treaty the Secretary of the Interior undertook to sell these lands. The objection which I now make is not to the title of the Indians to these lands, but it is that the treaty-making power cannot execute such a trust imposed upon the Government or any officer thereof, in any form, without the aid of an act of Congress. Sir, if the Indians who occupy the Territories and reservations can by treaty convey their lands to the Government of the United States in trust, to be sold for their benefit as in this case, without the intervention of an act of Congress, then almost the entire public lands of this country can, and I fear will be, disposed of in this way, and the public domain will be given up to monopolies and speculators, and the whole homestead and land policy of the Government be subverted. I deny that any such thing can be done.

In the remarks I have made on several occasions during the present session of Congress, I have referred to authorities without quoting them at large, giving construction to the treaty-making power of this nation. To these I may now add another. Attorney General Cushing, in an opinion found in volume 6, pages 440, 441 of the "Opinions of the Attorneys General," decided in substance that where a treaty is executory, requiring the action of the legislative branch of the Government in appropriating money, the act of Congress making the appropriation, and not the treaty, must govern the executive officers of the Government. In other words, the treaty-making power has limits, and when it attempts to go beyond this it is subject to the control of the law-making power. Whatever under the Constitution may be properly subject to the control of an act of Congress cannot be claimed as falling within a rightful exercise of the treaty-making power. This Government cannot, under cover of the treaty-making power, execute a trust for the sale of lands. The officers who are to execute such trust owe their existence to an act of Congress which may be repealed at pleasure, and thus leave no officer to execute it. A patent cannot be issued in execution of such trust without the authority of an act of Congress. The Government holds the legal title to the trust lands, and under the Constitution Congress alone can—"Make rules and regulations for the disposition of the public lands," whether held in trust or otherwise. I will not now stop to inquire into the power to accept or execute such trusts or the expediency of assuming its exercise. Nor will I now inquire how far the Indian chiefs, who executed the treaty of July 19, 1866, could convey in trust a title held by the Cherokee tribe or nation of Indians. But assuming that the Indian chiefs had power to convey the lands of their tribe or nation, and that a treaty is a proper mode of making the conveyance, yet it does not follow that either a duty or a power is thereby devolved on the officers of this Government to execute the trust by making sales. The treaty to which I have referred attempts to clothe the Secretary of the Interior with the power, and to require of him the performance of the duty. But whence are his powers derived and how are his duties defined? By acts of Congress, no one of which has authorized him to execute trusts like this on behalf of Indian tribes. Who is authorized to receive and pay out the money, and by what authority? What is the liability in case of a misapplication of moneys? Who shall determine the mode of its distribution? The whole scheme rests on no valid authority whatever. To assert that the treaty-making power is competent to execute such a trust, is to assert that it can create the officers necessary to accomplish the end, if they do not, as they may not, exist in pursuance of an act of Congress. But by the Constitution all offices not therein provided for must be created by a law of Congress. Such officers can only exist "in pursuance of a law" of Congress.

In the brief space of time allotted to me I cannot discuss this question fully, but I have said enough to show that this trust cannot be executed without the aid of an act of Congress. I have shown that the treaty-making power has attempted to encroach on the rights of the law-making power. It is subverting the prerogatives and powers of Congress, and its encroachments are all the more alarming because it is attempting to subvert the homestead and land policy enacted in solemn laws by Congress. It is encroaching on the rights of labor and of the people by creating huge monopolies of lands which ought to be dedicated to the sacred purpose of making homes for the homeless and landless poor.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VAN HORN] in all that he has said in commendation of the chiefs or agents of the Cherokee Indians. I know some of them personally as intelligent and worthy gentlemen. The Cherokees have just ground of complaint against our Government. And for one, I would do them justice. Let the Government buy their lands at once, pay for them $800,000 in money or bonds or other lands, as may be agreed, and then put them into market to actual settlers at the minimum price of $1 25 an acre until the Government is reimbursed for its expenditures, and then open up the residue of the lands to homestead entries. This will bring railroads, with thriving villages and independent farmers, and Kansas will rejoice in the wisdom of the policy which will secure these results.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] a question.

Mr. JULIAN. Very well.

Mr. MAYNARD. These lands have been conveyed by patent in fee simple to the Cherokee tribe of Indians, a civilized people, a community recognized as such, by virtue of what authority do we assume any control over these lands after the date of that conveyance? Was there any condition, express or implied, attached to the grant by the United States to these Indians?

Mr. JULIAN. In answer to the gentleman I will say that I do not pretend that we have any control at all over these lands; the Cherokees were the absolute owners under their patent. But what I say is, that when they undertake to dispose of these lands by treaty, they have no power thereby to repeal the land laws of Congress, or to take away our jurisdiction over the lands ceded as a part of the public domain. A treaty cannot repeal a law of Congress.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman certainly does not call these lands a part of the public domain, any more than a lot here in the city of Washington which the United States may become possessed of in payment of a debt.

Mr. JULIAN. It is very remarkable, if these Indians, having the title to these lands by patent, conveyed them to us, and yet they do not belong to us. As I have repeatedly stated, they had no power other than to cede these lands to the United States. The gentleman himself, in defending this treaty, necessarily asserts title in the United States; and what I ask is, that henceforward our Indian tribes shall content themselves with the simple power of cession.

Their power by treaty is exhausted by the cession, and it is not competent for them to annex any conditions subversive of the land policy of the United States.

I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri, moved that the bill be laid on the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was declared not agreed to.

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The bill was passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

YOSEMITE VALLEY, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, back, without amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 118) to confirm to J. M. Hutchings and J. C. Lamon their preemption claims in the Yosemite valley, in the State of California.

The bill, which was read, recites in the preamble that the Government of the United States did by act of Congress approved June 80, 1864, cede to the State of California the "cleft" or "gorge" known as the "Yosemite valley," in Mariposa county, California; that long prior to the cession J. M. Hutchings and J. C. Lamon had in good faith settled in that valley, with the intention of claiming one hundred and sixty acres each of the public domain under the preemption laws of the United States, as soon as the lands should be subject to entry, they being the only settlers therein; that Hutchings and Lamon have resided on and been in possession of the lands thus claimed by them, and have made permanent and substantial improvements thereon to the great convenience and comfort of visitors to the valley, without which it would be a remote and solitary wilderness; that Hutchings and Lamon would unquestionably have been entitled to their preemption claims in the valley had the land remained public domain, and the State having succeeded to the rights of the Federal Government by gift in that valley cannot afford to be less generous; that it would be improper for the State to erect and keep hotels or other stopping places in that valley, and a ten years' lease, as contemplated in the act of cession, is wholly inadequate to induce private capital to do so; and that in view of the premises, and as an act of simple justice to Hutchings and Lamon, the Legislature of the State of California did, by an act which became a law February 20, 1868, grant to the parties aforesaid the same land they would have been entitled to under the general preemption laws, to wit, one hundred and sixty acres each; which act was to take effect and be in force from and after its ratification by the Congress of the United States.

The bill, therefore, proposes to provide that the act of the Legislature of California, which became a law on the 20th day of February, 1868, be fully ratified and confirmed.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, if the House will give me a few moment's attention, I can state the reasons which have induced the committee to report in favor of the passage of this bill; and when these have been explained, I think there will be no objections to the bill from any quarter.

In the year 1864 Congress granted to the State of California the valley mentioned in the bill, it being a "cleft" or "gorge" in the Sierra Nevada mountains in Mariposa county, California. The valley is ten miles long and three miles wide, and is walled in by precipitous mountains of granite rock from two to four thousand feet in height, and over these walls, which are generally perpendicular, the waters of the Merced river fall into the valley below, forming the most beautiful and magnificent cascades in the known world. The singular and marvelous beauty of the place induced Congress, at the instance of the California delegation, to grant it to the State by an act making it "inalienable forever" by the State, and excepting it from the policy of preemption or sale.

It turned out, however, after the passage of that law by Congress, that the two gentlemen named in the bill, J. M. Hutchings and J. C. Lamon, had years before settled in the valley under the preemption laws of the United States, had built their cabins, planted their orchards and vineyards, and expended several thousand dollars in establishing for themselves a comfortable home, while encountering for years all the privations and hardships incident to a life remote from society and civilization.

These facts, when they became known, did not prevent the commissioners appointed by the Governor of California, in pursuance of the law of Congress, from proceeding to bring an ejectment against these preceptors. They appealed for relief to the Legislature of California at its late session, and that Legislature in last February passed an act providing that the preemption claims of these two gentlemen, to the extent of one hundred and sixty acres each, should be protected under the grant made by Congress, subject to the ratification of Congress.

The bill was passed by an overwhelming majority, the Governor (Haight) vetoed it, upon which the Legislature, by a very decisive majority, passed it over the veto of the Governor, though popular as an executive, thus emphasizing the desire of California that these preceptors should be protected. But even if the Legislature had not passed this bill Congress should grant the relief asked, and had no right to divest the vested rights of these settlers; and I am sure that Congress would not have done it if the facts had been known at the time. The bill I now report simply provides that the act of the California Legislature shall be, and is hereby, ratified by Congress. That is the whole of it, and there never was a case of clearer equity presented.

Mr. UPSON. What was the reason given by the Governor of California for vetoing it?

Mr. JULIAN. I will state to the gentleman that the Governor in his veto alleged it was not competent for the Legislature of California to grant relief since Congress had made the grant, and made it inalienable; but the answer is that the Legislature never proposed to act without consulting Congress. They referred their action to Congress for ratification.

Mr. UPSON. One other question: I understand the chairman to say that Congress never would have made the original grant if they were aware of the condition of things there. Was it not referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and did not that committee report it to this House?

Mr. JULIAN. It was reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, and I was on the committee; but I am sure it was never dreamed that any one was in the occupancy of that land as a preceptor. If it had been the committee would not have interfered with his rights under the laws of Congress.

Mr. HIGBY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether, when that transfer was made, a patent was given for that tract of country? What is the evidence of title in California? Is it the act of Congress, or was a patent issued at the Department?

Mr. JULIAN. No patent, I think, was issued. There is nothing but the act of Congress.

Mr. HIGBY. I wish to ask the gentleman if the Committee on the Public Lands have such facts before them as to authorize the statement made in the preamble to this bill? I have not. I have not made any investigation of it. I wish to know whether the committee is fully satisfied on that matter.

Mr. JULIAN. I will answer that we had proof to support the facts recited in that preamble. We have sworn affidavits of settlers of Mariposa county who are cognizant of all the facts. The testimony is strong. I believe there is no dispute about the facts.

Mr. HIGBY. Have the committee become satisfied these parties have vested rights?

Mr. JULIAN. The committee, of course, thought they had vested rights by settlement, under the laws of Congress, in good faith and by making the required improvements—vested rights which even an act of Congress could not rightfully divest.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Has there been any remonstrance against this act of Congress?

Mr. JULIAN. There is a remonstrance from the commissioners appointed by the Governor of California to take charge of this property under the law of Congress. We have carefully examined it, but it shows nothing to invalidate our conclusion.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. JULIAN. I will after the previous question is seconded.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. JULIAN. I now yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I would not seek the floor to say anything at all, but for the fact that when this question was first mooted in California I announced myself as against it. By many letters I have written since I am aware I have led the public men with whom I have corresponded to believe that I would be opposed to the passage of this bill. But, sir, on investigation of the question I find there is no authority in Congress to deprive these men of their rights as settlers; and I think it a hardship and wrong upon them to compel them to fight the whole power of the State of California to protect themselves in their rights against an act unconstitutionally passed by the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

The preemption laws of 1841 open up the whole public domain to actual settlers, and under that law these gentlemen took possession of this claim. That act declares that they shall be the owners, or that they shall have vested equitable rights. Before that time those who settled on the public lands were considered trespassers. But since the act of 1841 the Supreme Court of the United States has established a new rule. In 1862 Congress passed a law inviting settlers on all the public lands of the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed; and provided, further, that if they settled on the unsurveyed lands, when the lands came to be surveyed the proprietors should enter according to their original claims without regard to the public surveys. These gentlemen perfected their claims under both of those acts. Now, I hold in my hand a list of authorities, decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, construing these acts in which they hold in all cases—because they all bear exactly on the subject—that these gentlemen have acquired such rights that no act of Congress can defeat. We cannot by act of Congress take the land of these settlers and appropriate it for another purpose.

Now, this act of cession to California does take that land away from these gentlemen and appropriates it for another purpose. That is it makes a grant of land to the State of California for the purpose of pleasure grounds. That act is unconstitutional so far as the right of these gentlemen are concerned; and so far as the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are concerned, since 1841, there has not been a single decision holding a contrary doctrine.

In the case of the United States vs. Fitzgerald, 15 Peters, the court decides squarely that no reservation or appropriation of the public land can be made after a citizen has preëmpted it or located it as a homestead. If this decision is a true exposition of the constitutional rights of settlers, then it directs itself directly to the merits of this preëmption claim, and shows clearly that any attempt to divest the owners of their claim is an attempt to destroy the constitutional rights of American citizens. Then, again, in the case of Lyle vs. The State of Arkansas, 9 Howard, the court holds that when the settler has acts according to law in his settlement his claim becomes a legal vested right, subject to be defeated only by a failure to perform the conditions annexed to the taking—that is, the preëmption laws.

Then, again, in Delsus vs. The United States, 9 Peters, Chief Justice Marshall holds that the settler's claim is not a vague and inchoate uncertain equitable right, but, upon the contrary, that it is property belonging to the settler, and that it cannot be taken away by the Government of the United States. I could cite any number of authorities to sustain me in the proposition that I have been compelled to take in this case, but I see it is unnecessary. If the Government of the United States, having control, and for the purpose of control alone, claiming to be the owner of the public lands, shall pass laws for the taking of such lands by its citizens, and in addition offer inducements to those who are hardy and enterprising enough to advance ahead into the unbroken wilderness and blaze out a way for civilization to follow, shall, after the citizen has gone in advance, and borne the hardships of opening up a new home, then assume to have power to take it away and give it to another, that Government is not a Government of law, of justice, or of right between man and man; but is a plundering despotism, robbing its own citizens. These gentlemen obtained vested rights upon the public lands of the United States, and such vested rights are just as sacred as any other vested rights, and cannot be destroyed, says the Supreme Court of the United States, by any power in the Federal Government. The Constitution and the laws are for the protection of citizens, and not for the creation of fancy pleasure grounds by Congress out of citizen's farms. If the Constitution and laws do not afford the settler protection against Congress as well as everybody else, then God help the settler, for he is lost indeed, having nowhere to turn.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that that body had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 658) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1869, and for other purposes.

DEATH OF EX-PRESIDENT BUCHANAN.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask consent to offer the resolution which was objected to in the earlier part of the day.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I object.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I move to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] was laid on the table. If that be done it will bring up that resolution before the House, and this can then be moved as a substitute.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. WOOD. I will remark that I believe the funeral is to be to-morrow, so that, practically, the resolution cannot be carried out.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

On laying the motion to reconsider on the table, there were—ayes 12, noes 75; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. VAN WYCK and RANDALL.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 16, noes 80.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on laying the resolution of Mr. WOODWARD on the table; and it was disagreed to.

The resolution of Mr. WOODWARD was then before the House.

Mr. BLAINE. I now move to amend by offering the following as a substitute; and I demand the previous question thereon:

The House of Representatives having received intelligence of the death of James Buchanan, ex-President of the United States, at his country seat at Wheatland, on the 1st instant, does hereby resolve, that as a mark of respect to one who has held such eminent public station, the Speaker of the House is requested to appoint a committee of seven members to attend the funeral of Mr. Buchanan on behalf of the House, and to communicate a copy of this resolution to the relatives of the deceased.

Mr. ARNELL. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order, the substitute having been offered since the last motion was made to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken; and the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being first upon agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. VAN WYCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The substitute was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. VAN WYCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 77, noes 10; no quorum voting.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOLMAN, and CLARKE of Kansas, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 16.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following as the committee under the resolution: ADAM J. GLOSSBRENNER of Pennsylvania, SAMUEL S. MARSHALL of Illinois, JAMES G. BLAINE of Maine, FRANCIS THOMAS of Maryland, AUSTIN BLAIR of Michigan, CHARLES A. ELDRIDGE of Wisconsin, and LAWRENCE S. TRIMBLE of Kentucky.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg leave to say that my engagements will not at all allow me to attend, and I therefore beg to decline.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint Mr. HENRY L. DAWES, of Massachusetts, in place of the gentleman from Maine.

RECESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock to meet in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill.

Mr. ALLISON. It will be competent to transact business to-night?

The SPEAKER. It will be when the House comes out of Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHENCK's motion, and it was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

At half past seven o'clock the House reassembled in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is probably one of the most important that has been presented to this Congress. Among the many measures which this Congress has had thus far under consideration, I think I am right in stating that this may be considered the gravest, and so far as it affects the whole people of the country, the most important. The operations of Government are only appreciated as they are personally felt. What transpires in this Capitol, so far as it affects the public policy, may be of great influence, yet to the people it may not be appreciated because not felt at the time. The body of the people do not appreciate the force and power of official action until it affects individual affairs, until they are affected in their rights, their property, or their persons. Then they know what Government means. Then they feel the penalties of living in communities under laws to be sustained and supported for the general good.

Hence it is that I say that a measure like this, which may be said to be an entire new system of taxation, a bill in its provisions comprehending the whole scheme of inland revenue, is the most important of any yet proposed in Congress. It reaches every person in the Union (for none can escape) not only in his pocket, but in his individual rights.

I presume that while we are engaged in Committee of the Whole on the details of the bill an opportunity will be afforded to refer more particularly to the several sections and items, and an opportunity given to amend them. This may not be the proper occasion to refer to details. As a whole it is a codification, so to speak, or a consolidation of all the revenue bills that have heretofore been adopted; and additions made so that the proposition now before the House is substantially an entirely new system of taxation. All that is really good in it is old, and all that is new is bad.

There is one feature especially objectionable; a principle which, in my judgment, is clearly and palpably a violation of the Constitution of the United States, and which cannot be sustained upon the ground of public good or of public necessity, and which, in my judgment, will fail to accomplish the ostensible object for which it is incorporated into the bill.

I refer to the provision which proposes to make the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the sole autocrat, the entire power that is to carry out and practically enforce and execute this revenue system. I shall refer more specifically to the grounds of my objection to this provision hereafter.

Now, in order to a proper understanding and discussion of this subject, it is entirely germane to refer to the necessity of raising the amount of revenue which it is proposed to raise by this bill. It is entirely germane to the question to refer to the condition of our public finances, of the public debt, the amount of interest on that debt, and the mode of getting rid of the debt itself. Every question pertaining to the public finances of the country, or, indeed, to the currency, may appropriately and properly be discussed upon this occasion, and upon a measure of this character.

And permit me to say that I have been surprised at the multitude of propositions made in both Houses of Congress with reference to the fiscal affairs of the country. I have been surprised at the apparently unthoughtful and crude manner in which almost every man, both here and elsewhere, has attempted to propose a remedy for our financial embarrassment. It seems to me that almost every man has his own financial policy. Although the question requires more thought, more practical information, indeed more study of the great principles which underlie governmental policy in this country as well as elsewhere, than any other question, yet every tyro appears to suppose he has been able to master it. We have been inundated with pamphlets; we have all had various suggestions made to us. Some men have proposed that we should very materially increase the volume of currency, while others have contended that we have already a great deal too much. Some men propose that we should consolidate the public debt. Others say no; the debt better remain as it is; and not be consolidated. And for every part and parcel of these questions pertaining to the public finances and currency of the country we have had continually propositions made of every kind and character whatsoever.

If there is anything more inauspicious for the future as to our public credit and currency, it is the haste with which views are adopted by leading men, and the many financial schemes that are constantly thrust upon us. I know no public questions so difficult to understand, and upon which intelligent and experienced men more widely differ, and certainly there are none so vitally connected with the welfare of the nation and the well being of every class and every interest of the people. Therefore, a subject involving such important consequences should be approached with a gravity and discussed with a care and thoughtfulness corresponding with its magnitude. Nor should the slightest partisan influence be allowed to taint it. The public finances and the settlement of the great questions affecting the medium furnished by Government as a currency should be excluded from such conflicts. The American people will of course always be divided into parties, and parties will of course be conducted by those who have no higher thought than success, and violence, fraud, and "all kinds of uncharitableness," will, as usual, enter more or less into the practice of the contestants. Their struggles produce excitement, and excitement destroys statemanship; when the former enters the latter disappears.

Now, as this is the only great question undetermined which down to the present moment has been kept aloof from party conflicts and let it so remain—let us agree to keep it out and away from other political arena—let us tolerate the largest differences of opinion upon it and avoid lugging it into either platforms or the position of candidates for the Presidency or Congress. Let us look upon it as a hallowed question, not only too sacred to be prostituted, but too high to be approached lightly.

I congratulate the House and the country that thus far these great interests have not been made partisan; that we have thus far permitted one Department of the Government, so to speak, to remain outside of mere political or mere party contests; and I hope it may ever be so. I never want to see any question affecting the public debt, the public honor, and the public credit, brought into the dirty pools of party warfare. Woe betide the time that this should occur in this country!

The public debt, for the first time in the history of this country, or in the history of any country, forms the basis upon which rests all individual property of every kind and character. The property of every banking institution, every incorporation, every railroad company, every savings bank, every capitalist, has its security in the credit of the Government as the basis upon which to rest; and when you make that basis an element in partisan warfare, an issue between great contending parties, you will undermine the foundations upon which our social system and the public and private good altogether will of necessity rely. Here popular government rests upon the public sentiment for the time being, whatever that sentiment may be, surging backward and forward, quicker and in wider extremes than any other people in the world; and the resting of our currency, our public credit, upon that ever-changing sentiment is what I hope never to witness in my day. Let us have something exempt from party influence. Let us have something permanent; not to be determined by public opinion, whether that opinion be right or wrong. Therefore it is, I say, I have regretted to find some men—and when I say this I speak of it in my own party as well as in the Republican party—I have regretted to find any leading statesman attempting to make questions of currency or the redemption of public bonds, questions to be thrust into the popular arena of party determination.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to submit any proposition myself. I am very free to say that although a practical man, and somewhat acquainted practically and personally with these great questions, still I have a very great distrust of my own capacity to meet a question of such magnitude.

Pitt, in his day, handled the great problem of the finances of England, and did it successfully, by the creation of an entirely radical measure, which at that time was successful; and in our country we had Hamilton, whose giant intellect grasped the question of national finances, and created out of chaos a system which has been successful in its sphere, so far as it has been in operation, from that day to this. Therefore I do not propose on this occasion to present any views with reference either to the increase or the decrease of the currency, or with reference to any proposition pertaining to the public debt.

It is not my purpose to enter this great field of financial speculation. I have no intention of attempting competition with those whose ingenuity has devised schemes for the amelioration of the financial condition of the Government. Although I have bestowed much thought and many years of practical investigation to these subjects, I confess my inability to do more under the general mode of providing a remedy, than to offer palliatives and temporary expedients to bridge over present and impending further difficulties. And permit me to add that this is about all that any one else attempts. It appears to me that while all admit the existence of the disease, none attempt a radical cure. Its diagnosis may be understood without seeing the cure, but does not lie in partial restoratives or artificial palliatives. We have a positive debt, part funded and part floating, but whether funding or floating, it is, nevertheless, a debt, and no changing its character, and no extension of credit can possibly make it the less a debt. It may be decreased slightly by increased taxation, though it is now, under existing laws, steadily increasing. On the 1st of December last it was nearly ten million larger than it was a month before; on the 1st of January it was nearly seven million larger than in December; and it is likely to be about fifteen million larger on the 1st of July, or the end of this fiscal year, showing an increase in six months of about thirty-two million dollars.

But take the debt at its minimum, and it may be put in round numbers at say $2,500,000,000. This immense sum stands, then, fixed and immovable as a mortgage not only on the entire present property of the nation, individually and collectively, but on the industry of generations to come after us. Nor is this the worst. In addition we have, as part of this liability, a depreciated paper currency apparently more difficult to get rid of, and more demoralizing in its effects, than this great debt itself. These together have naturally created internal taxation, and as a necessary consequence of this system causes frightful moral disorders, affecting the integrity of those who are tempted to seek its evasion and the officials who are created to execute it. And yet a further difficulty arises.

In every direction we hear of stagnant trade, of commercial and manufacturing paralysis, and of the growing inability of the people to meet the necessary accruing wants of the Government; a deranged currency, a dearth of production, a suspension of the industrial energies, and increase of the public debt requiring increased taxation. As a people we are financially embarrassed, and as a nation groaning under a debt which we can neither avoid nor liquidate.

And how do statesmen propose to remedy these difficulties. What is the substance of the several recommendations made by the Secretary of the Treasury and the other financiers of the times? However differing in form, and however meritorious in their design, they all prescribe the same cures, which are simply comprised in the two methods of taxation or borrowing. The ingenuity and learning of these doctors are directed to these considerations and none other. They do not appear to think or to know that this vast country affords any other resources to keep the Government credit good; and to devise ingenious schemes by which increased revenues from taxation can be procured comprehending the whole scope of their financial genius. In my opinion they fall very far short of a just appreciation of the subject. In their expansion efforts they have lost sight of the first and most simple duty of finances. While looking about for succor they have overlooked that which is nearer at hand at home. In devising ingenious schemes for changing the character of the public debt, and in making the bitter pill of taxation less odious and oppressive, they have shut their eyes to another mode of relief which requires neither borrowing nor taxation; and that is in the practical and immediate conversion of resources belonging to the Government into the public funds for public uses. Aside from the vast property purchased at enormous prices during the war, which at this time is not required, and therefore can be sold, there are other sources from which a thousand times greater revenue can be derived, which are open to immediate acquisition. I refer to the boundless supply of the precious metals, now lying in that region on the Pacific which we purchased of Mexico in 1847. It is indisputably ours. We bought and paid for it. We acquired it by purchase and conquest. It is as much the property of the nation as the ground upon which this Capitol stands.

What would be said of a merchant who, largely in debt, would persist in sustaining his credit by borrowing, and in forcing contributions from his friends, though at the time having in his own right large resources he made no effort to make them available? Suppose he had on deposit in bank or locked up in his safe securities or other papers which, by a little effort, could be converted into money and be used in liquidation of his liabilities? Would not everybody expect him to do so? Would not he be deemed an idiot if he failed to do so, and would he not sooner or later become bankrupt if he did not? And this is the position of this Government. We are overwhelmed with debt and the people heavily burdened with taxes, and yet no attempt is made to avail ourselves of the immense mineral resources of incalculable wealth which belong to us, and which can, by a little effort, soon be converted into coin. If what has been done by individual exertion so feebly and imperfectly has produced within a few years twelve or fifteen hundred million dollars, what could not the Government do with improved and largely increased facilities? It is no exaggerated estimate to say that after one year of preparation $100,000,000 could be procured, and that this would be trebled in two more years, and that at the expiration of five years this would be yet further increased?

As product increased the necessity for saving revenue from other sources would decrease, and it is reasonable to suppose that at the end of ten years the public debt would be paid, specie payments be resumed, and taxation, except for the necessary contingent expenses of the Government, be materially, if not altogether abolished. I am aware that at first this will seem a utopian scheme. It will appear visionary and impracticable, but as it is examined carefully it will become feasible—and altogether easy of accomplishment to every understanding. It will meet opposition from other quarters. The States and Territories in which the precious metals exist will oppose it under the idea that their local interests are to be interfered with. On reflection I am satisfied there is no good grounds for such fears. On the contrary, it will add to their prosperity. The Government will expend large outlays in the construction of the proposed works, and give employment to many thousands not now required. Mining will be followed as a scientific and well-regulated branch of industry, and the permanent interests of those communities be better secured.

My proposition, therefore, is the immediate occupation and development of our resources in territory belonging to the Government containing the precious metals to our use and benefit; to assume possession of as against individual and mining companies of the mineral lands, and work them on Government account. I do not mean that the property of existing mining companies, or of individuals who have located and who are in possession of existing mines shall be disturbed. All of those now in actual occupation should be respected and recognized as possessed of a vested right. Although all of these are in violation of the rights of the Government, which is the great proprietor and owner of the soil, yet the Government having been derelict in not assuming possession, and instead in rather encouraging a belief that the territory was open or free to all the world, I am willing to concede that, so far as now existing in private hands, we should respect them. It is true that under the law of 1866 individuals may acquire legal authority to take up mineral lands by the payment of five dollars per acre, but even this privilege has been disregarded, but few, if any, having availed themselves of it; but, as it is alleged, it should render them both to State taxation; but because probably they did not think it necessary to pay even this small sum for that which they could get for nothing. An adventurous and free-living class of men, they probably consider themselves exempt from Government interference. Be that as it may, I am willing to admit that their labors, self-sacrifice, and industry have produced to the country an enormous aggregate of substantial wealth, for which they are entitled to thanks and liberal official recognition. In return let them enjoy the full benefit of their discoveries and improvements so far as now possessed. There is enough remaining untouched and undiscovered to pay off the national debt a hundred times.

Over this, therefore, I propose that we shall assume jurisdiction to make it available for the use and benefit of the nation, and not of individuals. The argument heretofore advanced in favor of the extension of these privileges to the miners has been that their products added to the national prosperity. Considering this to be well founded, how much more will it promote the general welfare if this increase of bullion shall be quadrupled and go directly into the public Treasury as the property of the Government. To promote the general welfare is of course highly desirable. We should never lose sight of this duty, but in reducing the public debt, in lessening, if not entirely abolishing taxation, in returning to a specie currency, we shall, indeed, promote the general welfare in a most positive and tangible manner.

This I propose to do by developing the mineral resources by Government effort, and placing the proceeds to its credit. My plan is to construct extensive works, locating them in regions where it is ascertained the precious metals most abound; to bring from Europe the highest order of scientific knowledge for the chemical departments of separation and practical analysis of the metals; to construct whatever tunnels, canals, or other physical improvements may be required in reaching and working the deepest mountain recesses in which the ores may exist, and to erect testing and smelting establishments so as to make into bullion the products of these mines on the spot from which the ores are originally procured.

If it shall be said in opposition to this proposition that it is impracticable, inasmuch as the Government cannot become a great miner, to construct the necessary works and to promote them on its own accounts successfully, I ask why not? Does not the Government possess its own factories for the manufacturing of arms; its navy-yards for the construction of ships of war, for the making of machinery, boilers, &c.? Have we not many large establishments for the construction of many articles of public use, which the Government require? And if it be further objected to on the ground that the temptation to those employed in the mines would be too great to prevent theft, and to secure to the Government the results, I reply that ever since the establishment of the Union we have had mints and assaying offices without any loss whatever. In these works there have been thousands of persons employed with no loss by theft, so far as known. Certainly the temptation and opportunity in them are tenfold greater than they would be in the mines worked by Government officials and properly protected. Again, go to the Treasury Department here and witness the manufacture of currency and the cancellation of paid bonds, where the chances for undetected theft are far more than they could be in the Government mines. The diamond mines of Brazil are worked principally by negroes and Indians, and it rarely or ever occurs that even there such losses occur.

The precautions are sufficient to prevent the secreting of even these small objects about the person. Certainly we are capable of applying a like system to our mines, which shall afford like security against loss from such a cause.

Another argument advanced in favor of the present occupants of the mines is that the expense of getting out the ore and of smelting, &c., is almost as great as the value of the products. I know that it is almost impossible to get at the precise cost of procuring the metal under the present imperfect and insufficient system. Of course it is very much dependent upon physical considerations, and greatly increased or decreased according to circumstances.

We have no data by which to get at it with any degree of exactitude. It is estimated that the product of California of about one thousand millions has not cost over ten per cent. There is but one official statement furnished as to the cost of production in this country, and that is furnished by J. Ross Browne, in his report of 1865, with reference to the "Sierra Buttes" mine in Sierra, California. Here is erected a mill of the first quality, which has been in existence since 1853. In nine years this mine made a gross yield of $1,120,000 at a cost of $385,000, leaving a profit on this outlay of about two hundred per cent.

It is almost impossible to form an estimate of the value of the mineral lands of the Government. There is no data upon which this can be even approximately ascertained. It is, however, well known that that vast region lying between the thirty-fifth and forty-ninth degrees of north latitude and the one hundred and fourth and one hundred and twenty-fourth degree of longitude abound in the precious metals. The States of California, Nevada, Nebraska, Oregon, and Territories of Dakota, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Washington, Idaho, and Montana, covering an area of one million square miles, contain incalculable wealth yet undeveloped. It is but a few years since any attempt has been made to obtain these metals. California, the first in our possession, has yielded already over one thousand million dollars. The resources of the other States and Territories have but recently attracted attention, but some of them have produced great results. The Comstock lode of Nevada has of itself, with very imperfect working, produced a yield of $16,000,000 per year; and it is said that with additional facilities asked of the Government this can be increased to $30,000,000 per year. We have an inexhaustible supply of the precious metals; not only gold, but silver, quicksilver, and every precious metal known to the commercial world. Notwithstanding the difficult means of reaching the ore, and the very imperfect processes and feeble appliances; notwithstanding their want of scientific knowledge, want of capital in making the mines productive, and of proper chemical analyses in the separation of the metal; notwithstanding all these disadvantages, it is estimated, so far as I can gather from the reports and information derived from others personally familiar with those districts, they have produced about two thousand million dollars.

Now, Mr. Chairman, all this land belongs to the Government of the United States; every acre of it, with very trifling exceptions, belongs to the United States. In 1866 Congress passed a law requiring five dollars an acre for the mineral lands; that no man could possess himself of them and work them for his individual benefit without taking up the land at five dollars per acre. Yet none has been so taken up. These men do not recognize the authority of the Government to interfere with them. That poor pittance of five dollars an acre has not been paid at all; but they possess themselves of these regions, they take them when they please and work them as they please. They are a very brave, hardy, enterprising, energetic race of men. I have a respect for them. But, sir, I have a greater respect for the property of my Government; I have greater respect for the obligations of the Government, and I believe that if we possessed within our own right that which it is practicable to make useful toward the payment of our own national obligations, the first duty of this Government is to itself, and then let its citizens take care of themselves.

Mr. Chairman, this is in this country probably a new idea—not so in Europe. The Government of Russia has worked its mines for its own benefit. Germany has done so. Spain did so for over a century. Mexico has done so. The great wealth of Spain was not derived, as is the popular error, from its commerce, because she never had any commerce to any extent. She obtained her wealth and reached her great power in consequence of the richness of her mines, which she protected. Their system was by the imposition of a royalty upon the product. But everybody knows that in this country such a system never could practically be carried out. The imposition of a royalty upon a product, from the nature and habits of our people, from their manner of dealing with every matter that interferes with their individual rights, would be impracticable.

I repeat that the Government of the United States should take possession, actually and positively, of its mineral public lands. While I could respect vested rights, while I do not propose to deprive any in occupation of a foot of that which they possess, and which it may probably be said with truth they have earned by their enterprise, their energy, their industry, and the hardship and exposure incident to their avocation; yet, sir, there are millions of acres that the foot of man, at least of the white man, has never trod. I would take possession of those regions. I would bring from Europe—because it is not to be found in this country—the highest order of scientific knowledge with reference to minerals, chemical preparations, and the treatment of ores. I would construct immense smelting establishments. I would furnish a capital for that purpose through the Government which individual capitalists cannot furnish, and I would put the profits into the public Treasury.

Sir, we had a proposition presented to this House to-day from a gentleman of the name of Sutro, who comes here representing the Comstock lode; calls upon the Government for its aid in its credit of $5,000,000 to make a canal or tunnel by which to get access to the valuable minerals which are known to exist in that mountain; and it is admitted in the preamble to that bill that individual capital utterly fails to produce the metal, and that the Government aid alone can do it. But they want the Government to do it for their benefit, and not for the benefit of the Government. They want to put their hands into the public Treasury, already overwhelmed and embarrassed by debt. They want to take more money out of the Treasury. For the benefit of the Government? Ah, no; for their own benefit. I know they will tell you how much advantage it is to the material interests to procure the precious metals. Well, we all know that. Let any one compare the census of 1850 with the census of 1860, and compare the business and products of the country, and he will find the advantage and the effect of the discovery of gold in California. We know that. But will it be any less advantage to the industrial interests if this money goes into the Treasury instead of into the pockets of these parties? Why, it would increase it fourfold more than it would if it went into the hands of individuals, because it would relieve all the industrial interests from the burden of taxation.

And just here, Mr. Chairman, let me add that this is another advantage to the whole people growing out of my suggestion, to be derived from direct Government agency in the development of these mines. It is in the great additional general prosperity which would necessarily follow the increased production of the precious metals. Political economists understand this well. Allison, the eminent English historian, attributes the wonderful prosperity of England within twenty years to the large accession of bullion which it had received from the Australian and American gold mines. The enhanced prices of agricultural products, of labor, and the general prosperity of trade and commerce within this period, are properly attributed to this as the great stimulating cause. And in our own country the same is true to even a greater extent. Gold was first discovered in California in 1848. At that time commerce, manufactures, and agriculture were at a low condition. We had just emerged from a war with Mexico, and the general industry of the country was in a suspended state. But very soon a change came over every department of industry. Even before the golden harvests began to be gathered in large quantities the influx began to be operating over prices. A fresh impulse was given to industry, creating additional productive energy. This was shown especially in manufactures. The total value of manufactures of the whole country was—

New England .....	$274,741,118	$494,076,494
Middle States .....	432,355,745	749,123,000
Western States .....	136,031,400	376,613,942
Southern States .....	168,209,123	273,938,105
	$1,011,337,386	$1,893,751,541

Thus showing an increase of nearly one hundred per cent. within ten years, to be attributed mainly, if not altogether, to the promoting causes of the additional metallic basis furnished by the gold mines of California. A similar increase will be found in every other department of industry. Trade and commerce, agriculture and manufactures, were alike advantaged by the same influences. Unlike the stimulant which an irredeemable paper currency affords, it is of substantial and positive benefit. It is an addition of so much real property to the great bulk, not the demoralizing, artificial, and shadowy addition which promises to pay based on hypothetical speculations afford.

Mr. PRICE. If it will not interfere with the gentleman's frame of argument, I would like to suggest a difficulty in my mind to the plan which he proposes. If, however, it will at all incommode him, I will not interrupt him.

Mr. WOOD. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. PRICE. A proposition to pay the public debt without the issue of bonds or the payment of interest or an increase of taxation is a magnificent proposition, and, if feasible, it is certainly "a consummation most devoutly to be wished." But the difficulty in my mind—and I merely suggest it for the consideration of the gentleman—is this: since 1847, 1848, or 1849, when gold was discovered and the mining of it properly commenced, up to the present time, if my information is correct, every dollar of gold or of silver that has been obtained from the mines of this country has cost the country one dollar's worth of labor. Now, if that be true, and I have never heard it disputed, and my information is derived from those who have lived in the mining regions and have been conversant with mining affairs, then the Government under this proposition would have to pay for one dollar's worth of labor to produce one dollar in precious metals. In this connection must be considered also the fact that a man working for the Government will not be likely to do any more work than he will when he works for himself.

And then, Mr. Chairman, the other fact also that it involves the necessity of hiring agents for the Government and placing the matter under the direction and control of a bureau or a department of mining, all of which involves the expenditure of money.

Now, if the first proposition be true, that a dollar's worth of the precious metal has cost a dollar's worth of labor, from the commencement of mining in this country down to this hour, and you then add to it the additional expense of agents, overseers, superintendents, and all that sort of thing, it strikes me that at the end of any given number of years we would not be much nearer out of debt than we are now. For each day's labor must be paid for fully, and there is the difficulty with me.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] would be exceedingly sound and altogether right if his premises were well founded. He has reared a difficulty, based entirely upon an imaginary condition of things. It requires no argument to prove that the $2,000,000,000 of gold, which, beyond any doubt, have been procured since June, 1848, in California, Nevada, Arizona, and the other gold and silver bearing regions of our country did not cost anything like that amount in labor. At a dollar a day all the population of all the regions producing gold could not require that amount during this time.

Mr. PRICE. I did not say a dollar a day for labor. I said that each dollar's worth of gold cost a dollar in labor.

Mr. WOOD. I did not intend to state any figures here, though I will say I am abundantly supplied with facts and data to meet every possible objection that can be raised to my proposition. But Mr. Ross Browne, in his report submitted to Congress in 1865, gives the comparative cost of obtaining the precious metals, in the only instance in which he was able to obtain it. And I hope the gentleman from Iowa will listen to what he says. Ross Browne, who took a great deal of trouble to ascertain the comparative cost of production, (and that is the point to which the gentleman refers,) says in regard to the Sierra Butte mine, one of the largest and most extensive mines in that part of California:

"Here is erected one of the finest mills to be found, constructed in 1853. In nine years this mine made a gross yield of $1,120,000, at a cost of $385,000; leaving a profit on this outlay of about two hundred per cent."

When it is recollected that this whole industry, mining, was in the rudest possible condition, without the necessary appliances and means of production that the Government, with its better skilled labor, its more scientific agents, its larger expenditure of capital, and in the construction of improved machinery, would have at its command, it is somewhat wonderful that there should have been a profit of two hundred per cent. Now, if two hundred per cent. profit could be made upon that outlay at that time and under those circumstances, we can, in my judgment, safely count upon one thousand per cent. profit under the plan I have referred to.

Mr. PRICE. Then, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman will excuse me; I have not answered his other question. The other branch of the question which the gentleman propounds to me, if I understood him correctly, is based upon the theory—for it is only theory, only speculation—that it takes so much labor and that so much time is occupied to produce so much gold; that so much time is so much money. Do I state the question of the gentleman correctly?

Mr. PRICE. Very fairly, sir.

Mr. WOOD. Take the population of the western States and Territories; put every man of them at work in the mines, and keep them at work as long as this gold has been being mined, and if you pay them the amount of gold that has been produced, it will be found to amount to at least ten dollars a day. When the gentleman recollects that the main productions of California are agricultural and not mineral, he will see how utterly fallacious are his doctrine. There are portions of that State that are richer in agricultural capacity than any thing we have in the Atlantic States. It was stated here the other day, and stated correctly, that the Genesee valley, which at one time furnished grain and flour for New England, now obtains its breadstuffs from California. That shows that labor will always go where it will command the best returns.

Why, sir, if the gentleman's theory were correct there would be no mining productions whatever, because the men would not be there to do the mining. They could make more elsewhere.

Mr. PRICE. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York will yield to me for a moment I think I can show what seems to me to be a very great fallacy in his argument. Because a certain mill or mine at a certain place has made two hundred per cent. on its investment, the gentleman argues that the whole mining country—millions of acres which, in his own words, are lying waste, have never yet been trodden by the foot of the white man—will necessarily and consequently yield at the same rate. What I stated was that the mining operations of the country, as conducted by individual enterprise, energy and industry, have not produced from 1848 till the present hour more than one dollar's worth of gold for every dollar's worth of labor expended. I said further, that my information on this point was derived from gentlemen conversant with operations in the mining regions and understanding thoroughly this subject.

Now, the gentleman has himself answered a part of his argument in stating that the Genesee valley is to-day receiving wheat from the wheat fields of California. Why? Because the men who went from the Atlantic seaboard to California for the purpose of mining have found that agricultural pursuits pay better, and have turned their attention in that direction. It is a part of the history of the country that men who have gone to California for the purpose of mining have turned their attention to agriculture, because the latter is more remunerative.

While upon the floor I wish to say just a word in reference to another argument of the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman will bear in mind that I have but ten minutes left.

Mr. PRICE. I ask but two.

Mr. WOOD. Very well.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman has stated that the mines of Spain were a source of wealth to that nation. But, sir, Spain never became rich from her mines, although her silver mines were the richest on the globe at that day. Russia did her mining by means of serfs, who were but half paid, half fed, half clad. So it has been with all other countries where mining has been carried on under the management of the Government. It will not do to apply the same rule to this Government, under which individual enterprise and energy, if left untrammelled, produce the greatest results. If individual enterprise and energy will not produce the desired results, certainly operations carried on through the agency and under the direction of the Government will not do it. Taking the aggregate amount mined, and the aggregate of days' labor expended, it is shown that mining has not paid better than raising corn or wheat on the prairies of the country.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have not time to answer the gentleman as fully as I might; and I will say but a word in reply. The gentleman derives his information from those who are interested in suppressing the facts. When you talk to these miners they discourage every attempt at competition with them on the part of the Government or individuals. But there is the fact, that $2,000,000 have been produced. No rational man can stand up and say that any other interest in the country, commercial, mechanical, trading, or manufacturing, has made $2,000,000 as easily, with as little expense, with the outlay of as little manual labor, and in so short a period. But as I desire to say one or two words on the bill itself I am forced to leave this branch of the discussion.

Mr. Chairman, with reference to this bill, I desire to say now, because the opportunity may not be afforded hereafter, that there are in this bill many things which I think a very great improvement upon the existing law. But there is incorporated in the bill one fundamental principle against which I utterly protest. I protest against taking a subordinate officer of this Government who has participated to a larger extent in the execution of the existing revenue laws than either the Secretary of the Treasury or the President, and clothing him with uncontrolled power over the whole machinery of collecting the revenue, without any responsibility anywhere. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is to be invested with the power to appoint and remove, not by the consent of the Senate or of the Secretary of the Treasury, or of the President, but to appoint and remove at his own discretion every collector, every assessor, every assistant assessor, every inspector, every revenue agent throughout the whole length and breadth of this land.

Gentlemen are doubtless familiar with the constitutional provision on this subject, but I will read it. It declares that the President—

"Shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

The Committee of Ways and Means propose to evade this constitutional provision by simply changing the name of the bureau and calling it a department. Sir, I very much doubt whether this can be done. When the Constitution provides that Congress may vest the appointing power in the Departments, what is meant by a department? Sir, I believe it is no strained construction to say that this provision was intended to refer to the Departments then in existence and then recognized as such. Will it be contended that Congress can designate as a department every half dozen men anywhere in the Government and confer upon them the power of appointment and removal? Nor can this difficulty be avoided by changing the name of bureau to that of department. Why, sir, if this bill did not emanate from experienced gentlemen, good lawyers, men of ability, and I believe, of stern integrity, politically as well as otherwise, I should pronounce this provision of the bill a farcical and contemptible attempt at evasion, beneath the dignity and character of this House.

Congress cannot confer this power upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. But suppose it can, should it do so? Should it give to an irresponsible man power to send his agents and emissaries into every man's domicile, to institute a system of espionage and inquisitorial investigation into the individual affairs of the people, a system still more odious than that which has been growing up since the present incumbent has been Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I say that this power is too great to be intrusted to any one man, however pure, however unambitious. And, Mr. Chairman, permit me to express the doubt whether if the politics of this gentleman had been of a different character any such proposition would have emanated from the Committee of Ways and Means? It so happens that he is an active and resolute partisan of the ruling party in Congress. I will not say that the proposition is made for this reason, for I do not wish to impugn the motives of any gentleman on this floor; but it is a singular coincidence that upon this gentleman they should propose to confer unlimited power in the execution of this enormous system, which levies contribution upon the industry of every man, woman, and child in the country; giving this officer authority to walk into the bed-chamber of the citizen, to examine his books and papers without any legal warrant, to penetrate and expose the most sacred private relations of individuals, thus opening the way for the worst operations of malice or vengeance. Aside from the want of constitutional power to confer such authority upon a subordinate officer, I believe that the exercise of any such authority is anti-republican, is in contravention of the spirit and genius of our institutions. I believe it is authority capable of abuse to a lamentable and destructive extent, and should not be conferred upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, nor even upon the President of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, when the Committee of the Whole shall proceed to take up this bill by sections and consider its details, I shall take the opportunity of presenting from time to time amendments which I am satisfied will in some cases be admitted by the honorable chairman of the committee to be an improvement upon the bill. I presume we shall all concur in making the measure as nearly perfect as possible before it is transmitted to the other House.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] a question. He has spoken of the Departments existing at the time the Constitution was formed. I wish to inquire of him what Departments of this Government then existed. Was not the Department of the Interior created very lately, only a few years back? And if Congress, under the Constitution, can vest the appointment of subordinate officers in the Secretary of the Interior, what is to hinder the secretary of revenue, if he should be so termed, or whatever else he may be termed, from exercising the appointing power in his department, if it should be created a department by act of Congress?

Mr. WOOD. The difference is simply this: I know that the Department of the Interior is of very modern origin; but it is a Department, and the head of it has already a seat in the Cabinet. He is a constitutional Cabinet officer of the President. This bill does not propose to confer that prerogative upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. BROMWELL. Did the Constitution provide that any head of the Department should sit in the Cabinet? When Andrew Johnson spoke in Louisville, Mr. Seward remarked that at the termination of the war the President sent for three men to consult about the terms upon which the rebel States should be restored. I have also understood from gentlemen of the Democratic faith that the President had the same right to send for those three men on that occasion that he would have to call upon the Congress of the United States, and that he is restricted by nothing, so far as consulting with anybody is concerned, except so far as he chooses. Therefore, what is there to hinder our making this a department just as much as the Department of the Interior, seeing that all this business is to be performed under the direction of one of the Departments? And do not the heads of the Departments derive their seats in the Cabinet simply from usage?

Mr. HUNTER addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Chairman, being a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, which has reported this bill, and not being able to concur in some of the more important features of it, I have felt it my duty to occupy the attention of the committee for a short time in explanation more particularly of those portions of the bill about which differences have existed and still exist among members of the committee. It is but due, however, to the majority of the committee, and I presume every member of it, to say that great consideration, much labor and care have been bestowed upon every section of this bill; and I fully believe that in most respects it is a great improvement upon everything that has yet preceded it in the form of an internal revenue tax bill. Its phraseology has received great attention. The machinery by which this branch of the Government is to be carried on and these taxes collected is, I think, a great improvement upon that provided in any prior bill.

If I am not able to sustain every section of the bill I shall certainly give it no opposition except in those respects which I deem material and somewhat vital, perhaps, to the success of the bill, if it should become a law. I shall certainly offer no factious opposition to anything which the committee has reported, or to anything which the House or the Committee of the Whole, acting under the authority of the House, may resolve upon in connection with this measure of taxation. Still, sir, as we must vote upon this bill section by section and paragraph by paragraph, I feel that as a member of the committee, when unable to agree with the action of the majority, I ought frankly to state the reasons for my dissent.

The first essential particular in which I find myself unable to concur in the action of the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means is embraced in the first section, to which reference has already been made in this debate. This is the section which erects the present Bureau of Internal Revenue into a separate and independent department of Government. There are in my mind several objections to this proposition. In the first place I regard it as unnecessary for the success of a proper internal revenue system. I concede as frankly and fully as any other gentleman that we have heretofore failed to collect a large part of the taxes to which the Government is justly entitled under existing laws. I concede that there is in this branch of the public service much demoralization—more, perhaps, than in all the other branches. But the difficulty does not, in my judgment, originate with the constitution of the bureau and the subordinate character of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the Secretary of the Treasury; nor is it owing to the fact that the bureau is but a part or sub-division of the Treasury Department proper. The difficulty has all, in my judgment, arisen from the fact that the whisky tax was unwisely laid in the first place, and has been unfortunately perpetuated by succeeding Congresses, at two dollars per gallon.

I do not propose to discuss this question at any great length, because the attention of the public has already been called to it in the public press, and in so many other and various ways. In the first place, however, the tax is so much out of proportion to the cost of the article that the inducements to fraud are such as were never before presented to the people of this country, or perhaps any other country. If a man engaged in the distillation of whisky can succeed in getting to market without the payment of tax one barrel out of every five that he manufactures he is enabled to make money; and if, manufacturing much whisky, he is able to evade the payment of tax on one barrel out of every three he is soon able to build up a fortune. Where, then, such immense interests are involved combinations are formed for the purpose of evading the law. Thus has grown up what is commonly denominated, both here and elsewhere, "the whisky ring," which seems at least exerting a very great influence upon the financial condition of the country.

Now, sir, my proposition is that if we will reduce the tax on whisky to such a point that the inducements to evade the law will not be great, while the penalties of evasion would absorb the profits of a very considerable length of time, so that the risk would be much greater than the inducements to fraud, there will be no more difficulty in collecting these taxes by the means heretofore used than there has been in collecting the revenue from customs, or in collecting the taxes upon other commodities taxable in this bill.

I argue, therefore, that to reduce the tax on whisky is to reduce some of the strongest objections to the present condition of things pertaining to the internal revenue, and to which our distinguished chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] referred in opening the debate on this question on Monday last. I know that there is some discussion, and much difference of opinion, if we shall reduce the tax on whisky, as to the extent to which that tax shall be reduced. But that is a question which I do not now propose to discuss at any great length; I refer to it only incidentally.

My own inclination is to reduce the tax on whisky to fifty cents a gallon. I am not fixed in that inclination, however, and will vote for a greater or a less sum, according to the peculiar condition the question may hereafter assume, and be governed to some extent by the temper of the House at the time the vote may be taken. But under no circumstances will I favor a higher rate of taxation than seventy-five cents a gallon, as at present advised.

Believing, therefore, as I do, that the difficulties which surround the collection of our internal taxes do not result from the manner of collecting them—that is, from the machinery of the office of internal revenue—but from the unwise manner in which they have been levied by the laws of Congress, I do not think it is necessary to attempt so radical a change as is here proposed in an attempt to obviate those difficulties.

I concede that there is much embarrassment resulting from some of the complications referred to by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in his opening speech, resulting from the differences between the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to some extent upon the one side, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Senate of the United States on the other side, upon the subject of appointments. But that difficulty is greatly enhanced by this whisky ring, to which reference has been made here. If we can succeed in breaking that ring, in destroying it, I think much of these difficulties will be removed; because, I take it, the influence of that ring, of that combination, is felt everywhere in the matter of the appointments and removals of internal revenue officers, whenever its interests seem to be involved. Perhaps the influence is generally imperceptible to and indirect upon most of the persons upon whom it is brought to bear, but it is none the less efficient and pervading.

I hope these difficulties are but temporary; and I think it unnecessary to attempt so great a change in the organization in the internal revenue office to meet them. I take it that in the next presidential election some one will succeed, some one will be able to command a majority of the votes of the American people; and in view of our past experience I take it that the minority will submit—submit gracefully, too, I hope—to the will of that majority, whatever it may be, and however it may be expressed.

Mr. ALLISON. I would like my friend from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] to indicate who he supposes that successful man will be.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am not discussing particularly that branch of the question.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask it only as a matter of curiosity.

Mr. NIBLACK. Well, I feel quite assured in my own mind that the successful candidates will not be the two worthy gentlemen nominated at Chicago a few days ago. The coming man, I think, is yet to be nominated.

I take it, therefore, that these difficulties will in some way be settled by the next presidential election. That election is but four or five months distant. And this difficulty, resulting from the nomination of a class of men to office who cannot be confirmed after they are nominated, will be removed. The Senate of the United States, I take it, if the result of that election is adverse to them, will yield gracefully to the verdict of the American people; and if, on the contrary, the people of the United States shall decide that the man whose political principles are in accord with those of the Senate shall be President of the United States, then, of course, there will be nothing remaining about which there can be any difficulty in this respect.

Therefore I think it unwise to endeavor in this way to meet a difficulty which can be so easily solved as this will be by the result of the now pending presidential election, and the future judgment of the American people as expressed at that election. I believe that no gentleman in this House or elsewhere can be more disgusted than I am with much that is being done at this time in this matter of Federal appointments. It is not in a satisfactory condition to anybody except a few gentlemen who succeed in receiving, by some means or other, and in getting confirmed to good fat offices. The class of men I allude to too often succeed in the present condition of things, in deceiving gentlemen at both ends of the avenue. They first practice deception in too many cases upon the President to get his nomination, and then they practice the same sort of deception upon the Senate in order to get confirmed to that office. And it is too often the case, when they once reach that point, that they deceive everybody, both the President and Senate, as well as their mutual friends. No wonder, then, that many of the gentlemen who are able to pass this ordeal do steal a little after they get into office, for men who lie and deceive to get office do not have a great way to go when they commit frauds and peculations upon the Government after they do get office. This condition of things is exceptional, and, I hope, temporary; and I do not think we are called upon to meet it by legislation in view of the result I have mentioned of the election by the people this coming fall.

There is another thing to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] alluded a short time ago, which I think is true, that if not in the letter it is in the spirit in violation of the provision of the Constitution which provides that all other officers not otherwise provided for in that instrument shall be filled by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

"But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Now, the plain intent and meaning of this provision is, in my judgment, that none but inferior officers shall be appointed by the heads of Departments. I think the fair construction of that word "inferior," as applied to public officers, would not embrace a large number of those provided for in this tax bill.

Every officer connected with this branch of the public service is charged with more or less important duties, and some of them with the most important that can be exercised under Government touching the business relations of its citizens. Assessors and collectors are, to some extent, not responsible to the courts of law for what they do. In other words, that remark may apply to everybody connected with the assessment and collection of internal taxes; for there is a provision in this bill which I will not read, but to which I will attract the attention of the committee, that you cannot, by injunction sued out from the courts, restrain these officers from the collection of the tax. They can proceed in their own way, in such manner as suits them, and collect such amount as may be assessed under the forms of law upon citizens of the United States. Citizens are restrained from appeal to the courts; and the only remedy they have is to apply to have them refunded after they have been paid into the Treasury, provided they can make out proper cases of relief. There is no remedy in the courts. The courts are restrained. That is one of the provisions in the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman think that is constitutional?

Mr. NIBLACK. I do not propose to discuss that now, but it is a provision which strikes me as certainly a very important one. It certainly is when you come to take into consideration the vast powers committed to this class of public officers. As was well said by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] these officers have power to invade the privacy of domestic life. They can require the production of books and papers of the most private kind. All our business relations are more or less at their mercy.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NIBLACK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MULLINS. This Commissioner of Internal Revenue is charged with the collection of the revenue; why, then, not give him perfect authority to control it?

Mr. NIBLACK. Well, sir, I was about coming to that. I hope I will answer the gentleman before I get through. The revenue which these officers are charged with collecting is great, and it affects almost every business in the country. This question of tax is one of the most important, embarrassing, and absorbing questions of the day, and it must continue to be so, in the present condition of affairs, for many years. There is no class of officers who are brought so constantly in contact with the great mass of people as these tax-gatherers, clothed as they are with these extraordinary powers.

If therefore it was necessary to have reserved to the Senate of the United States a supervisory power over nominations and appointments in certain cases, I contend that cases arising under this bill are eminently cases for the consideration of that body. I have the opinion furthermore that if these appointments are to be vested in the head of a Department, especially appointments so important as these, the head of that Department ought to be one of the strongest men in any department of the Government, and ought to be a member of the President's Cabinet, as much certainly as any gentleman at the head of any other Department, not even excepting the Secretary of the Treasury or any other officer.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman will allow me, and if it will not disturb the course of his remarks, I would like to inquire whether this bill does in fact continue the present Commissioner in office under the provisions of law as they now exist, so that the President cannot remove him without the concurrence of the Senate?

Mr. NIBLACK. I will allude to that in the course of my remarks.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Because, if that be so, then it seems to me an officer appointed with these simple powers which the law, as it now exists, gives him, and with reference to the execution only of those powers, might not be a proper person to execute the enlarged powers which this bill proposes to give. And if I were to express my own opinion of the present Commissioner I would say he was not the person to exercise the power which I understand the gentleman to say this bill confers upon that officer; and I am very glad to know what I do in regard to the powers proposed to be conferred from what I have learned of the gentleman.

Mr. NIBLACK. I was about remarking that if these extraordinary powers are to be intrusted to any officer, it certainly ought to be to the head of some Department directly and intimately connected with the administration of the Government.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What I desired to inquire particularly was whether, if these powers are given to the Commissioner, the present Commissioner is to be fastened by the law itself upon the administration of the law, so that he becomes the executor of these additional powers?

Mr. NIBLACK. I will answer the gentleman's question in the course of what I am about to say. The head of this department ought certainly to be brought in close contact with the heads of the other Departments of the Government, ought to have their advice and assistance, and ought to be required to report to the President of the United States from time to time what he is doing as much as the head of any other Department of the Government. Sir, no officer under this Government ever had such powers and such patronage conferred upon him as this bill proposes to confer on this Commissioner of Internal Revenue. They are almost imperial powers. He may, with, I believe, one exception, appoint and remove any officer connected with the internal revenue at his pleasure and without supervision or restraint. In this respect his powers are absolutely despotic.

Mr. WOOD. With the permission of the gentleman from Indiana, as he is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and is, of course, familiar with all the provisions of the bill and with the intention of the bill, I desire to ask him whether the bill does not continue in office the present incumbent of the commission-ership of internal revenue as against the President of the United States or the next President of the United States, and whether the bill does not continue him in office for life and only give the President power to fill the vacancy in case of his death or resignation?

Mr. NIBLACK. It certainly does continue him in office. When we come to look into the provisions of the bill erecting this bureau into an independent department, we find that it continues the present Commissioner in office at the same salary as he is now receiving, leaving him inferior in point of compensation to the extent of some two thousand dollars to the other heads of Departments, and continuing him in office, protected by the provisions of the tenure-of-office bill, the same as collectors and assessors now are, and which, in my judgment, creates much of the difficulty that has arisen on the subject of the collection of the taxes.

It proposes to place this immense power in the hands of a head of department who is still to be styled, as he is now, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and who is not expected to be a member of the President's Cabinet. Another of the peculiarities of this bill is, that while it legislates out of office everybody connected with the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, except the Commissioner himself, it continues him in office until he dies or resigns or is removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided the tenure-of-office bill shall be held to be constitutional and binding on the President. It continues him in office and permits him to remove everybody else, and allows him to fill all these offices made vacant by this law except, perhaps, the office of solicitor of internal revenue. It places substantially the whole power over this branch of the public business in the hands of the present Commissioner, who was nominated and confirmed, not as the head of a Department, but as the head of a bureau subordinate to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Well, now, sir, whatever this may be in point of fact, it looks too much like fixing things up for the occasion and endeavoring by indirection to do that about which there might be some difficulty if it were done in the usual and direct way.

If we are resolved, or shall resolve, to make the internal revenue office an independent department, let us, in the usual and direct way, authorize the President and the Senate to place some gentleman at the head of it who shall be nominated and confirmed with reference to the extraordinary powers he is required to perform by this bill.

The only check upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue contained in this bill is that there is to be a solicitor appointed for the department of internal revenue, who is to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who acts as the law officer of this proposed department.

Suppose that Congress should approve of this feature of the bill, and it shall become a law, shall we not, or at least may we not, have many of the same difficulties as between the President and the Senate and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as we already have if the tenure-of-office bill is still continued in force? The President cannot remove the Commissioner of Internal Revenue except by the consent of the Senate; and if he should attempt to do so—as he has already attempted in the case of this very Commissioner—it is competent for the Senate to decide that he shall not remove him, and we shall have the old difficulty again, except that the Secretary of the Treasury will be out of the way. It does not remove this difficulty of conflict between the President and Congress.

So far as I am personally concerned, I have nothing unkind to say about the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue. My intercourse with him has always been of the most friendly character, and I have found him a courteous and obliging officer. I have no charges to make against him here or elsewhere as at present advised; but it is sufficient for my purpose to say that he was not appointed, as I have already intimated, with reference to the immense duties and responsibilities which will be devolved upon him by this bill.

If the House shall determine to make this a separate department of the Government, I shall then insist that he shall be placed on an equal footing with all the other heads of Departments, both in point of rank and in point of compensation; and if he is a man of spirit, as I hope he is, I think he will hesitate to undertake the discharge of the immense trusts confided to him by this bill and at the same time hold a rank and receive a compensation inferior to those of the other heads of Departments charged with the administration of this Government.

But, sir, I shall not attempt to pursue the subject further. It is only necessary for me to call the attention of other gentlemen to it who can trace it out and follow it up.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If it will not annoy the gentleman, I should like to ask him a question or two.

Mr. NIBLACK. I will hear the gentleman's questions.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire in the first place to ask, for the purpose of calling his attention to the subject, whether he recollects the testimony of the present Commissioner, as given before the Judiciary Committee while investigating the subject of impeachment, and whether he remembers that the Commissioner was inquired of with reference to the appointment of the subordinate officers of that department and how they were affected by the inability of the President to name those officers and have them confirmed? I will say to the gentleman, with his permission, that if he will read the testimony of Mr. Rollins, he will see that the whole difficulty which he found in the administration of his office resulted from the fact that he and the Secretary of the Treasury were unable, with the concurrence of the President, to name the subordinate officers, and that losses—which he did not, I must say, estimate very correctly, because he said he had never entered into any calculation, but losses that amounted to millions a year—resulted from his inability to change officers; and he finally simmers the whole thing down to this: that the difficulty resulted from the fact of the inability of the President to remove these officers when called upon by him and by the Secretary of the Treasury to do so.

Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to some of the questions put to him and his answers thereto. After testifying that he was Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that he was a Republican, and that he did not agree with the President, this question was put to him:

"Have you ever in a single case represented to the President that any incumbent in the revenue service was dishonest or incompetent and ought to be removed?"

Here is his answer, to which I call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana, because of the remarks made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in his opening speech:

"I have not. It is not the practice, he says, for the head of a bureau to communicate by letter or through personal interviews with the President except as in the instance referred to, at the request of the Secretary of the Department in which he is an officer."

"Question. Is the office which you hold more likely to bring you information of the incompetency and dishonesty of the officer than any other office under the Government is?"

"Answer. Such information would ordinarily be received by both the Secretary of the Treasury and myself. I presume that more information would be sent to my office than to his."

"Question. Would you not consider it your duty, if you knew an assessor or collector of internal revenue who was dishonest or incompetent, or unfaithful to his office, to make that fact known to the President?"

"Answer. I should not directly."

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] has complimented pretty highly the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I call his attention to the fact that he says he should not feel himself called upon, if he knew a dishonest, incompetent, or unfaithful subordinate officer to call the attention of the President to the fact. The question was next put to him by me:

"Question. You should not think that your duty?"

"Answer. No, not directly; because such has never been the practice of the Department."

"Question. How otherwise could these facts, except through you or the Secretary of the Treasury, be brought to the knowledge of the President?"

"Answer. They would be brought to his attention by the Secretary of the Treasury."

"Question. Have you in any instance, where you have known the dishonesty and incompetency of internal revenue officers, presented the facts to the Secretary, and asked of him to present the facts to the President for his action?"

"Answer. I have presented the names of persons with my opinion of their unfitness and requested their removal; but the facts upon which my opinion was based I have not reduced to writing, and indeed it is very difficult to ascertain with absolute certainty the collusion of an officer with tax-payers."

"Question. Do you know that the Secretary of the Treasury has ever presented a case which you have brought to his knowledge to the President in which he did not act on it?"

"Answer. I do not."

"Question. You have never in writing presented any case to the Secretary of the Treasury of incompetency, unfaithfulness, and dishonesty of any officers of whom you had knowledge?"

"Answer. I have presented names of persons of whom I had such opinion."

"Question. I ask if you ever presented in writing a request stating the facts of incompetency and dishonesty of officers of whom you had no knowledge?"

"Answer. I have requested in writing that persons should be removed for the good of the revenue."

"Question. Who were they?"

"Answer. I would prefer not to give their names. They are still in service, and it would disturb the harmony of official intercourse so to do."

"Question. Do you know that that communication, so addressed to the Secretary, was ever presented to the President?"

"Answer. I do not; but in the communication I expressed a hope that, with vexed political questions measurably concluded, the nominations to the Senate would be brought back to the Treasury Department, where they could be more properly considered in connection with the interests of the service. I desire here to say that, while subordinate appointments are ordinarily made by the Secretary upon the recommendation of assessors and collectors, he has quite uniformly removed his appointees without hesitation whenever I had evidence of their inefficiency or corruption. It is almost entirely with appointments not made by him that embarrassment in this particular has arisen.

Question. Did you name any persons as their successors?

Answer. I did not.

Question. Were these six officers Republicans or Democrats?

Answer. I have no means of knowing with certainty their political opinions. They were nearly all appointed by Mr. Lincoln. They generally reported as Conservatives. I cannot say whether they are all so or not."

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend, so far as I am concerned, to give this discussion a party bias—I have referred to our political troubles only incidentally—and I cannot therefore attempt to reply to many things brought out by the gentleman from Wisconsin. I did not intend to be specially complimentary to anybody in what I have been saying about them, nor did I intend to be unkind or severe. I want to do justice to Mr. Rollins and to everybody else, so far as I can, connected with the administration of this matter of the internal revenue.

My position as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means has brought me into frequent communication with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. And in all his relations with me, and so far as I know with other members of the committee, I have found him to be a courteous and obliging gentleman, and so far as I know a faithful public officer. His surroundings in many respects I do not like. And everything considered he is not the sort of gentleman I would have nominated and appointed to that position if I had control of the matter. But as he is a subordinate to the Secretary of the Treasury, and also to the President, it might be unfair to hold him accountable for many things for which he may be considered responsible. On the contrary, it may be that he is really responsible for many things for which people have been blaming the Secretary of the Treasury and the President.

I do not, however, propose to go into these matters now. I have alluded to these difficulties only in elucidation and amplification of the remarks which our distinguished chairman made upon the subject in his opening speech on Monday last.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. NIBLACK. Certainly.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Is it not fair to state, in answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] that the reply of Mr. Rollins, that he had not reported these cases to the President, was in consequence of his being subordinate to the Secretary of the Treasury? Under the technical rules and customs of the Department he had no right to make a report directly to the President; he had to report to the Secretary of the Treasury. He stated that he had reported certain officers to the Secretary of the Treasury, but he was not permitted by the rules and customs of the Department to make a report directly to the President. That is all that Mr. Rollins means to say in his reply.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] will allow me to reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER,] I will simply say that the Commissioner did not say that such was the rule of the Department.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. The Commissioner may not have thought it necessary to say so in so many words, because he knew it was generally understood that such was the rule of the Department.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The Commissioner had the amplest opportunity to make that answer, for I cross-examined him at considerable length. But he did not so state, and such is not the fact. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is the officer to whom this knowledge must necessarily come. He is subordinate to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the President, and there is no question about his duty to make known to his superior officers all frauds and wrong-doing that may come to his knowledge.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. The Secretary of the Treasury is his superior officer, and the rules and customs of the Department require him to give that information not to the President but to the Secretary of the Treasury. If he has any communication to make to the President, it must be made through the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Certainly; but in his testimony he does not claim that he had given the Secretary of the Treasury any such information. If the gentleman will refer to his testimony he will find that no such communication was ever made by him to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I understood the gentleman, in reading the testimony of Mr. Rollins, to read the question, Did you ever communicate any such information to the President? and the answer was that he did not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yes, sir; that he had not done so directly to the President. But when you come to the cross-examination you will find that he had not communicated this information to anybody.

Mr. NIBLACK. I cannot yield further, for I find that my time is passing away, and I have agreed to yield a portion of it to the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY.]

I did not desire to go into this matter between the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, except to a limited extent, nor did I desire to comment severely upon any one connected with this matter of the administration of the internal revenue, because the mere conduct personally of public officers does not affect great principles.

It is the principle which underlies this whole question which I desired to discuss. That there has been much done that ought not to have been done I freely concede; that there has been much that has not been done which ought to have been done I equally concede. There are complaints made in reference to some appointments from which it might be inferred that the President had been somewhat at fault. But the real trouble arises from the disagreement between the President and the Senate. He makes nominations, and the Senate rejects them. In the second district of Indiana there have been, I believe, some eight or ten nominations made within the last fifteen months, and all of them, excepting perhaps the last one, have been rejected by the Senate. This is one of the unfortunate incidents of our condition which, as I have already intimated, will, I trust, be only temporary.

I shall not pursue any further this question of a separate department. I have indicated some of the reasons why I cannot agree to the proposition at this time. There are some other features of the bill to which I will very briefly allude, and then I will conclude.

Upon the question as to the tax on whisky, to which I had intended to devote some time, I am relieved by the statement of the chairman of the committee [Mr. SCHENCK] in his opening speech. He has very frankly stated that he thinks this tax ought now to be reduced, and has given some of the many reasons why I have all the time felt the propriety of such a reduction. In view of what he has conceded upon this question, and of the evidences which I have seen around me for some time past, I take it as a foregone conclusion that this tax will be reduced, the only question being the amount at which the tax shall be fixed. As I have already intimated, I think the difficulties surrounding this question of the whisky tax have been, and are still, inherent in the present system on account of the great disproportion of the tax to the cost of the article.

Then, again, passing over the question of the inducements to fraud, the collection of such a tax as this is and has been requires the exercise on the part of the Government of a degree of despotic and arbitrary power which our form of government is not competent to wield. We cannot put in force and keep in vigorous operation that sort of concentrated power and machinery which is necessary to force from the people so extraordinary and so exorbitant a tax. I have seen a statement to the effect that, taking the experience of all civilized Governments upon this subject of the taxation of alcoholic spirits, about seven per cent. of the gross amount of taxes have been and can be collected off of this species of property, and that every effort to collect a greater proportion has been a failure. I cannot vouch for the accuracy of this statement; but I am satisfied that there is a point beyond which we cannot go in the amount to be realized from that species of property. If we attempt to raise an extraordinary sum, a sum greatly disproportionate to the tax on all other interests, the frauds on the revenue will prevent the efficient collection of the tax. By fixing the tax at such a rate as does not offer so great inducements to fraud, does not give such impetus to illicit distillation, this difficulty is removed; and we can then collect this tax, as well as any other tax, either through the agency of a bureau officer, as at present, or through such other ordinary means as we may adopt.

But, sir, the worst of all the features of this two-dollar whisky tax is the very great and most mortifying demoralization of the public service. It would be better, in my judgment, to repeal this tax altogether than to continue the present condition of things, and look to something else for revenue. We can ill afford to continue and make perpetual this demoralization for the sake of a few paltry millions a year.

Sir, public virtue is of more value than money, and we cannot afford to debauch and bring the public service into utter disrepute for the sake of a few dollars in taxes.

There is another point in reference to which I have differed with the committee. I do not lay great stress upon it, but still I think it is a matter of importance, both in a financial view and on account of the demoralizing influence which may also be exerted, if we attempt to enforce the amount of taxation proposed in this bill. I refer to the tax on tobacco. Although this has not attracted so much attention as the whisky tax, yet the frauds in regard to the tax on tobacco have been proportionably very great. I suppose that in a country of such vast extent as ours, so sparsely populated, with so many places remote from the tax-gatherers and revenue officers, there must necessarily be very great evasion of the law. But I take it that the higher we attempt to make those taxes the greater will be the evasion and the greater the consequent demoralization.

This bill proposes a tax of forty cents per pound on all kinds of chewing tobacco.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HIGBY obtained the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would regard it as a very great favor if the House would consent to extend my time.

Mr. HIGBY. I do not desire to occupy the whole of my hour, and I yield the gentlemen ten minutes.

Mr. NIBLACK. I do not lay great stress upon this, nor have I investigated it sufficiently to attempt to go into it as minutely as gentlemen in trade could, or many of the public officers who have had their attention called to it. I think we have failed in the section on tobacco. I think it is too large a proportion of tax upon tobacco, and that it will bear hardly upon this interest in the country. As a matter of policy I think the tax ought not to go higher than thirty-two cents, which some members of the trade have agreed that it will bear safely, and all interests will succeed well under it.

For my own part I am willing, and have been willing, to place the tax at that amount as an experiment.

But gentlemen well informed on the subject insist it should not go beyond twenty cents per pound. I will content myself by saying that I am unwilling to go as high as forty cents.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What is it now?

Mr. NIBLACK. Heretofore there have been three grades, forty, thirty, and fifteen cents. Most, if not all that kind of tobacco that the existing law taxes thirty is now proposed to be taxed forty.

There is one other matter which I intended to consider; but as I have overrun my time I will simply advert to it. I am apprehensive the amount of taxes this bill provides for, or is likely to be collected under it in case it becomes the law in its present shape, will not be anything like the expectation of the chairman of the committee and of others who have given it their attention. I am inclined to believe there are no means we can adopt in this country that will bring $70,000,000 out of whisky alone. I shall be gratified if we can succeed in raising that much money, but I am afraid that it is impracticable. If we make a levy of that kind I am afraid the facility in fraud in any system we adopt will disappoint us in the amount raised.

While I certainly desire all tax shall be raised upon what are called the luxuries of the country, I doubt whether that is practicable in view of the immense amount of revenue we have to raise from year to year from this and other sources. If we sustain our credit my prediction is, and I give it for what it is worth, we will have to extend the area beyond that in the present bill. As an experiment I am willing to try it, trusting more to the judgment of others better informed than myself than to the impulses of my own judgment.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Cover more articles?

Mr. NIBLACK. Yes, sir; because higher tax is not practicable, and the only escape we have is to cover more articles. I hope I am mistaken about this; but the country must not be deceived. I think the country ought to be prepared for heavier taxation, in some respects, than we have yet submitted to. I know it is not a pleasant thing to refer to, but I state it as a matter of conviction. The expenses of the Government never will be brought within the figures which gentlemen are trying to bring them in the present appropriation bills without greater and more radical reforms than I now anticipate. As I have already remarked on another occasion, I think we will have an enormous deficiency next winter, and in order to have the means to meet this deficiency we will have to carry taxation beyond its present point.

Taking the tax off cotton, in which I heartily concurred, and taking off the tax on manufactures, in my judgment, is going to make a great difference in our receipts from internal taxes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is this an experimental bill for the purpose of ascertaining what we can drop in the way of taxation so as to bridge over the fall elections?

Mr. NIBLACK. I was not talking about the fall elections in this connection, but I do say it is an experiment. I have already remarked that I think it is superior to the other tax bills. I believe we have been too sanguine as to the amount of tax we are going to raise by it, and underestimated the expenses of the Government. Taking the two together, I do not feel as sanguine financially as other gentlemen. I hope they are nearer the truth than I am; but that can only be demonstrated by the operations of time.

There is another question which I ought to have alluded to. I have referred to those where I felt it to be my duty to differ with the committee. There are others of minor importance, and I can refer to them in the progress of the bill. I shall, as I have intimated, sustain the committee in everything, so far as I find myself able to do it; but I was compelled to dissent in regard to some matters to which I have referred, and I feel it due to the committee, as well as the House, to state some of my reasons at least for this dissent. I have suffered my time, however, to be frittered away by digressing from the points which I intended to discuss. Therefore, as my time is consumed, I cannot attempt to occupy the time of the committee any longer by asking a further extension of my time.

Mr. HIGBY. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that I should have sought an opportunity to say anything at this time had it not been for some remarks dropped by the member from New York, [Mr. Wood.] I did not hear all of them, for I came in while he was speaking. I do not think my constituents would feel very well satisfied to allow such remarks to go forth without some answer to them.

The gentleman is still carried away with the idea that I found to prevail in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and to a great extent also in the Thirty-Ninth. I had supposed that this Fortieth Congress was far less tinctured with the idea than the two previous ones. I found gentlemen in the Thirty-Eighth Congress who were carried away with the idea that the mineral belt of this country contained sufficient wealth to easily pay the national debt. Members frequently asked me that question in all seriousness if this Government could not, by taking upon itself the management, care, and custody of the mineral lands, pay off the national debt very readily. And the same question was sometimes asked in the Thirty-Ninth Congress. My reply to these gentlemen always was this: that to attempt to legislate upon that policy would ruin any political party. It is a fallacious idea, Mr. Chairman, that mining for gold and silver pays better than any other pursuit. I beg members who wish to get at the facts in regard to this question to rid themselves of the idea that labor and capital employed in taking gold and silver from the earth receives any better returns than when employed in any other business. I declare, from an experience as well as an observation of eighteen years, that there is no branch of business, whether it be agricultural, mechanical, commercial, or manufacturing, that pays so poorly as mining for gold and silver.

Why, sir, to illustrate this fact I need only appeal to the knowledge of members of this House who represent districts large portions of which are mineral regions. They can bear me witness that there is less wealth in that business than in any other; that the agricultural and commercial portions of their district contain the most wealth in proportion to the number of inhabitants.

Such facts give some idea of the value of the mineral regions of this country. Take my own State of California, and what do you find? The mineral counties contain decidedly the least wealth in proportion to population of any counties in the State. Take the agricultural portions of the State, and there you find wealth in proportion to the richness of the soil. I can compare my own county and neighboring counties with agricultural counties, where the population is not near so great, and yet the agricultural counties have twice or three times the real substantial wealth.

And when you come to consider the indebtedness of the countries, what do you find? The agricultural counties have comparatively a small debt, while the mineral counties have decidedly large ones. And if any member of this House is disposed to look into the legislation of the last Legislature of my State, he will find on examining it critically that many of the counties in the mountains which are purely mineral are almost in a condition of bankruptcy as to their public affairs. Now, these things always tell for a country more than anything else. There is no such fallacious legislation as that which goes upon the basis that extracting the precious metals is the most productive source of wealth to the country. That kind of industry which produces the greatest aggregate of wealth in proportion to the labor bestowed upon it is the best for the country, no matter what it may be, whether it be commercial or manufacturing or agricultural or mineral. That rule will hold good in all parts of the country.

Why, sir, a few years ago, since I have been here, I think in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, when we were getting up an internal revenue bill, there was a tax of one half of one per cent. imposed on gold. The bill as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means imposed a tax of three per cent. to be paid in gold on all the gold produced. The member from New York [Mr. Wood] was here at the time. I stood here in my place and most strenuously opposed that provision of the bill. I told this House—I was a young member then, although I had seen some years outside—I told this House then that it was fallacious legislation to attempt anything of the kind, and that it would be disastrous to follow the miner into his claim and tax him three cents on every dollar of gold he took out of the earth. When we reached that part of the bill Mr. Wallace, who was then the Delegate from Idaho, arose and moved to strike out the words "to be paid in gold," so as to leave it at three per cent. to be paid in the currency of the country, and that was carried. Immediately the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means rose in his place and moved to raise the tax to five per cent. instead of three per cent., and that went through like a whirlwind; there was no stopping it; we could not even get enough to call the yeas and nays on it in the House. The bill went to the Senate, and there the tax was brought down to half of one per cent. Well, as we had had a pretty warm discussion on the subject here, when the bill came back from the Senate the Committee of Ways and Means finally concluded to leave the tax at half of one per cent., and they asked our delegation if we would be satisfied with that. I told them that I did not suppose the miners of my State were going to be dissatisfied at having to pay half of one per cent. to the Government under the circumstances, and that they were willing to support the Government, and especially in the struggle it was then going through.

I insisted, however, that it was injustice to put a tax of even half of one per cent. on them; but I told the committee that I should make no further contest over the question, and we left it there. Well, sir, I trust the tax will not be raised in this bill. The committee have stricken it out in the bill which they have reported to the House, showing that they possess some wisdom on this subject, and have become somewhat enlightened. I say it is rank injustice to follow the miner into his claim in the depths of the earth and take from him the first particle—even one farthing on a hundred dollars—as a tax upon this article, and for the simple reason that, of all the business that is carried on in this country, there is none that pays so poorly for the labor and the capital employed in it as taking gold and silver from mines. And I say to the member from New York, dismiss the idea that this Government will ever pay its national debt by a surplus of gold and silver over the pay of the laborers for taking it out of the mines. If you will put it on to the substantial industry of the country—your agriculture—which is the most permanent and lasting and substantial of all; upon your manufactures and upon your commerce, you will get upon the right basis; but you need that gold and silver shall come from the mines simply as a stimulant for all other kinds of business, for that is its use. It is a stimulant to all other industries. There is the great secret of encouraging the taking of gold and silver from the mines.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] allow me to ask him an economic question?

Mr. HIGBY. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is this: whether all the intrinsic value of gold and silver is precisely equivalent to the labor which is required to take it from the mines and put it into circulation among the people?

Mr. HIGBY. I do not so understand it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then if it has any intrinsic value besides the expense of getting it from the mines and putting it in circulation among the people why not tax that additional value?

Mr. HIGBY. That has been the weight of my argument; that if to-day you could figure up all the expense and labor bestowed in getting gold and silver from the mines, as labor is paid elsewhere and in other employments and pursuits, you would have an actual loss upon the amount invested.

Mr. MAYNARD. I did not make my inquiry of the gentleman in any spirit of contradiction.

Mr. HIGBY. I did not so understand the gentleman. You will find that my statement in regard to gold and silver is borne out by the unanimous concurrence of men who have had the most experience in this business of the employment of capital and the application of labor to the production of gold and silver.

Mr. BROOMALL. Then there is no intrinsic value in gold and silver.

Mr. HIGBY. No, sir, there is not.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield the floor?

Mr. HIGBY. Certainly.

Mr. WOOD. Though the hour is now late, I feel compelled to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HIGBY. I have no objection to that, although I am not quite through yet.

Mr. WOOD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I do not wish to interrupt him. I thought he had concluded his remarks.

Mr. HIGBY. I do not wish to be understood as saying that to the country at large, taking all branches of industry into consideration, the taking of gold and silver from the mines is not an advantage and a gain rather than a loss. These millions of the precious metals taken from the mines become a grand stimulant to all other branches of industry and enterprise, not only in the vicinity of the mines, but all over the country. But when you come to the question of return and profit to those who actually take those precious metals from the mines, I say that they do not get a compensation equal to that afforded by other kinds of business. That is the universal testimony of all who have any acquaintance, either by experience or observation, with the business of taking gold and silver from the mines. And for that reason this kind of labor should never be directly taxed. Revenue should be raised without hindering this branch of industry. Gentlemen may not understand it; it may be a mystery to them; but the grand result will bear me out in the statement I have made.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, but a few words.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am very reluctant to object to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] proceeding now; but I believe the rules of the House forbid any gentleman speaking twice upon the same subject while there are others who desire to be heard.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope my colleague, [Mr. HIGBY,] before he yields the floor, will allow me a few minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. Perhaps the gentleman from New York will indicate how many minutes he desires?

Mr. WOOD. Only a few minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will my colleague yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. HIGBY. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to say that I indorse every word my colleague has uttered on this subject. I would like, if I had time, to go over the ground myself, and on some future occasion I may do so.

I take the position that this Government ought not to tax the miner, and (although I have been charged with advocating a bill for the sale of the mines) I hold that this Government has no right to sell the mines; that this Government has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. MULLINS. Do you hold that the Government at the common expense should appropriate the mines for the sole benefit of the few people who may go there and dig out the gold?

Mr. JOHNSON. I hold, sir, that the Government has nothing to do with hunting for mines; that the people find the mines and work them for the benefit of the people.

Mr. MULLINS. I am speaking of the absolute right which the Government has to the property. Is the Government to give this property away to one man or a few men, securing no benefit to the mass of the people?

Mr. JOHNSON. The Government of the United States, under our institutions, does not own the mines. Until within the last six or seven years there was never any pretense by any lawyer of this country that this Government owned the mines for purposes of absolute control.

Mr. MULLINS. Are the mines in the earth or above the earth? [Laughter.] I mean by that to ask whether the Government does not own the land in which the mines are found?

Mr. JOHNSON. In the remarks which I have made I have referred to the mines of precious metal.

Mr. HIGBY. I understood that a part of the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] was that the Government of the United States ought to take these mines into its own possession and, I suppose, work them, appropriating the avails to aid in paying the national debt. But I will say to the gentleman that if when the mines of California were discovered, the Government had taken them and worked them, paying fair wages to miners, such wages as have been paid in other branches of business, California would be to-day wealthier by several millions than she is. That would have been the amount of the loss to the Government of the United States, because individuals, with the same amount of labor and capital, can produce more than the Government can. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have very great respect for the interest which these two gentlemen from California [Mr. HIGBY and Mr. JOHNSON] evince in this question, which, as they appear to think, necessarily affects the interests of their constituents. I think that the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] did not hear the whole of my remarks, or if he did, I failed to make myself understood as to what I propose with reference to those mining regions. I am prepared to show, and shall show hereafter, that the gentleman's proposition and data are incorrect when he says that it has cost all the value of the precious metals to procure them. But, sir, notwithstanding the fact that for four or five years—from 1848 till 1852-53—the surface mining was really a matter of no expense to those who pursued it, I am willing to admit for the purpose of answering the gentleman in one word, that thus far the labor of mining gold in California has cost all it has produced.

But, sir, I do not propose for this Government any such kind of mining as those men have pursued. The gentleman talks of protecting the interests of the miner down in the bowels of the earth. Why, sir, the labor of an humble miner, toiling in the face of physical difficulties of the most stupendous character, can of course avail but little; and even the mining companies, although some of them have made immense amounts of money, are insufficient to grapple with the difficulties of this great work. Their operations are but as a drop in the bucket compared with the skill, the capital, the labor which I propose this Government shall exert for the purpose of reaching spots which neither individual enterprise nor corporate power has been capable of reaching.

Now does the gentleman understand me? Admit it to be all true down to this period, I propose, if the Government goes into the enterprise, that the work shall be herculean in its character. Take the Comstock lode in the State of Nevada. It is admitted by the best opinion we have from that State that with help from Congress that can be made to yield thousands of millions of dollars. They ask for an appropriation of $5,000,000. They say they have procured $16,000,000 without the expenditure of money. That is the report upon your tables. They say they will produce from thirty to forty million dollars if you will give them $5,000,000 to build a canal.

My theory is that the past cannot be compared with the future if we have skilled capital operating through an organized department, established in Washington city, under the direction of some man of high and excellent character. With the proper appropriation the necessary works can be constructed for getting out what belongs to the Government for the purpose, if you please, of paying the public debt and abolishing taxes. That is my position; and I hope hereafter to present a bill to the House, and produce the proofs that my proposition is practicable, and can be carried out.

Mr. HIGBY. I want only to say a word or two in reply. I have always found that it is easier to build up a theory than to carry it out practically.

Mr. WOOD. I was in California before the gentleman was.

Mr. HIGBY. That may be; but many men many minds. I know men who have been there as long as I have been, but who never yet saw a mine.

Mr. WOOD. I was there in 1848, and understand the question thoroughly and practically.

Mr. HIGBY. I found men there in 1850 who had been all through the State, and said that the mines had been worked out; that the mines had failed. There have been all sorts of opinions and all sorts of schemes. But what I was about to say is, that I have found men not acquainted with California and mining who thought they could go out to that State and make heaps of money. Oh, no! there was no difficulty about it! But, sir, I know that those there have not done so. Hundreds and thousands have really found difficulties which gentlemen here never could have imagined to be in the way.

Now, the gentleman from New York says that hundreds of millions can be obtained from these mines if you will only concentrate capital. He says it. Now, is he ready to stake capital of his own on such assertion? If he is, where are the thousands with him who will combine and run holes into the ground and through granite rocks to reach these mines and take out these fabulous amounts? It cannot be done; and it is only to make men believe these theories and get the Government to appropriate this money. No individual is to suffer one cent of loss by it; but this great Government is to be at the bottom of it all. That is the way this vast wealth is to be made for this Government. Now, I am not so ready in pushing the Government into such an enterprise unless I thought it was tolerably safe as a private enterprise to do the same thing. When I cannot become satisfied to put a little myself of my own upon the assurance that if I do I will find such fabulous wealth, I shall not feel disposed to urge that the Government shall be at the bottom of such enterprise.

This is my idea of political economy: when there is a speculation which cannot be carried out by private enterprise, then it is extravagant in the Government to attempt it; and for one I will not encourage any of these wild theories. When the Government goes into the business, making large appropriations upon these theories, who can estimate what will be the ultimate losses?

Mr. MAYNARD obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. SCHENCK, who said: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise; and I hope, after the committee have risen, the House will make an order that all general debate on this bill shall terminate in an hour and a half after the consideration of the bill shall be again resumed in committee. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. GARFIELD taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that when the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole upon the special order all general debate shall cease in an hour and a half.

Mr. ALLISON. Before that is put I would like to ask my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] whether he desires to occupy the entire hour?

Mr. MAYNARD. I certainly do not.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to have an understanding about it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hold myself subject to the wishes of my friend, who has prepared a speech, as I have not, on this subject.

Mr. ALLISON. If it is understood that I shall have an hour I shall have no objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] wish to occupy a few minutes each.

By unanimous consent the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CAKE: The petition of 38 mining and manufacturing companies and firms of Lebanon and Schuylkill counties, Pennsylvania, employing, when in full operation, 5,986 workmen, now employing 1,950 workmen, signed also by other citizens of said counties, representing that the productive interests of the country are suffering and its industry paralyzed for want of efficient protection against the cheaper labor and capital of foreign countries; that custom duties, which, under a high gold premium, were sufficient to create and foster manufactures, have become inadequate and must shortly prove ruinous; that much of the distress now prevalent and daily increasing would be relieved by the legislation suggested in Special Commissioner Wells's report of last year, and perfected in the tariff bill (as passed by the Senate) which failed in the House of Representatives March, 1867, for want of time; and praying Congress to resume consideration of that measure and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petition of Messrs. Charles Waltjen & Brother, of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, and others, manufacturers of tobacco and cigars, journeymen, and dealers in tobacco and cigars, praying that the tax on cigars shall not be increased, setting forth that the object in view will be defeated, if the object be to increase the revenue from tobacco, by the proposed change.

By Mr. COVODE: The petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, for the establishment of a post route from Saegerstown to Blooming Valley, both in Crawford county, Pennsylvania.

By Mr. HALSEY: The protest of William A. Brintzinger and others, against increasing the rate of tax on cigars.

By Mr. HARDING: Remonstrances of manufacturers of cigars, &c., of Quincy and Monmouth, Illinois, against increase of taxes.

By Mr. HOTCHKISS: The petition of Haws & Giddings and 22 others, citizens of Bridgeport, Connecticut, protesting against increase of tax on cigars.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut: A remonstrance of sundry citizens of Suffield, Connecticut, against proposed increased of tax on cigars.

By Mr. MORRELL: The petition of Edward Frysinger and 7 others, citizens of Lewistown, Mifflin county, Pennsylvania, engaged in manufacturing cigars, representing that the change from five to ten dollars per thousand in tax, as proposed in the revenue bill now before the House, would be ruinous to their interests, and praying that no change be made.

Also, a memorial of Francis A. Gibbons, asking for additional compensation for the erection of a building for the Department of Agriculture.

By Mr. NIBLACK: A memorial of Charles Viele and sundry others, citizens of Evansville, Indiana, remonstrating against any increase of the tariff on sugar, as prayed for by the sugar refiners.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The remonstrance of cigar manufacturers and dealers and journeymen cigar-makers of Philadelphia, against the proposed change in the tax on cigars, &c.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of David V. Lovell for amendment of the bounty act of July 28, 1866.

By Mr. ROBERTSON: The petition of Mrs. Emily Hooe, of Prairie du Chien, in the county of Crawford and State of Wisconsin, praying for the passage of an act for her relief by which she may receive the amount of twenty dollars per month for the period of six years, four months, and three days, being from the time of the death of her husband, Brevet Major Alexander Seymour, company C, fifth regiment infantry United States Army, to the 12th day of April, 1864.

By Mr. VAN AERNAM: The petition of 12 dealers in and manufacturers of cigars, of Olean, New York, praying Congress to pass a law to collect revenue on cigars by revenue stamps instead of inspector's stamps as now.

Also, the petition of 22 dealers in and manufacturers of cigars, of Jamestown, New York, on same subject.

By Mr. VAN HORN, of New York: The petition of Mrs. Jane McNaughton, asking for a pension in consequence of the death of her husband from diseases contracted while in the service of the United States.

By Mr. WILSON, of Ohio: The petition of James Trip and 78 others, citizens of Jackson county, Ohio, praying that a pension may be granted to William J. Jones, a destitute and insane soldier.

By Mr. WOOD: A remonstrance of cigar-makers and dealers of New York against proposed changes in tobacco tax.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 4, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Executive Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday; but was interrupted by Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I must object to that. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion being objected to, the reading of the Journal will be continued. It can only be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

The Executive Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

SECRETARY OF THE SENATE.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of a Secretary. I suppose the proper motion would be to accept the resignation of the present Secretary. Is there not a motion pending to accept the resignation of the Secretary?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Make that motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the resignation of the present Secretary be accepted, and that the Senate proceed to the election of a Secretary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. If there be no objection I move to suspend the rule that requires the election to be by ballot, that the Senate may come to an election by resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the rule that requires the election to be by ballot be suspended. It requires unanimous consent. Is there any objection? No objection being made it is dispensed with.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move that GEORGE C. GORHAM, esq., be elected Secretary of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF EX-PRESIDENT BUCHANAN.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I propose submitting a motion to the Senate, and I will preface it with a single remark. To-day the funeral obsequies of a very distinguished citizen of our country will take place at his residence in the county of Lancaster, Pennsylvania. He has held in the Government of the United States the positions of Representative in the lower House of Congress, of Senator in this body, of Secretary of State, of minister to Russia and to Great Britain, and finally the highest post known to our institutions, that of President of the United States. I suppose, under the circumstances, the Senate will not be disposed to proceed with the public business in which we are ordinarily employed, and I submit a motion that the Senate, as a mark of respect to the deceased, do now adjourn.

Mr. CAMERON. I rise to second the motion of my colleague, that the Senate adjourn out of respect to the memory of Mr. Buchanan, whose funeral takes place to-day. I wish to add to the motion, that when the Senate does adjourn it adjourn to meet again on Monday next.

Mr. BUCKALEW. My motion would only carry the session of the Senate over for the day. If my colleague desires to submit that modification of it I have no disposition to deprive him of the opportunity to do so. I will withdraw my motion if my colleague desires to submit his.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn being withdrawn, the question is on the motion that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next at twelve o'clock.

Mr. HARLAN. I hope that motion will not be adopted. As chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia I have been struggling to get a day for the consideration of the business that pertains to the people that live within it. One day was assigned last week, but the District business was crowded out by business that was supposed to be more important. Now, I hope that either on Friday or Saturday the Senate will give attention to that business. The motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW,] of course, is a very proper one, and every Senator present will feel disposed to adopt it. Business will consequently be suspended for to-day; but it seems to me the Senate ought not to adjourn over Friday and Saturday.

Mr. CAMERON. I will merely say, in reply to the Senator from Iowa, that if we adjourn to-day, very properly, as he says, to-morrow will be Friday and the next day Saturday. Some days are needed just about this time to prepare the Chamber for the summer session. Last week the Sergeant-at-Arms called on me, and desired me to make a motion then to adjourn over Friday and Saturday; but at my instance the motion was postponed until to-day. If we do not adjourn now we shall have to adjourn next Thursday, and I think we had better do it now. This day is gone, by the proper motion for adjournment which is made. It will hardly be necessary or proper for us to come back here to-morrow, especially as a number of Senators will be away, will go home because of the present adjournment. I think, therefore, we might as well now adjourn over until Monday, and we shall save time by it.

Mr. POMEROY. There are public measures of the greatest importance pressing upon the attention of the Senate, and I do not think we would be justified in adjourning until Monday. We have had so many adjournments, and are so far behind in business, and the hot weather is so pressing upon us, that I think we ought to husband our resources as well as our days, and make use of every one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I now renew my motion that the Senate, as a mark of respect to the memory of Mr. Buchanan, whose funeral obsequies take place to-day, do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 4, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the Journal, when, on motion of Mr. ALLISON, by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

BOURASSA AND OTHERS.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, the memorial and papers in relation to the claim of Bourassa, Bertrand, and Navarre were withdrawn from the files of the House without copies being left, the same having been printed.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1117) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1868, recommending concurrence in the same with an amendment.

The amendments of the Senate were reported, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following:

For deficiency in the appropriation for defraying the expenses of hydration of the Senate Chamber $3,000.

For deficiency in the appropriation for furniture and repairs, $5,000.

For deficiency in the appropriation for clerks to committees, pages, horses, and carriages, $15,000.

Amend the title by inserting after the word "to" the word "partially," and by striking out the word "partial," so that it will read "An act to partially supply deficiencies," &c.

The amendment of the committee was to add at the close of the Senate amendments the following:

To supply deficiency in the contingent fund of the Pension Office, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments of the Senate, as amended, were then concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF GEORGE FISHER.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask leave to report a special appropriation bill, containing an item that has passed this House three times, but was omitted in the general appropriation bill. I suppose there will be no objection. It is House bill No. 1121, to prevent an appropriation therein mentioned from lapsing because of delay in the adjustment.

No objection being made, the bill was considered. It provides that to enable the Secretary of War to carry out an award from the Department, made in pursuance of a resolution of Congress, approved June 1, 1860, in favor of the heirs and legal representatives of George Fisher, deceased, for military spoiliations by the United States troops during the war with the Creek Indians, the appropriation contained in the first section of the original act passed for the relief of the claimant, approved April 12, 1848, shall not be allowed to lapse in consequence of delay in the adjustment, and the same is hereby rescinded and made available, and that the rescinding resolution, approved March 2, 1861, which has had the effect of suspending the case be and the same is hereby repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that a report from a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is a report from the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection to its reception?

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume that the effect of the suspending act of 1861 is not very well understood, as the subject has not been very recently before the House.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I report the following amendment as a proviso to the bill:

Provided, That the sum allowed shall not exceed $16,000.

I may say that the sum originally allowed was $32,000. It has been adjusted until I think the sum ought not to exceed $16,000, and the claimant, who is the widow of Henry Winter Davis, has agreed to take that and have no further difficulty. It was not received on account of the death of Mr. Davis. I hope the report will be received.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the reception of the report.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SHIP GOLCONDA.

Mr. O'NEILL. I rise to a privileged question. I offer the following resolution for the purpose of correcting an error:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to request the return of the bill (H. R. No. 448) to change the name of the ship Golconda, the same having been inadvertently sent to the Senate as having passed the House.

The SPEAKER. This is to correct a manifest error.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its Clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 357) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ALLISON. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports; and the Committee on the Public Lands is entitled to another morning hour.

Mr. JULIAN. Before the hour begins, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a statement in reference to the business of the Committee on the Public Lands.

No objection was made.

Mr. JULIAN. The amount of business referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, as every gentleman knows, is very great, and much of it is important public business. It seems to be constantly on the increase, and the committee, I am sure, is anxious to do its whole duty. But it is wholly impossible within the two morning hours allowed us to dispose of the matters referred to us, which really demand the attention of Congress, and to which I think there will be no objection. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Public Lands may have an additional hour to-morrow if there are no private bills in the way, or if not to-morrow, immediately after the tax bill is disposed of.

Mr. PERHAM. I object to it so far as to-morrow is concerned. That is private bill day, and there are a number of pension bills that I desire the House to pass.

Mr. JULIAN. Then I ask that we may have an hour immediately after the tax bill is disposed of.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I object until the other committees shall have been called.

Mr. JULIAN. I do not mean to take the morning hour of any other committee, but only ask that we shall have an hour immediately after the tax bill is disposed of, not interfering with any other committee.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. Then I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks that the House grant unanimous consent that the Committee on the Public Lands may have an additional hour, to commence immediately after the tax bill is disposed of in the House. Is there objection?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object.

Mr. JULIAN. I have stated that I do not wish to interfere with the time of any other committee, but only that we may have an hour after the tax bill shall be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so stated.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to inquire if that arrangement would affect the rights of any other committee? Will it postpone the morning hour, or postpone the regular call of any other committee?

The SPEAKER. It probably would not come in the morning hour, but at a later period of the day, and postpone other business which will come up after the tax bill. What that business will be the Chair cannot now predict.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I must object, at least until the Committee on Appropriations have had an opportunity to dispose of several little appropriation bills, which should soon be considered.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced.

HOMESTEADS.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 934, amendatory of the act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, and of the acts amendatory thereof, approved March 21, 1864, and June 21, 1866.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and ordered to a third reading.

The bill was read at length. It provides that any person who may have been in actual service in the military or naval service of the United States during the late civil war, and who may have been honorably discharged therefrom, be, and such person is hereby, relieved from the payment of the fee required by the several acts of which this act is amendatory; provided, however, that this shall not be construed to relieve the party from the payment of the commissions allowed to the local land officers under the homestead acts. And provided further, that the proof of such actual service shall be produced according to such instructions as may be given by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with a view to give full effect to this act.

Mr. JULIAN. I desire to state, in one word, the object of this bill. It simply provides that in the case of any soldier or sailor honorably discharged from service during the late war the five dollars exacted of the claimant for eighty acres, or the ten dollars exacted for one hundred and sixty acres, shall be remitted. That is the whole bill, and I apprehend there will be no objection to it.

The bill is reported as a substitute for House bill No. 799, providing large land bounties for soldiers, upon which the Committee on the Public Lands have already made a report, which has been printed; and as the question of land bounties is again agitated, I beg leave to call the attention of the House to that report, which is as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred House bill No. 799, granting bounty land to soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States in the war of the rebellion, have had the same under consideration, and now respectfully submit the following report:

The proposition embodied in this bill should be considered under the twofold aspect of its relations to the soldier, and its effect upon the settlement and improvement of the public domain; and a few well-known facts, which properly belong to the inquiry, will clearly point the way to a just conclusion.

At the close of the last fiscal year there remained outstanding fifty-three thousand nine hundred and twelve military bounty-land warrants, issued under various acts of Congress, calling for the aggregate quantity of five million six hundred and three thousand two hundred and twenty acres. These warrants are selling at about one dollar per acre. Under the agricultural college act of 1862 scrip has been issued to non-public land-holding States to the amount of five million three hundred and forty thousand acres; and when the States of the South shall have received their shares under the act the whole amount of land covered by it will be nine million six hundred thousand acres. This will be the subject of monopoly in the hands of speculators, and the price of the scrip will depend, to a considerable extent, upon the quantity of it in market, and of the unlocated military bounty-land warrants. The price has generally ranged from sixty to seventy cents per acre, but has sometimes gone much lower. As further affecting the price of warrants and scrip, it should be remembered that over forty-three million acres of "swamp and overflowed lands" have been granted by Congress to the States, more than one half of which is probably in the hands of monopolists; that about two hundred million of acres have been granted to aid in building railroads and for other purposes of internal improvement, thus inaugurating further and fearful monopolies of the public domain; and that millions of acres of Indian lands, by virtue of the most pernicious treaty stipulations, are falling into the hands of monopolists, thus still further aggravating the wide-spread evils long since inflicted upon the country by the ruinous policy of land speculation. Every day gives birth to some new scheme of monopoly by which the paramount right of the people to homes on the public domain is abridged or denied, and its productive wealth seriously retarded; and no one will need be told that, should this policy be continued, the opportunities of settlement and tillage under the preemption and homestead laws must constantly diminish.

Keeping these facts in remembrance, the effect of the proposed measure upon the interests of the soldier must be quite apparent. It provides that "those who engaged to serve twelve months or more, and actually served nine months, shall receive one hundred and sixty acres of land; and those who engaged to serve six months, and actually served four months, shall receive eighty acres; and those who engaged to serve three months, and less than six months, shall receive forty acres." Under the first class specified there are two million thirty-seven thousand four hundred and thirteen soldiers, which number, multiplied by one hundred and sixty, gives the number of acres required, namely, three hundred and twenty-five million nine hundred and eighty-six thousand and eighty. Under the second class there are sixteen thousand three hundred and sixty-one soldiers, who, at eighty acres each, would require one million three hundred and eighty thousand eight hundred and eighty acres. Under the third class there are one hundred and ninety-one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, which, multiplied by forty, requires seven million, six hundred and seventy-five thousand four hundred acres. These are the official figures which have been supplied by the War Department, after first deducting the number of acknowledged deserters, those who paid commutation, and those who were dishonorably discharged. The total number of soldiers to be provided for, as will be seen, is two million two hundred and forty-five thousand six hundred and fifty-nine, and the aggregate quantity of land required is three hundred and thirty-four million nine hundred and seventy thousand three hundred and sixty acres, being more than one third of our remaining public domain, and at least one half the arable portion of the same. Now, considering the present price of college scrip, and of military bounty-land warrants, and the stupendous monopoly of the public domain which is constantly going on and threatening to swallow it up, what would be the natural effect of throwing upon the market two million two hundred and forty-five thousand six hundred and fifty-nine land warrants, made assignable by this bill, like those already issued? Every man can answer this question for himself; but the committee believe the price of warrants would fall as low as twenty-five cents per acre. It would, at all events, be a cruel mockery of the just claims of the soldier, and the policy in question cannot, therefore, be insisted upon in his interest. If land is what he wants he can have it on the liberal terms of the homestead law, prescribing, however, the indispensable necessary conditions of settlement and improvement. If a bounty in money is what he needs, and we admit the necessity, then let money be granted by Congress, and let the just claims of soldiers be equalized, by the payment of a fixed sum per month during the time of service, as provided for in the bill which has repeatedly passed the House of Representatives, and as repeatedly defeated in the Senate.

But this measure will appear far more indefensible if we consider its effects upon the settlement of the public domain. This subject was carefully considered by the House Committee on the Public Lands of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and perhaps we cannot do better than adopt their language in responding to a petition praying for bounties in land: "All the evils of land speculation, to an extent as alarming as it would be unprecedented, would be the sure result. Capital, always sensitive and sagacious, would grasp these warrants at the lowest rates. Land monopoly in the United States, under this national sanction, would have its new birth, and enter upon a career of widespread mischief and desolation. Speculators would seize and appropriate nearly all the choice lands of the Government, and those nearest the settled portions of the country, while homestead claimants and preëmptors would be driven to the outskirts of civilization, meeting all the increased expense and danger of securing homes for their families, and surrendering the local advantages of schools, churches, mills, wagon-roads, and whatever else pertains to the necessities and enjoyments of a well-settled neighborhood. This policy would stop the advancing column of immigration from Europe and of emigration from the States, which has done so much to make the public domain a source of productive wealth, a subject of revenue, and a home for the landless thousands who have thus at once become useful citizens and an element of national strength. It would, in fact amount to a virtual overthrow of the beneficent policy of the homestead law, which has, perhaps, done more to make the American name honored and loved among the Christian nations of the earth than any single enactment since the formation of the Government."

These considerations are quite as pertinent to-day as they were two years ago; indeed, time and events have given to them a new emphasis, and invested them with a meaning which the representatives of the people have no liberty to disregard. Considered in the light of the facts we have submitted, the measure under notice can only be regarded as a frightful scheme of spoliation and mischief; and while it was doubtless proposed in the imagined interest of the soldier, the committee cannot believe that the men whose valor and self-sacrifice saved the nation from ruin demand any such relief at the hands of Congress.

But while the committee earnestly urge these considerations, they believe the land policy of the Government ought to discriminate in favor of our honorably discharged soldiers and seamen, where this can be done consistently with the actual settlement of the public lands. Such discrimination may be made by declaring them absolutely free to such persons, save the trifling fees of the land officers, the aggregate of which forms an important part of their compensation, and cannot be remitted without disturbing the long-established and satisfactory machinery of our land policy. The committee therefore beg leave to report the accompanying bill as a substitute for that which they have considered, and which they ask may lie upon the table.

Mr. JULIAN. I also call attention to the following communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office upon the general subject of bounty lands, and particularly upon House bill No. 940, for the equalization of bounties, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The communication is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.
GENERAL LAND OFFICE, May 12, 1868.

SIR: I have examined the inclosed bill H. R. No. 940, to equalize bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines, who served in the late war for the Union, which I had the honor to receive from you with the request for a statement as to the probable effect of the measure in the light of the experience of this office.

I find the bill provides for the issue to soldiers, sailors, and marines, of interest-bearing certificates, to be used by them or their heirs in payment for public land which they may hereafter purchase from the Government, that such certificates are in no wise transferable, and that the interest will continue to accrue without limitation until the recipient may see fit to purchase land therewith.

The act of September 23, 1850, granting bounty lands to soldiers who had served in any of the wars in which the United States had been engaged, contained a provision that the warrants thereby authorized to be issued should be located by the soldier or his heirs, thus preventing their assignment and sale. This provision gave such general dissatisfaction that Congress passed the act of March 22, 1852, authorizing the transfer of any warrant then issued or to be issued.

The files and records of this office show that not one in five hundred of the land warrants issued and placed in the hands of the soldiers or their heirs have been located by them, or for their use and benefit, and further, that although the said act of March 22, 1852, made such warrants assignable; it is safe to assume that not to exceed ten percent, of them have been used by preëmptors as assignees in payment for actual settlements, the most part having been used by persons to acquire title to the public lands for speculative purposes.

Should the bill under consideration become a law and by future legislation be so modified as to make the certificates assignable or available to the soldier or his heirs without becoming settlers on the public lands, there is no reason that can be suggested by this office why results like those in respect to the past issues may not be looked for in regard to the certificates contemplated by the present measure, the effect of which would be to transfer to non-resident proprietors large bodies of the public domain.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOS. S. WILSON,
Commissioner.

HON. GEORGE W. JULIAN, House of Representatives.

In the light of these facts, Mr. Speaker, it is easy to see the effect of the measures referred to, or of any measure offering bounties in land. A communication has been addressed to me from the War Department showing that over one hundred million acres would be required by the bill of the Military Committee, which would fall into the hands of speculators, while mocking the just claims of the soldier to bounty.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would inquire what is the necessity for the first proviso of this bill, which is as follows:

Provided, however. That this shall not be construed to relieve the party from the payment of the commissions allowed to the local land officers under the homestead acts.

Mr. JULIAN. I will answer the gentleman. The land-office fees are a mere trifle to the individual claimant; yet they go to make up the aggregate of the compensation of the registers and receivers. To wipe that out would derange our entire land system and make it necessary to increase salaries generally, which we are not willing to do. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

F. N. BLAKE.

Mr. DRIGGS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1158) authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a patent to F. N. Blake for one hundred and sixty acres of land in Kansas; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The preamble of the bill states that military bounty-land warrant No. 82578, for one hundred and sixty acres, was issued, under the act of March 3, 1855, in the name of Betsy Foster, and by her sold and assigned to F. N. Blake, and thereafter lost by him; that Blake proved the ownership and loss of said warrant to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, who issued a duplicate warrant, which was located on the northeast quarter of section twenty-five in township six south, in range one east, in the State of Kansas.

The bill, therefore, provides that the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall cause a patent for the land to be issued to F. N. Blake as if the duplicate land warrant had been assigned to him by the warrantee.

Mr. DRIGGS. This bill has been prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and is all right.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DRIGGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MICHIGAN AND WISCONSIN LAND GRANTS.

Mr. DRIGGS also, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back a bill (S. No. 331) to extend the time for completing the military road authorized by an act entitled "An act granting lands to the States of Michigan and Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a military road from Fort Wilkins, Copper Harbor, Keweenaw county, in the State of Michigan, to Fort Howard, Green Bay, in the State of Wisconsin."

The bill, which was read, provides that the time for completing the military road and for the sales of the lands authorized by the act named in the title be extended till March 1, 1870.

Mr. DRIGGS. This bill simply proposes to extend till March, 1870, a land grant heretofore made to the States of Wisconsin and Michigan for a military road. This road, which is a wagon-road, is now partially completed; and we propose to extend the time, as will be seen, for only one year and ten months. This is petitioned for by a large number of the people of that country and by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin. The bill makes no new grant. This short extension is asked in consequence of the death of one of the contractors, by which the work was thrown back. The extension proposed is for the shortest possible time that will enable the parties to complete the road.

Mr. MAYNARD. Why does the bill say one year and ten months?

Mr. DRIGGS. The bill names the 1st of March, 1870, as the limit, which is one year and ten months from the present time. The bill has been delayed since its original introduction.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DRIGGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VIRGINIA MILITARY DISTRICT, OHIO.

Mr. ECKLEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 816) to authorize homestead entries in the Virginia military district in Ohio, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. ECKLEY also, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred a resolution directing an inquiry into the propriety of ceding to the State of Ohio the balance of public lands unclaimed therein, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1159) to cede to the State of Ohio the unsold lands in the Virginia military district in said State; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the lands remaining unsurveyed and unsold in the Virginia military district in said State be ceded to the State of Ohio upon the condition that any person who at the time of the passage of the act is a bona fide settler on any portion of the land, may hold not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres by him occupied by preemption in such manner as the Legislature of the State of Ohio may direct.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ECKLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VIRGINIA MILITARY DISTRICT IN OHIO.

Mr. ECKLEY, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 794, to reopen the land office in the Virginia military district of Ohio, and for other purposes, and moved that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF ACTUAL SETTLERS.

Mr. DONNELLY, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 23, to protect the rights of actual settlers upon the public lands of the United States, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read in extenso, provides that in no case shall more than three sections of public lands of the United States be entered in any one township by means of scrip issued to any State under the act approved July 2, 1862, for the establishment of an agricultural college therein.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, two or three words will explain the purpose of this bill. Under the existing laws as to agricultural scrip it can be located in any one State to the amount of one million of acres. It is sold at a low price, from fifty and sixty to seventy cents per acre. It has been in some States the means of great local injury by the location of scrip in great bodies, thus excluding settlement and preventing the development of the country. This provides that not more than three sections shall be located in any one township, so that the effect will be distributed, and there will be no injury done to the development of the country. If there are no questions to be asked I shall demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNELLY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVIGATION OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. DONNELLY, from the same committee, also reported back House bill No. 554, making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, with amendments.

The first section of the bill provides that there be granted to the State of Minnesota, for the purpose of aiding said State in constructing and completing a lock and dam at or near Meeker's Island in the Mississippi river in said State, and thereby facilitating the navigation of the Mississippi river between the Falls of Saint Anthony and the mouth of the Minnesota river, two hundred thousand acres of public lands, to be selected in alternate odd-numbered sections by an agent to be appointed by the Governor of said State, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; provided, that said lands shall be selected from the public lands lying within the limits of the said State of Minnesota, and that not more than one section thereof shall be selected in any one township; provided further, that said selections shall not be made from any lands designated by the United States as "mineral" before the passage of this act, nor from any lands to which rights of preemption or homestead have attached.

The second section provides that said lands so granted shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature of said State; and the said lock and dam shall be and remain forever a public highway, free from any toll or charge of any kind whatever; and the said Legislature shall have power to pass all needful rules and regulations that may be necessary to fully carry out the purposes of this act.

The third section provides that if said lock and dam are not constructed within two years from and after the date of the acceptance and disposition of this grant by the Legislature of the said State, the lands hereby granted shall revert to the United States.

And the fourth and last section provides that at any time after the selection of said lands, and subsequent to the completion of said lock and dam, the lands hereby granted shall be open for settlement by actual settlers, upon paying to the company who may construct said lock and dam a price not exceeding $2 50 per acre for the same.

The amendments are as follows:

In line five, section one, after the words "Meeker's Island," insert "so called."

In line sixteen, strike out "lands designated by the United States as 'mineral' before the passage of this act" and insert "containing mines of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper."

In line three, section three, after the word "State," insert "for the purposes mentioned in the first section of this act."

In line two, section four, strike out "said lands, and subsequent to the completion of said lock and dam."

Strike out in same section, lines five and six, "to the company who may construct said lock and dam;" and strike out "$2 50," and insert "$1 25" in lieu thereof.

Add to the section "which shall be paid by the State to the company who may construct said lock and dam."

Add the following section:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if at any time prior to the completion of the said lock and dam the Government of the United States shall make an appropriation in money sufficient to construct said lock and dam, then the grant of land herein shall revert to the United States.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I am afraid that this bill as it now stands might affect previous grants made to railroads.

Mr. DONNELLY. Not at all.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not think that is the intention, but I move to amend the last section by saying "this act shall not affect the lands already granted for railroad purposes."

Mr. DONNELLY. I accept the amendment. That was the intention of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot accept it, the bill being reported from a committee.

Mr. DONNELLY. I will permit it to be offered.

The amendment of Mr. STEVENS was agreed to; and the amendments reported by the committee were also agreed to.

Mr. DONNELLY. This is a grant which by its terms is confined to the limits of the State of Minnesota, and can apply only to lands lying in that State. The Legislature of Minnesota have unanimously memorialized Congress to make this grant. The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of Minnesota, on behalf of the people of said State which they represent, most respectfully yet earnestly memorialize your honorable bodies for aid to perfect the navigation of the Mississippi river to the Falls of St. Anthony, by an appropriation of lands therefor, in furtherance of the commerce of no less than ten States directly interested.

They would state, as an historical fact which cannot be successfully disputed, that up to 1857 steamboats of the average tonnage used on the Mississippi above St. Louis made regular trips to within two and a half miles of the falls, that is, to the rapids at the foot of the falls, and occasionally to the two cities situated on their banks; that such was the confidence inspired by these early efforts that large sums of money were expended by the citizens in warehouses, and in the removal of obstructions on the rapids, till the commercial disasters of 1858-59, followed by a series of unparalleled droughts, before unknown to the country, and the great civil war just ended, put an end to an enterprise which should be assumed or aided by the Federal Government, that has exclusive power to regulate commerce between the States. In consequence of these delays and public disasters, and the distance of the foot of the rapids (to which boats could regularly come) from the two cities at the falls, navigation hitherto has been suspended, or rather has receded some sixteen miles, to St. Paul, where all the freight destined to these cities (Minneapolis and St. Anthony) and the vast regions north and west dependent on them for their goods and groceries, must break bulk and be carried on cars or wagons to their destination.

The unnecessary expense of transhipping, draying, and rehandling all this freight almost insight of the falls, it is proposed to remedy by a lock and dam at the foot of the rapids, and thus practically extend the navigation of the Mississippi full sixteen miles, to its natural limit and proper terminus. Accordingly, the Legislature of Minnesota, fully appreciating the importance of the work, unanimously passed an act in 1857 to incorporate the Mississippi River Improvement and Manufacturing Company, with the leading object in view of perfecting the navigation to the falls by a lock and dam at or near the foot of the rapids, with the incidental privilege of using the water-power created thereby for manufacturing purposes; and as late as February of last year again expressed their sense of its necessity by extending the time for its completion. The original incorporators and the present officers and stockholders are all men permanently interested in the faithful prosecution and eventual success of the enterprise. The capital stock authorized is $200,000, nearly all of which has been taken, and $19,000, or ten per cent. of $100,000, paid prior to the organization of the company. But they cannot now look to the incidental advantage of using the water as any adequate return for their labor and capital, as the inexhaustible resources in this respect above and on the falls, already developed, are enough to supply all demands for years to come. The inadequacy, therefore, of compensation, present or future, from this source, must be apparent, when taken in connection with the fact that their charter requires them to lock boats and rafts through free and without charge.

The cost of the lock and dam is variously estimated all the way from one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand dollars. To expect the State of Minnesota to incur such an expense would hardly be reasonable, when every State washed by the Mississippi, from the Falls of St. Anthony to the Gulf of Mexico, is equally interested and benefited. It was equally unreasonable to exact of private capital a great commercial improvement when the Constitution has invested Congress with the charge of such works. Nor is it proposed to add to the burden of the Government by the further use of its credit, but only to ask a moderate share of that resource on which it is now the settled policy no longer rely as a fountain of revenue—the public lands. The hundred millions of acres already donated directly or indirectly to railroads, and additional millions of acres more for agricultural colleges and free homes, conclusively prove that it is no longer the purpose of the Government to look to this fund for revenue.

Your memorialists, therefore, ask a grant of lands to be passed to said company in installments, as their work on the lock and dam progresses and is approved by the United States Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with a bill which will be introduced at the present session of your honorable bodies.

They make this appeal in strong confidence of the justice of the case, and of the liberality of Congress toward a section of our country which, in addition to the trials incident to all new States, has just emerged from an expensive and exhaustive war, in which full one third of her adult male population was gloriously engaged.

They do not ask a grant to aid in the construction of a canal where none was before built, but to effect an extension of sixteen miles to the grandest canal on the globe, fed by the fountains of a continent and the clouds of heaven, a parent trunk which, with its hundred navigable branches, floats nearly two thirds of the entire commerce of the Union. Every mile of the navigation on the Mississippi permanently reclaimed adds a mile more to each of its tributaries, or, what is equivalent, to an increased commercial intercourse of one hundred miles, if there be so many navigable branches.

Neither do they ask the grant to open some new road, but to make some slight repairs of the natural track and beaten road of the commerce of the West, from the dawn of its first settlements. Your memorialists are aware of the generous grants already made in aid of railroads, and the marvelous development of the Northwest by their construction; but it is a singular fact that all these great thoroughfares are but the extensions of lines running east and west, giving the commerce and intercourse of the country a sectional bearing, and turning the trade over more expensive and unnatural channels. The North naturally wants what is produced or grown in the South, and the South what is grown or produced in the North. To supply one section with the surplus which can be spared by the other is just the business and appropriate office of commerce, and all the improvements of a growing and commercial people should be directed accordingly. The lumber regions of Minnesota certainly do not require a commercial thoroughfare through similar districts in Wisconsin, Michigan, and New York. That would be to carry coal to Newcastle. But rivers, railroads, and canals, looking from the pineries of Minnesota to the plains of Iowa, Missouri, and Illinois, just supply the mutual wants and necessities of both, taking lumber as a convenient illustration for the principle here contended for. So of flour, corn, pork, and beef, their best home market is and ever will be South. So, also, our woolen and cotton fabrics, or whatever else we may manufacture in the North or Northwest, will have their best market South or Southwest.

On the other hand, we are in just as much need of the productions of the South, as cotton, rice, sugar, molasses, &c. Direct communication, therefore, is both natural and necessary, and the all-beneficent Creator has graciously anticipated the wants and necessities of unborn millions in having given us exactly such a continuous means of supply and exchange from the Falls of St. Anthony to the Gulf of Mexico. That means is the Mississippi river, the cheapest and directest channel of intercourse and commerce between the sections. It is more: it is now and ever will be and remain the great regulator and moderator of fare and freights among the rival carriers of the commerce of the West. All recollect with what haste and facility the various railroad lines combined to increase the cost of travel, and double, and in some instances triple and quadruple, the cost of transporting the produce of the West during the late non-intercourse measures in the Lower Mississippi. So enormous were their rates that, high as all kinds of produce were, the agriculturists and other producers could not realize any remunerative returns, as all was swallowed up in commissions and freights, but which speedily receded as soon as the manacles of war were removed from the great Father of Waters.

While, therefore, there is a direct and peculiar interest in all the States south of us to the Gulf, to reach the cities at the falls without breaking bulk and transshipment, the manufacturing and the trade now centered there call aloud for this consummation. The raw material shipped, wheeled, or floated there for manufacture is simply enormous, though manufacturing there is but in its infancy. Wool, wheat, wood, iron, brass, mill-logs, rags, are there, by our facile water-power respectively worked into satinetts and broadcloths, flour, wooden-ware, implements and machinery, lumber and paper, most of which finds a market south of us. Hon. Horace Greeley, while on a visit to that city to attend our State fair last October, thus speaks of Minneapolis alone. After referring to the fact that we had about nine thousand inhabitants at the Falls of St. Anthony, he adds: "Minneapolis has advantages enough in her enormous yet facile water-power, which may be made to give employment to a population of one hundred thousand souls. It has no superior but Niagara, and surpasses that, inasmuch as the pineries above and the wheat and lands all around are calculated to supply it with profitable employment. And these are but the rude beginnings. Already, beside a paper-mill and other such, a woolen factory is in full operation, turning out eight hundred yards per day of satinetts and other substantial fabrics, all of which find an eager home market, as they will when the daily production shall have been quadrupled. Another such is nearly ready, and there is room and profitable business for a dozen more, and for cotton factories, also. Nowhere on earth are the beneficent influences of our protective tariff destined to be more signally or more promptly realized than through the great West. And this city, as one consequence, ought to quadruple its population within the next ten years."

The St. Paul Press, the leading journal of the State, and from whose locality could not be expected to do a rival over-justice, in its weekly issue of the 20th July last, uses the following words:

"The Falls of St. Anthony have already attained a poetical and practical reputation sufficiently wide to attract tourists and shrewd business men from hundreds of miles away. And well are they repaid for their investment. If nature can be supposed to have any eye to business, she must have made a speciality of this point, and her efforts are certainly entitled to commendation, for the towns situated upon either bank of the falls are undoubtedly destined to rank among the most prominent manufacturing places in the United States. A glance at the different branches of trade, and what has already been done, will convince the most casual reader of the correctness of the above statement."

The editor of the press then goes into a careful and elaborate examination of each leading interest or business in manufacturing. We shall only insert this summary of each, without publishing his observations in detail. Concluding his remarks on the lumber trade there, he says:

"To carry on such an immense business a large capital is necessarily employed, and few are aware of the amount that has been absorbed by the lumber trade at this point. A careful estimate based on the cost of the logs per thousand shows that, including the cost of the mills, about seven hundred thousand dollars are required to carry on the present lumber trade of Minneapolis, and $350,000 for that of St. Anthony, making the total capital required for the lumber trade at the falls $1,050,000. This, too, when the trade is comparatively in its infancy."

He thus speaks of its market and destination when manufactured:

Three rafts have been sent from Minneapolis and two from St. Anthony this season, and five more are nearly ready. Some of these rafts go as far as Memphis. Three million feet have been sent to St. Louis, and thence by steamer to New Orleans. In Minneapolis all the dealers have large yards, in which are immense stacks of lumber. A considerable quantity comes to the lumber yards in this city: one of the mill owners, Mr. Washburn, has a very large quantity in Wabashaw street. Upon the opening of the Central road in the fall, from fifteen to twenty million feet will be sent to Faribault and intermediate points. Large orders from Dubuque and other river points are being constantly received, and the demand is unprecedentedly large.

The following is his summary under the head of flour:

"The product of the custom mills we make no estimate of, as the amount must necessarily vary from day to day. The capacity of the three merchant mills is nearly six hundred barrels per day, and about four hundred are now being actually manufactured."

"The capital, including mill sites, &c., invested in this branch of trade, does not vary much from one hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

"A large quantity of the flour is, of course, used for home consumption. Our State is not largely supplied with flouring mills, and hence the mills have quite a large home trade. Large shipments are constantly made, the leading points to which it is sent being Boston, Chicago, and St. Louis."

He thus concludes his article on wooden ware, such as pails, churns, tubs, and measures:

"This firm nearly supply the whole State, and the river trade, as far as Dubuque, with wooden ware. High freights have prevented shipments which would otherwise have been made, but the demand near home has kept them constantly engaged. Some large lots have been shipped to St. Louis."

He thus speaks of a firm engaged in the manufacture of wool:

"This firm make weekly consignments of goods to large wholesale houses in Chicago and St. Louis. They also sell largely near home. The prices of their goods range from eighty-five cents to two dollars per yard. With the farmers they exchange cloth for wool, where goods are desired."

"The capital invested in the mill and stock amounts to $100,000."

"On the opposite side of the canal, Veazie, Demerott, & Browne have erected a fine three-story stone building, fifty by seventy, for a woolen factory. The building is now ready for the machinery, and they expect to have their factory in operation in the course of a month."

Of the manufacture of paper he says:

"This mill was started six years ago, and manufactures printing and wrapping paper only. Thirty hands are employed, and it is now making one thousand pounds of print and two thousand pounds of wrapping paper daily. The printing sells for twenty cents a pound, and the wrapping wholesale at six and a half cents. Fifty thousand dollars capital is invested in the business. The rags are obtained principally in the State, and are shipped up from as far down as La Crosse.

"This mill supplies the whole State and part of Wisconsin with printing paper, and its surplus manufacture is sent to Chicago."

He closes his article thus:

"The following table gives the amount of capital, as near as can be ascertained, in the leading branches of business:

Lumber trade.....	$1,050,000
Flouring.....	150,000
Wooden ware.....	20,000
Woolen mills.....	150,000
Paper mill.....	50,000
Sash, blinds, &c.....	15,000

Total capital..... 1,435,000

To which should have been added an iron and brass foundry, and machine-shop attached, with a capital of $75,000 invested..... 75,000

$1,510,000

"The following shows the daily products at the present time, but in most branches the capacity is greater.

Lumber, feet.....	400,000
Flour, barrels.....	400
Pails and tubs.....	800
Woolen cloth, yards.....	700
Paper, pounds.....	3,000

"No remarks of ours can add to the force of this array of figures; and when we consider the few years which have elapsed since the region where these manufactories now stand was inhabited, the result is truly surprising. This is but the beginning of the manufactories which will be attracted by this great natural power, and the most sanguine expectations will undoubtedly be more than realized."

But enough has already been exhibited, it is respectfully conceived, to attract the eye of the national Legislature to this future Lowell and commercial entrepot to the vast fertile regions north and west of us.

Your memorialists respectfully suggest that the grant of lands directly to said company is not in aid or furtherance of any system of internal improvements legitimately belonging to the State, but savors more of the extension of the navigation of the Mississippi, and the regulation of commerce between the States, and that, therefore, the work should be practically adopted by the Federal Government. But if your honorable bodies should regard the measure as coming properly under the head of State improvements, it is with great deference submitted whether a direct grant to the company, even in such a case, has not the sanction of authority and precedent in the cases of the Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western Railroad Company of Kansas, and the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California—"a corporation existing under the laws of the State of California"—whose grants of land and money both were passed directly to the companies by Congress.

Again, your memorialists, relying on the justice of their appeal, and the large and liberal views always manifested by Congress to facilitate intercourse between the States, and to encourage their commerce by whatever measure tends to lessen the rates of transportation and exchange, earnestly ask the attention of the national Legislature to the subject-matter of this their memorial.

THOMAS H. ARMSTRONG,

President of the Senate.

JAMES B. WAKEFIELD,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved, January 25, A. D. 1868.

WILLIAM R. MARSHALL,

Governor.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a measure demanded by the people of my entire State. Its object is to connect the navigable waters of the Mississippi river which now, for all practical purposes, extend only to the city of St. Paul, with the great water-power at the Falls of St. Anthony, the greatest available water-power on the face of the globe. It is a measure in the interest not alone of the farming and producing community of Minnesota, enabling them to reach, by navigable waters, that great water-power and carry to its mills their grain and wool and from it their lumber and manufactured goods by the cheap means of water communication, but it is in the interest of the entire valley of the Mississippi; of the entire sixteen thousand miles of navigable waters embraced in the mighty Mississippi basin, the richest and soon to be the most densely populated portion of the United States.

That great water-power is at the present time mainly devoted to manufactures of lumber and flour. The amount there manufactured even now in the infancy of the development of that water-power, is simply enormous. I learn that during the week ending May 22, 1868, the amount of freight forwarded from the Milwaukee and Minneapolis depot, in the city of Minneapolis, amounted to the enormous aggregate of three million six hundred thousand pounds! These shipments consisted mainly of flour and lumber. But besides these articles wool, iron, brass, paper, agricultural implements, and wooden manufactures, such as tubs and pails, enter into the total of the vast productions of that water power.

The following statistics will give in detail the character and amount of the several branches of manufactures in this Lowell of the West:

MINNEAPOLIS.

North Star Woolen Mill.

Built in 1864, by Eastman, Gibson & Co., proprietors. (W. W. Eastman, Paris Gibson, and John De Laitre.) A noble building, fifty by seventy-five feet, four stories in height, and cost $70,000.

This mill was the first at the falls operated by a power created by the fall of water through a perpendicular artificial shaft, discharging through a subterranean channel; a system which has since been adopted in a number of instances with remarkable results.

Minneapolis Woolen Mill.

Charles Kent Clapp & Co., proprietors. The company is composed of William T. Brown, Daniel W. Coon, and Henry L. Watson. This is a two-set mill. It is built of stone, forty by seventy feet, four stories in height, with a dry-house addition of wood, thirty by forty feet. The cost of the mill and improvement is $45,000. It has sixteen looms, seven hundred and twenty spindles, and employs thirty hands. The capacity of the mill is from four to five hundred pounds per day, and can turn out about three hundred yards of woolen fabrics per day. The product of this mill finds a ready sale in the State.

It is the interest, therefore, of the States of Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, Kentucky, Missouri, and all the States of that great valley, down to the mouth of the Father of Waters that this bill should pass. The people of those States desire cheap lumber and cheap flour. It is their interest that the vessels which navigate that river should be able to sail right up to the foot of its great water-power and receive their freight from the very doors of the mills. The vast, treeless, prairie region of Iowa, Illinois, and part of Missouri are especially interested in every measure which will cheapen the cost of the lumber brought from the pineries of Minnesota for their fences and houses.

The House will observe that this grant of lands is confined to the State of Minnesota. It is asked for by that State by its Legislature, by its people, by the cities of St. Paul, Minneapolis, and St. Anthony, by the farmers and lumber men of the State; and it is not in conflict with the interests of the State of Minnesota in respect to settlement and development, because the act expressly provides that the land shall be held by the State, not by any company, and shall be sold by the State to actual settlers at $1.25 per acre, and the proceeds of the sale paid for the improvement of the river. This amount of land at that price will yield just about the sum which, according to General Warren, will be necessary to construct that lock and dam.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to inquire where this lock and dam is expected to be located?

Mr. DONNELLY. In answer to that question I will state that General G. K. Warren, of the United States Army, under the direction of the War Department, and in compliance with an act passed by Congress, made a survey and examination of this portion of the river, and his report is that by the construction of a lock and dam, giving a rise of water of thirteen feet at Meeker's Island, between the city of St. Paul and the Falls of St. Anthony, complete and perfect navigation can be obtained to the foot of the falls; and he further estimates that the construction of such a lock and dam will cost $230,665, and he recommends that such a work be constructed. The following is an extract from his report on this subject, and also the report of Frank Cook, esq., civil engineer:

Navigation from Falls of St. Anthony to Fort Snelling.—Just above the Falls of St. Anthony [see sketch No. 6] the water-power companies have constructed a dam of timber and stone completely across the river, and at lowest stages the entire water of the river is passed through the mill wheels, leaving the crest of the old falls quite dry.

The top of the dam is about thirteen feet higher than that of the rock forming the crest of the old vertical fall, and the Mississippi is consequently dammed back some miles, obliterating the rapids there. This dam also retains the heavy sediment brought down by the river, so that little passes it.

The crest of the old fall is formed of a hard, magnesian limestone about twelve feet thick. Underneath this is a very soft siliceous sand rock, which extends down an unknown depth. It is easily worn away by the water, leaving the hard rock unsupported. This, then, breaks off. Quantities of it lie in the bed below broken into fragments of all sizes, from fifty to sixty feet square down to shingle and sand. The larger pieces, not being transportable by the water, have remained so as to fill up the bed and extend the rapids below. In the first two hundred feet space below the old falls the rapids descend about eight feet over these broken rocks, and these the Minneapolis Mill Company intend to partially remove, so as to increase the perpendicular fall to that amount. When this is done the whole available mill-power will be due to a fall of about thirty-five feet, made up as follows: fifteen feet in dam above falls, twelve feet old fall, and eight feet by clearing away rocks at the foot of the falls.

Much labor is being expended by the Water-Power Company to develop the locations for mill sites, and an extensive apron has been built below the old fall to prevent the capping limestone from being further undermined.

In the first three fourths of a mile below this the stream falls about fifty feet. Up to the lower end of this reach steamboats have come even in low water. The current of the river below, however, is very rapid, and large rocks obstruct the channel-way. The fall at low water from the foot of the reach last mentioned down to Meeker's Island, a distance of two miles, is about thirteen feet. After considering all the circumstances of the case, the conclusion was arrived at that a thorough improvement of this last two-mile reach could only be made by dam and lock, and that if a vessel could be brought up this far it would probably accommodate all the requirements of the present for both the cities of St. Anthony and Minneapolis.

I employed Mr. Frank Cook, civil engineer at Minneapolis, to make the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, both for locks and dams across the river, and also for locks with side dams and excavations along the shore. His report is herewith submitted. He reports the cost of dam across Meeker's Island, substantially built of stone and wood... $125,666 17 Stone lock, 13 feet lift, 375 feet long, and 60 feet wide, with guard and lock-gates complete... 104,059 31

Total... $230,665 48

The apprehension which I felt when I directed an estimate for a side canal and lock, as to the difficulty of securing permanency to the dam, I do not now feel; so I recommend the plan estimated for as above. The other project is not as good if accomplished, and would cost, according to Mr. Cook's estimate, $630,519. It is understood that no charge will be made by the proprietors of the land overflowed by the dam.

No special appropriation is deemed called for at this time for improving the channel below Meeker's Island. The boats estimated for in a previous part of this report can do all that is required.

Mississippi River from St. Paul to Falls of St. Anthony

MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA, December, 31, 1866.

SIR: In pursuance of your directions I have made a survey of the Mississippi river from the Falls of St. Anthony to the foot of the rapids, at Meeker's Island, in section thirty-one, township twenty-nine, range twenty-three, west of fourth meridian. I also made an examination of the river from the foot of the rapids to Fort Snelling, at the mouth of the Minnesota river. I have the honor to submit the following report and estimates, with the accompanying map:

From the foot of the rapids at Meeker's Island to Fort Snelling I made an examination of the river, at its low stage, last fall, and found not less than three feet of water, and that only at three places, the balance of the way the water being from four to six feet deep. The channel from this part of the river into the Minnesota river is deep and free from obstructions to navigation. All serious obstruction to steamboat navigation terminates at a point near the head of Meeker's Island, to which point boats can come when there is a fair stage of water, so that they can come to Fort Snelling.

From the Falls of St. Anthony to the foot of the rapids the distance is two miles and seventy-five hundredths, and the fall or difference in the elevation of the water in the Minneapolis dam, and the surface of the water at the foot of the rapids at the time I took my observations was eighty-eight feet. A dam with a lock constructed to lift thirteen feet will make slack water and good navigation to a point near and easily accessible to the mills and business part of the town. The bed of the river from the falls to the foot of the rapids is white sand rock, covered with broken limestone several feet in depth. At the point where it is proposed to locate the lock and dam I estimate the debris to be from three to six feet deep, and so firmly packed as to be nearly as solid as the original rock. With such material for a foundation there would not be any serious difficulty attending the construction of a dam.

The following estimates are for a lock three hundred and seventy feet long and sixty-five feet wide in clear, constructed to lift thirteen feet, with guard gate and two sets of lock-chamber gates. As there is an abundant supply of water for filling the locks at this place, there would not be any necessity for constructing intermediate gates to accommodate small boats. The walls of the lock are so located that the water could be introduced through culverts that would fill the lock in a short time. The dam from the lock to the island to be three hundred and fifty, across the island two hundred, and from the island to the left bank of the river three hundred feet, making in all eight hundred and fifty feet; the dam to be constructed with an inclined plane on the up-stream side of one foot and five tenths horizontal, to one perpendicular, with a weir twelve feet wide, and an incline on the lower side of one and one-half foot, horizontal to one foot perpendicular, carrying the water down to low-water mark, where it is to be received on an apron twenty-four feet wide, then on a sub-apron to be laid in an excavation in the bed of the stream, and twelve feet wide, the top of the last apron to be laid level with the bed of the river, and the lower or down-stream side of it to be laid in masonry and grouted, thus forming a perfect protection to the structure from the undertow of the stream as it passes over the dam.

The excavation across the island will be sand and gravel, and for the foundation to the lock and dam will be mostly broken limestone packed with gravel, the dam on the left bank of the stream to terminate in an abutment of masonry, which, with the wing wall, form the lock to the right bank of the river. The lock and that part of the dam across the island are to be built above high-water mark. In my estimate I have made them six feet above the weir of that part of the dam over which the water flows; six feet has been the limit of high water above the falls. The location of the dam is so near the falls that there need be no apprehension of danger from ice, as in passing over the dam and falls above it is broken up into small fragments. I have made my plans for a dam constructed of timber crib-work to be filled with broken stone; the foundation for the up-stream side and for the lower side of the sub-apron to be excavated and laid from three to six feet below the bed of the stream; the masonry to be laid in hydraulic cement and well grouted. The up-stream slope of the dam to be covered with six-inch plank, the down-stream slope with eight inches, and the crown or weir, with the aprons, to be covered with twelve-inch plank, well secured to the timber with two-inch trenails.

The walls of the lock, the wing-wall, and abutment to be laid in hydraulic cement and built of limestone, as quarried from the ledge in the bank of the river. The lime rock quarries out in regular courses, and with good, smooth beds, so that there would be very little cutting required, except to fit the timbers for gates and sills. There is an abundance of good lime-rock in either bank of the river, and the parties owning the land on each side at the place where it is proposed to break the lock and dam have granted the right to quarry what stone it would require to build the lock and dam, and the right to flow what land would be overflowed by the erection of a dam at the place proposed.

The following estimates are based upon the present high prices for labor and materials, and I have endeavored to make them high enough to cover all contingencies. The place where it is proposed to locate the dam is very favorable for turning the water away while laying the foundation.

A wing-dam, extending from the left shore of the river to the head of the island, would carry the water by the east side of the island, so that a slight dam below the works would keep the back-water out, and by taking small sections at a time the excavation could be made, and the foundations could be put in with a moderate amount of bailing water. After the foundations were laid the water would pass through the flood-gates on the east side of the island while the superstructure was being completed.

The following is my estimate on the plan which I have proposed:

Estimate for lock.
Timber for fenders, 42,636 feet, board measure, at $20.....	$852 72
Stone masonry in walls, 616,666 cubic yards, at $10.....	61,666 66

By the examinations and surveys just closed, and embodied in maps and estimates submitted, the feasibility of permanent and uninterrupted navigation to the Falls of St. Anthony is apparent, and the utility and necessity of it are well set forth in the memorial to Congress passed last winter by the Legislature of this State. This memorial accompanies this report as containing important facts bearing upon the question. It may be well enough to add that, since the passage of this memorial, the two cities at the falls have in less than one year's time made signal progress in population and production. Minneapolis alone has doubled her population, while St. Anthony, has gained a large percentage, and the two together now number nearly thirteen thousand inhabitants. Manufactures have gained in proportion. The manufacture of lumber has increased, and will this year approximate eighty million feet, the leading markets for which are the Minnesota valley and Mississippi and its tributaries. Up the former it can be shipped by barges at much less cost than by rail.

Besides, the mills and factories at the falls must ever depend upon the valley product of wool and wheat for a large share of their raw material, thus making a perfect reciprocity of communication and trade. The manufacture of cloth has also increased largely, the factories now yielding nearly two thousand yards per day, most of which is shipped to Chicago and St. Louis; but the great staple product of all is flour. This product is more than double what it was a year ago, amounting now to more than one thousand five hundred barrels per day. Large as this is, by the 1st of March next it will be duplicated.

When the mills erected this season are finished and in operation, a capacity for manufacturing over three thousand barrels per day will demand greater facilities for importing wheat and exporting flour than we now have, and none will be so cheap and direct as river transportation. Such competition in shipping is necessary to prevent extortionate prices, as well as to stimulate dispatch and vigilance in the carriers of our trade and commerce. Nothing is here said of the increased facilities this projected improvement in the navigation of the Mississippi will afford for importing our dry goods and groceries—interests now amounting to millions annually. It is also apparent from the foregoing estimates that these contemplated improvements of the navigation of the river will cost no more per mile than many miles of railway, and when once completed will connect directly the immense water-power at the Falls of St. Anthony with over sixteen thousand miles of water transportation, and will reduce the portage from ten to less than one mile, and place the surplus products of our farms and factories in direct and cheap communication with consumers and producers of the lower valley and tributaries. It would be difficult to conceive of a work which, with so small outlay, would confer benefits equal to these.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
FRANK COOK,
Civil Engineer.

Brev. Maj. Gen. G. K. WARREN, Major of Engineers, 112 East Seventeenth street, New York city.

Mr. Speaker, we could very properly have come here and asked of this Government a money appropriation for this great and highly important work; but in view of the embarrassed financial condition of the country, in view of the great pressure of taxation upon our people, and the indisposition of Congress to increase those burdens, we have not proposed to demand a grant of money. We have simply asked that we shall take from the public lands in Minnesota—public land which the Government proposes to give away under the homestead and preemption laws—the quantity named in the bill, without, at the same time, taking the lands away from the settler. I do not think even the settlers of the country would object to this measure. A large number of them already prefer to pay $1 25 per acre to the Government for their lands under the preemption law, rather than take them at the expiration of five years for nothing under the homestead law. This bill will, therefore, be in effect simply the diverting of the proceeds of two hundred thousand acres of land, at $1 25 per acre, amounting to $250,000, from the general Treasury of the United States to the State of Minnesota, to be used in constructing this great work. I should, of course, prefer a grant of $250,000 in money; and I have, therefore, added to the bill a proviso that if at any time before the completion of the work the Government grants a money appropriation sufficient to construct the work, then the land granted by this bill will revert to the General Government. This will leave open the door for a money grant at any stage of the work.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether this work is expected to be done under the direction of the United States authorities or not?

Mr. DONNELLY. Not necessarily, although we have no objection to its being done according to the plan and estimates of the engineer department, and I would accept an amendment to that effect.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the work is to be done at all, and we are to pay for it, I think we ought to have the direction and control of the manner of doing it.

Mr. BLAINE. In that case it will cost ten times as much as it otherwise would.

Mr. DONNELLY. If the gentleman from Tennessee will draw up his amendment I have no objection to its being adopted.

Mr. BLAINE. Works of this kind that the Government prosecutes through its own officers invariably cost more than similar works done in any other way.

Mr. MAYNARD. But when they are done they are done to some purpose. If we leave this work to be done in any other way we might just as well throw the money at first to the bottom of the Mississippi for any good that it will do.

Mr. BLAINE. We have an example in the attempt to keep clear the mouth of the Mississippi river. Private individuals are now doing what the United States attempted ineffectually to do for twenty-five years.

Mr. DONNELLY. I will accept such an amendment as the gentleman from Tennessee may propose.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move, then, to add the words:

The work to be done under the direction of the engineer department of the United States, according to the plan and estimates submitted by Major General Warren.

Mr. DONNELLY. I now demand the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 58, noes 37.

The main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. MAYNARD's amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. DONNELLY. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DONNELLY. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that demand. There are other members of the Committee on the Public Lands who have business to present from that committee, and as we have but an hour to report in, they will not have time if the gentleman insists on the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. When a bill is to be passed without discussion giving away a portion of the public domain, I shall insist on the yeas and nays if I can get them.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 57, nays 45, not voting 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Beck, Benton, Blaine, Broomall, Cullom, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Farnsworth, Fields, Griswold, Higby, Hopkins, Ingersoll, Kitchen, Koontz, Laflin, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McCormick, Miller, Murrell, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, O'Neill, Paine, Pile, Poland, Polesie, Pomeroy, Price, Sawyer, Schenck, Seefeld, Smith, Starkweather, Stokes, Taffe, John Trimble, Trow-

Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—87.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. DONNELLY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS GRANTED TO NEVADA.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with an amendment, Senate bill No. 190, to further provide for giving effect to the various grants of public lands to the State of Nevada.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that the State of Nevada is authorized to select alternate even-numbered sections within the limits of any railroad grant in said State, in satisfaction, in whole or in part, of the several grants made in the following acts of Congress, to wit: the act organizing the Territory of Nevada, passed March 2, 1861; the act admitting the State of Nevada into the Union, passed March 21, 1864; and the act concerning certain lands granted to Nevada, passed July 4, 1866, provided that this privilege shall not extend to lands upon which there may be rightful claims under the preemption and homestead laws; and provided that if lands be selected, the minimum price of which is $2 50 per acre, each acre so selected shall be taken by the State in satisfaction of two acres, the minimum price of which is $1 25 per acre. And provided further that the lands granted in the eighth and ninth sections of the said act admitting Nevada into the Union shall be selected within four years from the passage of this act, and the period for the selection of said lands is hereby so extended.

The second section provides that the lands known and designated for the establishment of an agricultural college by the act of July 2, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereto, shall be selected in the same manner and of the same character of lands as may be selected in satisfaction of any other grants referred to in the first section of this act. But this act shall not authorize the selection of lands valuable for mines of gold, silver, quicksilver, or copper.

The third section provides that the land office at Belmont, Nye county, State of Nevada, is hereby removed to Aurora, in Esmeralda county, and the district shall be known as the Aurora district. The counties of Nye, Lincoln, and Lander shall constitute a land district, the office of which is located at Austin; and the President shall be authorized hereafter, from time to time, as circumstances may require, to adjust the boundaries of any and all of the land districts in said State, and change the location of the land office from time to time, when the same shall be expedient.

The fourth section provides that the lands granted to the State of California for the establishment of an agricultural college by the act of July 2, 1862, and acts amendatory thereto, may be selected by said State from any lands within said State subject to preemption and sale; provided that this privilege shall not extend to lands upon which there may be rightful claims under the preemption and homestead laws, nor to mineral lands; and provided further, that if lands be selected as aforesaid, the minimum price of which is $2 50 per acre, each acre so selected shall be taken by the State in satisfaction of two acres, the minimum price of which is $1 25 per acre; and provided further, that such selections shall be made in every other respect subject to the conditions, restrictions, and limitations contained in the acts hereby modified.

The amendment of the committee was to the third section of the bill, to strike out the following:

The land office at Belmont, Nye county, State of Nevada, is hereby removed to Aurora, in Esmeralda county, and the district shall be known as the Aurora district. The counties of Nye, Lincoln, and Lander shall constitute a land district, the office of which is located at Austin.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The county of Esmeralda, in the State of Nevada, and the counties of Mono and Inyo, in the State of California, are hereby created a land district; and the land office for such district shall be located at Aurora, in Esmeralda county.

Mr. WARD. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Nevada whether this bill relates simply to school lands.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. The only lands to be affected by this bill are school lands, except twenty sections for public buildings and twenty sections for penitentiaries, the same quantity granted to all the new States. Otherwise the bill relates exclusively to the lands granted to the State of Nevada for school purposes. As the surveys in Nevada are only extended where the railroads are to be built, and as the Commissioner of the General Land Office has ruled that we cannot take those lands because they are double the minimum price, this bill provides that we may take them at the rate of one acre for two. The object is to build up our school fund. The bill does not grant a single additional acre, but simply enables us quickly to locate our school lands at a point where we can sell them. That is the only object of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the gentleman from Nevada to state that this bill does not grant additional lands, but provides for the manner in which those already granted shall be secured to the State.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. That is all. The bill contains no grant of lands.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CITIES AND TOWNS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, also, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with an amendment, a bill (S. No. 188) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of the inhabitants of cities and towns upon the public land," approved March 2, 1867.

The bill, which was read, provides that the inhabitants of any town located on the public lands of the United States may avail themselves, if the town authorities elect so to do, of the provisions of the act of March 2, 1867; provided that this shall not prevent the issuance of patents to persons who have made or may make entries and elect to proceed under existing laws; and provided further, that no title under the act of March 2, 1867, shall be acquired to any mining claim or possession held under the existing laws of Congress. It is provided further, that, in addition to the minimum price of the lands included in any town site entered under the provisions of this act and the act of March 2, 1867, there shall be paid by the parties availing themselves of the provisions of these acts all costs of survey and platting any such town site and expenses incident thereto incurred by the United States before any patent shall issue therefor.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line thirteen insert the word "valid" before the words "mining claims."

Mr. MAYNARD. Is there a written report in this case?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. There is not; but I can state in a word all there is of it. In 1864 we allowed town sites upon the public lands to be entered in this wise: individuals might apply to the land office to enter a lot on paying ten dollars therefor. That was the rule up to 1867. We then passed a law that towns upon the public lands might apply in their corporate capacity to get title for lands upon which the towns stand. In Nevada our towns have applied as individuals under the old law of 1864 for title to lots, paying ten dollars a lot. We have to go to the land office at Carson City, two hundred miles off, and it has been found impracticable, and the Government makes nothing out of it. The land commissioner holds that having applied under the old law we cannot apply under the new law. This is to remedy that.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGISTERS' AND RECEIVERS' COMPENSATION.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, from the same committee, also reported back House bill No. 652, to increase the compensation of registers and receivers in the Territory of Idaho, with a substitute.

The bill, which was read, provides that the annual salary of registers and receivers in the Territory of Idaho be, and the same is hereby, increased to the sum of $3,000.

The substitute provides that the annual salary of the registers and receivers of the United States land office shall be increased to the sum of $1,000. This increase to take effect on the 1st of July next, and to continue for two years and no longer, provided such increased salary, together with fees and commissions now authorized by law, shall not exceed the annual sum of $3,000 to each officer.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, I have simply to say this: that bill provides for a temporary increase of the salaries of registers and receivers throughout the United States, not to increase them, however, in any event beyond $3,000.

The bill was first introduced for the Territory of Idaho, on the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Then it was limited to certain States and Territories, and the increase was to $1,000. The reason of that was that they were allowed no rent in those districts. Five hundred dollars in Idaho, Montana, and Nevada, does not pay for office rent. I have the letters of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, but I will not take up the time of the House in reading them. He recommends the temporary increase that I have reported in the pending substitute.

Mr. HARDING. Is the gentleman acquainted with any register or receiver who has followed the business who did not get wealthy? Are not these places sought after for the purpose of making fortunes?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. It is not so in Nevada and Idaho. There are no facilities afforded there for making fortunes.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Is this reported from the Committee on the Public Lands?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. It is, and it has been recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It is only a temporary increase for two years.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have no objection to the portion of the bill which the gentleman has explained, if it is the same bill; but I do not like to see smuggled up in a little land bill an increase of salary for a large number of persons whose salary, in the judgment of a good many people, is too large now. I have a great many letters from persons in my district who have traveled through these districts asking whether they could not get these appointments, as they are valuable and profitable. I hope if the previous question be called that it will be voted down; and then that the whole thing will be voted down.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. I would myself prefer to have it confined to the Territories and States designated. But I must demand the previous question. I have not time to yield further.

Mr. WARD. How much is the increase?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. Five hundred dollars.

Mr. WARD. It applies to all. How much will it cost the Government annually?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. I do not know how many registers there are.

Mr. WARD. It must be a very large amount.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask a question. Is there any particular reason why the increase should be made in the Territory of Idaho, more than in the other parts of the United States? The original bill is confined to one Territory. Was there a greater reason for the Commissioner of the General Land Office recommending an increase in this Territory than elsewhere?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. There was a greater reason for making it in these Territories than in other parts of the United States, but the Commissioner has recommended it to be general, and the committee so directed me to report.

Mr. SCOFIELD. One word. An effort was made to give the district judges of the United States an increase of salary of $500. This is the same amount that those officers get. The House voted it down very largely. The same thing was tried in the Senate.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. What judges get only $500?

Mr. SCOFIELD. District judges get only $2,500. The gentleman's bill provides that the whole sum shall not exceed $3,000. He is asking an increase of $500. A similar increase was asked for the district judges and it was refused.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over till Tuesday next in the morning hour.

BOOKS FOR NATIONAL ASYLUMS.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the tax bill, I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 278) to supply books and public documents to the national asylums for disabled volunteer soldiers, for the purpose of concurring in the amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was reported, to insert after the word "Wisconsin" the words "and the soldiers' home at Knightstown Spring, near Knightstown, in Indiana."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I report back from the Committee on Reconstruction the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1022) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the internal tax bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate will be closed in an hour and a half. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. I yield ten minutes to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, it cannot be expected that for the short time allotted me that I could enter fully upon the discussion of the bill now under consideration, containing two hundred and eighty-nine sections. I may say here that the Committee of Ways and Means deserve the thanks of this House and the country for the able manner in which they have presented the subject of raising the internal revenue. The laws on that subject had become complicated, and this bill digests the whole subject-matter in as narrow a compass as can well be done. There are some taxation in this bill that I think is too high; on that, however, I may have something to say when the bill is read for amendment. I am aware that a bill of the length and magnitude of the one before the House imposes a heavy task upon members to examine it in detail. We are much enlightened from the chairman [Mr. SCHENCK] by the able exposition he gave in the opening speech. The bill remodels the revenue department, and dispenses with many useless officers that have been detrimental to an honest assessment and collection of the revenue.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, I am happy to say, in a great measure exempts all the industrial interests of our country from taxation and confines it to what is denominated luxuries; and I trust by next session we can entirely dispense with income tax; and I understand such is the opinion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. The main subject of taxation that will demand the serious consideration of this House is that to be imposed on distilled spirits and tobacco. The frauds committed upon the collection of the revenue have been astounding. The amount of spirits distilled annually is difficult to ascertain; some estimate it at one hundred million gallons, and others from that down to fifty or sixty millions, but that it is more than double the quantity that meets taxation no one can doubt, while it must be conceded enormous frauds are committed. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe Mr. McCulloch, the Secretary of the Treasury, to be an honest man, and deeply deplores the failure to collect the revenue on whisky; as for Mr. Rollins, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, no more upright man lives. But the fault lies with the subordinates who become connected with what is denominated "the whisky ring," for in that traffic, in many places, bribery and perjury are rife. The report of our worthy Commissioner of Internal Revenue (Mr. Rollins) says the revenue collected on distilled spirits—

For 1865 was.....	$15,995,701 66
For 1866 was.....	29,195,573 15
For 1867 was.....	28,296,264 31

It may be proper to state that for the first six months of the year 1865 the tax was $1 50 per gallon, and afterward raised to two dollars per gallon. The expense of collecting the internal revenue for the year 1866 was $7,689,700 46, and for the year 1867, $7,712,089 02. It is, in my opinion, fair to presume that it cost the Government in the neighborhood of three million per annum to collect the whisky tax; and from the information we have received the whole amount of revenue collected the present year from tax on whisky will be but a little over thirteen million dollars, and deducting from that $3,000,000 for its collection, leaves but $10,000,000 realized from the vast amount of whisky manufactured in this country, even at a tax of two dollars per gallon; and the question for Congress to determine is, how are these alarming frauds to be checked? I think, Mr. Chairman, the remodeling of the internal revenue department, as proposed by the bill before us, will aid somewhat in remedying the evil. That a change should be made in many cases of those who have charge of the collection of the revenue no person can doubt, as some of them, it is evident, are dishonest, and have aided in defrauding the Government, and become wealthy upon a small salary, evidently by connivance with the whisky ring.

These fraudulent officers are mainly confined to cities and large manufacturing establishments, for the small establishments in the country generally pay their taxes honestly, and are watched more zealously by Government employes than large manufacturing establishments, where immense frauds are committed. The Secretary of the Treasury, though, as I have already said, an honest man, has committed many errors in not removing such officers; but I admit the course of the President, to whom such incompetent and dishonest officers appeal, professing to be his ardent friends, places the Secretary in an awkward position, as it is well known President Johnson will favor the appointment of almost any person who professes to be unfavorable to the congressional policy; hence one reason why the Government has been defrauded out of so much revenue, by keeping dishonest men in office. There is another and important question as to the prevention of frauds, and that is whether or not the tax on whisky is too high; and if reduced, whether more revenue could not be collected from that article, (whisky.)

I find, Mr. Chairman, that the tax of Prussia is now nine and three quarter cents per gallon; of Austria a little more than twelve cents per gallon; and of France about ninety cents per gallon. On the other hand, Great Britain imposes a duty of ten shillings per imperial gallon, about the present tax of this country; and Russia raises an immense revenue, monopolizing its manufacture and sale, selling the privilege of dealing in, and reserving to itself the right of distilling all domestic liquors and supplying dealers at a fixed rate. This latter mode of procedure would not likely work well in the hands of our Government, and besides, would be incompatible with our institutions. We must, therefore, intrust the manufacturing interest to our citizens. We have, perhaps, more difficulty in collecting such taxes than in monarchical Governments, where the people are held more in subjection. Two dollars of a tax on a gallon of whisky is certainly disproportionate, as the cost of making may be put down at thirty cents, and I have no doubt such a glaring disproportion in taxation is in some measure the cause of so much dishonesty in evading the due execution of the revenue laws, demoralizes the manufacturer, and by connivance with the Government officers leads them into the same paths of dishonesty, and all together become rich by robbing the Government out of its just dues. It may be conceded that as a beverage it would be better for the nation if the traffic of liquor could be dispensed with, but experience has shown that that desirable object cannot be accomplished by stringent laws, and the only way to dispense with the use of it in that way is by moral suasion. Then, as the distillation of spirits is in some measure sustained by public opinion, and notwithstanding a very large quantity is distilled over and above what is needed for manufacturing purposes, in what way can the largest amount of revenue be derived from it?

Upon a careful consideration, Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that a reduction of the tax would tend to check demoralization and produce a much larger revenue, and the question is, how much ought it to be reduced? Some contend that it ought not to be more than fifty cents per gallon; that if it was more than that it would not be sufficient to prevent the enormous frauds perpetrated by the distillation of spirits from cheap molasses imported, for every device has been resorted to to defraud the Government by illicit distillation. For my part I will not agree to put the tax below fifty cents per gallon, and even at that, if there should be one hundred million gallons distilled and returned for taxation it would amount to $50,000,000, and if seventy million gallons to $35,000,000, or if but sixty million gallons it would amount to $30,000,000, which is more than ever derived by the Government in any one year from the distillation of whisky. I am satisfied that at least $30,000,000 could be derived per annum at a tax of fifty cents per gallon. At any rate, I am opposed to the tax being more than one dollar per gallon, as I feel confident that more revenue could be collected and less inducement to commit fraud. And whatever amount of taxation we agree upon, let its collection be rigorously enforced by competent and honest officers; and if the President will not agree to remove incompetent and dishonest men he ought to be proceeded against, notwithstanding there are but a few months of his term remaining. It is his sworn duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and the country demands it.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, as contended by some, that men cannot be found that will faithfully enforce the collection of the revenue. We have plenty of honest men, if appointed and paid a fair salary, who will honestly and faithfully do their duty, and that neither the whisky "ring" or any other can operate upon. I trust, therefore, that a reduction of the tax will be made, as I believe it for the interest of the country. I am opposed to raising the tax on the manufacture of common cigars, as it is increasing the tax upon the poor man; and if it is a luxury to smoke, let him enjoy it as well as the rich, though he cannot afford to smoke as fine a quality of cigars.

As my time has expired, I cannot extend my remarks, but will say, in conclusion, that I am pleased with the general features of the bill, and trust Congress will, before final adjournment, enact it into a law. The national debt, though some twenty-five hundred million dollars, is not burdensome, taking into consideration the resources of this great country; and I am not in favor of this generation, who have paid such enormous sums in suppressing the late rebellion and its consequences, paying off the entire national debt, but leave a portion of it to be defrayed by the next, to whom this great Republic will descend.

Mr. MAYNARD addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman, I know how anxious every member of this House is to reach the practical business of this tax bill, and how reluctant all are to listen to the general debate. But I beg to mention to gentlemen that if they will, as we progress with the reading and consideration of this bill, give it careful attention, they will find that, notwithstanding the voluminous bill which appears before them, we can proceed with great rapidity in its consideration; for there are really but three controverted propositions in the bill, as I believe. One is the first proposition having reference to the subject which has just been so ably discussed by my colleague upon the committee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] that of a separate department. Another is the question involved in the collection of the tax upon distilled spirits; and the other the proposition having reference to the tax upon tobacco.

I desire, in the time allotted to me, to make some general remarks upon the question of taxation, alluding also to some specific provisions of the bill; and I shall endeavor to show that there is in this bill enough to provide ample revenue for the maintenance of the Government and the payment of interest on the public debt, together with a reasonable surplus to be applied to the payment of the principal of the debt.

I listened last night, Mr. Chairman, with intense interest and admiration to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wood.] I was glad to hear from him, a leader of the Democratic party, that that party proposes in no form whatever to repudiate the national obligations, but that every dollar of those obligations must be paid in the letter and spirit in which those obligations were created; and although I cannot agree with him as to the method of its payment, yet I think there was enough in all the gentleman said last night to give hope to the country. I agree with him there is yet undeveloped, in the far West, extending from the frozen regions of the North down to the tropics, lands filled with mineral resources almost invaluable—

"Far away,
On waters whose blue surface ne'er gave back
The white man's face, among Missouri's springs
And pools, whose issues swell the Oregon," are to be found sources of wealth which, either by individual enterprise or by the Government, will be in the future developed, and I think will aid us in lightening the burdens of taxation which now press so heavily upon us, which development is to be rapidly hastened by the building of railroads binding the Atlantic to the Pacific with iron bands.

Mr. Chairman, the policy of Congress during the past few years has been to reduce the burdens of taxation as well as to reduce the expenses of the Government. From necessity, during the years of the war, we were compelled from year to year to increase our taxes; and laws were passed constantly increasing taxes, commencing, I believe, with the year 1862, then in the year 1863, and finally the act of June 30, 1864, which enormously increased the burdens of the people in the shape of internal taxes, as well as in the shape of tariff laws. During that year there was an entire revision of the internal revenue and tariff laws. The act of March 3, 1865, still further increased taxation. This increase was absolutely necessary in order to sustain the public credit and to carry on the war against the formidable rebellion against the Government. At the close of the hostilities in 1865 it was the first business of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, when it assembled in 1865, to proceed to the consideration of the questions involved in the reduction of the taxes. At the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress a law was passed reducing the burdens of taxation to the extent of $60,000,000; and at the second session of the same Congress a law was passed which had the effect still further to reduce those burdens to the extent of $40,000,000 more. This Congress, at its present session, following up this principle and this policy, has reduced the burdens of taxation upon the people to the extent of $80,000,000 more. Twenty-three million dollars of reduction of taxation has been made to the people of the rebellious States in the shape of the abolition of the tax on raw cotton. The remainder of this $80,000,000 of reduction has taken place upon the industry of the country, which, next to agriculture, is the life-blood of the nation; as unless we foster every branch of our industry we cannot expect to flourish as a people.

The following statement shows the total amount received under operation of the internal revenue laws and the custom laws for the fiscal years 1864, 1865, and 1866, and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and the actual and estimated receipts for the current year:

1864—Internal revenue.....	$116,850,672 00
Customs revenue.....	102,316,152 99
	219,166,824 99
To which add from miscellaneous sources.....	41,465,892 01
Total, 1864.....	$360,632,717 00
1865—Internal revenue.....	$211,129 529 00
Customs and miscellaneous sources.....	118,437,471 00
Total, 1865.....	$329,567,000 00

The following table shows the aggregate and specific receipts of national revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, and 1867, respectively:

	1866.	1867.
From internal revenue.....	$310,906,984 17	$265,920,474 65
From customs, (coin)....	179,046,651 58	171,417,810 88
From public lands.....	665,031 03	1,663,575 76
From miscel's sources....	67,119,369 91	42,824,852 50
From direct taxes.....	1,974,754 12	4,200,533 70
	$559,712,790 81	$490,526,947 49

The following indicates the receipts for the current fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, actual and estimated:

Sources.	Receipts.
	Actual.	Estimated.
Three quarters, from July 1, 1867, to March 31, 1868.	$121,298,374 37	$44,000,000
Fourth quarter, from April 1, 1868, to June 30, 1868.	866,337 31	300,000
Total revenue for fiscal year ending June 30, 1868.	$122,164,711 68	$44,300,000
Also, gross estimated receipts for 1869.	$299,194,459 29	$338,000,000

The following table will show the expenditures of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1866 and 1867 respectively, being the two full years of which we have any report since the suppression of the rebellion, exclusive of any payment on the principal of the public debt, namely:

For the year ending June 30, 1866.
Ordinary expenditures.....	$387,683,198 79

Expenditures.

posed by this bill to raise, chiefly from luxuries, a sufficient amount of money in connection with our customs revenue to maintain the public faith and credit, and at the same time provide for the support of the Government and still leave a surplus to be applied to the payment of the principal of the public debt. And now, notwithstanding the criticisms of gentlemen on this floor, I assert here, and I believe it cannot be successfully contradicted, that since the close of the war we have reduced the ordinary expenditures of the Government by the legislation of Congress. And from the estimates before us—and they are estimates not for the purpose of carrying a political campaign, as was intimated in the debate here last night, not estimates made to be supplied in a deficiency bill when we come again on the first Monday of December, after the Presidential election—but they are estimates based upon the actual expenditures that must be made during the next fiscal year. From these estimates we shall be able to make a still further reduction of nearly thirty million dollars in the ordinary expenditures of the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the method adopted by Congress in relation to the subjects which could be relieved from taxation, I desire to say a word. I believe when the question of the removal of the tax on cotton was before the House there was very little objection to it. All admitted that it was essential to the revival of the industry of the southern States that the duty should be removed after the crop of 1867 had reached a market. There was some contrariety of opinion as to whether we should remove the entire tax upon the industrial interests of the country. All agreed, I believe, that the taxes upon industry are the most odious and obnoxious that can be imposed, for the reason that from necessity they are duplicated and reduplicated many times. Therefore it is difficult to tax industry and make a just system of taxation.

Now, the effect of this tax upon the people of the country will be determined somewhat by the result of the removal of this tax. Should its effect be to stimulate the manufacturing interests of the country, then it will be satisfactory to the consumers of the country; but if it should not have that effect, so as to create competition, the removal of the tax will be an addition of about ten per cent. to the tariff or import duties, at least upon such articles as are imported and come in competition with our domestic productions.

So that if industry is stimulated to such an extent as to create a home competition, the result will be to the benefit of the consumer. Should that not be the result, the effect will be beneficial to the manufacturing industry of the country, and to that extent we have raised the tariff during the present session. I am unable to say precisely what that effect will be, but my own impression is that this benefit will be divided at last between the consumer and the manufacturer. The Committee of Ways and Means have decided—I think I can speak of it now, because it is a matter of publicity—the committee have decided at the present session to make no general revision of the tariff.

Mr. BLAINE. Do they propose a partial one?

Mr. ALLISON. If we make any at all, it will apply to only a very few articles, and I desire to say here that, in my judgment, no such general revision is required unless it should be to readjust the duties so as to make reductions upon most articles; upon some articles it may be necessary to make an increase. I believe, so far as I have been able to ascertain, that the great manufacturing interests of this country will not materially suffer by this action of the committee. The coal interest, which is an index to the success of our manufactures, I am told, never was so flourishing as it has been during the last year.

Mr. CAKE. What particular coal interest does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. ALLISON. I allude to the general production of coal in this country. From the commercial journals it appears that up to this hour in this year more coal has been sent to market than ever went to market in a single year before; and the State of Pennsylvania alone, which the gentleman represents in part, so far as I have been able to examine their commercial reports, will show the production of a million tons of coal this year more than was ever produced in that State before in one year.

Mr. CAKE. I merely wish to state to the gentleman that anthracite coal to-day is selling cheaper than it has sold within twelve years past. It brings less in the market than it has brought for twelve years past.

Mr. ALLISON. I am speaking of the condition of the industry of the country, as evidenced in the demand for coal. Of course cheap coal would favor industry. If coal was cheaper it would favor other manufacturing industries.

But there is another index that applies particularly to the iron interest of this country; and that is that pig-iron, which is the basis of all iron manufacturing industry, has never been more prosperous than it has been for the last year; and I am told by the editor of the Iron Age, and I had a slip from that paper a month or two ago, showing that most of the furnaces in operation had orders for two or three months in advance. Therefore, so far as the iron industries of this country are concerned, I think they will not suffer if we do not modify the tariff at the present session.

What is true of iron may be said of cotton. I remember that in the year 1866, when we had under consideration a general revision of the tariff, the cotton manufacturers told us they did not want any increase of duties, and after the passage of the wool and woolen tariff of last year, I do not suppose that the woolen manufacturers desire an increase although that industry has been somewhat depressed. I think I may say, therefore, that no great manufacturing industry of this country will suffer from a failure at this session to revise the tariff. It may be that there are specific manufactures that will suffer, because we do not increase the tariff, but if there are such, I have not them now in my mind.

To leave this question. I had some other thoughts upon the general question of taxation; but I will add only one more, and it is this: we are by our legislation seeking to remove taxation from the necessities of life as distinguished from luxuries; in other words, the framework of this bill is based upon the idea that our chief taxation should be gathered from luxuries, and therefore I want to call attention to the fact that there are many articles of necessity that are under our tariff law heavily taxed. If you will examine the statistical reports on the tariff question you will find that during the year 1866—I will take that year as the basis because I have examined it more carefully—out of $368,000,000 of importations into this country, but $68,000,000 were articles of luxury and the remaining $300,000,000 were articles of necessity, and most of them were articles which are not manufactured in this country.

I allude, among other articles, to tea, coffee, and sugar. Sugar is produced to a small extent in the southern States. But the great articles of importation are not produced in this country at all. The entire production of the United States in 1866 was $6,000,000,000, which is a fair estimate of the entire production of this country, but $68,000,000 of luxuries were imported during the same year, or but about one per cent. of the whole production. Therefore, I do not think we are likely to be overwhelmed by the importation of foreign luxuries.

I desire now to say a few words with reference to the specific provisions of this bill. I was not present in the committee when the first section of the bill was agreed upon, and have not given it my sanction. I observe, however, that it is the chief subject of discus-

It will be observed that the expenses for the current year, actual and estimated, exceed those of 1867 by some thirty-three million dollars; but an analysis of the items will show that $32,000,000 in round numbers will be used during the year to pay bounties to soldiers; some nine million dollars has and will be paid to reimburse loyal States for expenditures made during the war. The interest account has also been increased some six million dollars during this year as compared with 1867.

Of the expenditures of the War Department, at least $30,000,000 were used by General Hancock in organizing and conducting an expedition against hostile Indians in the Territories; so that, although there is an apparent increase during the present year, there has been an actual reduction of the ordinary expenditures during the present year as compared with 1867.

During the period from August 31, 1865—at which time the public debt reached its maximum—to November 1, 1867, the public debt has been reduced $266,185,121 43, or over ten million dollars per month, in addition to the payment of the ordinary expenses of the Government and the interest on the public debt. During the same time nearly forty million dollars were paid to the soldiers and sailors of the Union as bounties for faithful service.

The estimated expenditures during the year ending June 30, 1869, cannot exceed $350,000,000, and should fall considerably below that sum.

The largest amount ever collected in any one fiscal year by the Government from internal taxes and customs was during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866. During this year the amount collected from internal taxation was $310,906,984, currency, and from customs $179,046,630, gold. Reducing the customs receipts to currency, (the premium on gold being assumed at forty per cent.) we have as the total amount of revenue drawn from the country during the above year by various forms of taxation the sum of $561,572,266, currency; which, with an assumed population in 1866, of thirty-five million, is equivalent to $16 04, currency, or $11 46 in gold per capita.

This vast sum was raised under laws passed when the rebellion was in progress, and it became necessary to test to the utmost extent the ability and disposition of the American people to endure taxation for the purpose of preserving the national life.

This enormous tax has been reduced from that time to the present moment, and it is pro-sion with gentlemen on the other side of the House. I wish to call their attention to one fact. They oppose this feature of the bill because they say it inaugurates a new system of appointment. I would call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that, with the exception of assessors and collectors of the revenue and the chief officers of the bureau, every single officer engaged to-day in the administration of the revenue department of this country is appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury alone. All the revenue inspectors, all the revenue agents, all the special agents of the Treasury, and their name is legion, are to-day the special appointees of the Secretary of the Treasury. While this is true in reply to the argument of gentlemen on the other side, it is also true in reply to the remedy proposed by the gentlemen from the committee, who seem to think this feature of the bill essential to a successful administration of the revenue department.

This is urged as a feature which will at least check frauds upon the revenue. I fear very much—though I would be glad to realize that Utopia which was so beautifully described by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] a few days ago—I fear very much that such will not be the result. I would call his attention to the fact that this is substantially the provision of the present law. With the exception of about four hundred and eighty officers every revenue officer is specially appointed and controlled by the Secretary of the Treasury, and can be removed or suspended at his will. That is the case with all but assessors and collectors. Such is the present law.

Mr. Chairman, I fear we must resort to something more perfect if we would check the frauds on the revenue which exist in this country to-day. I beg leave to differ with gentlemen on this side of the House as to the cause of these great frauds. I do not attribute their commission to the division of responsibility. There is no division of responsibility. The Secretary of the Treasury is to-day at the head of the revenue department.

What do we propose by this bill? The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is a bureau officer under the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury is to-day the responsible head of the Department, charged with the collection of the revenue of the country. It is no defense for him to say that he does not know of the existence of these frauds. Is it not enough for him to know that there are produced in this country at least seventy-five million gallons of distilled spirits, and that but seven millions gallons pay the tax during the fiscal year about to close? Is it to be said that the responsible head of the revenue department—the Secretary of the Treasury—does not know that the reason why this revenue is not collected is because of frauds in his Department, and that he must wait for his subordinate officer to bring those rauds to his knowledge?

I say the responsibility rests to-day upon the Secretary of the Treasury, unless he can shift that responsibility upon the President of the United States, where I believe it legitimately and properly belongs. While I give the Secretary of the Treasury credit for integrity of purpose and purity of character, he is unfortunately too much of a partisan, or is not willing to assume the responsibility which is within his power and control. Many of these revenue agents belong to what my colleagues on the Committee of Ways and Means and others here denominate "the whisky ring." They are constantly roaming over the country and forming leagues by which the Government is defrauded. They are not the appointees of the President, but of the Secretary of the Treasury, and they should be removed. There are honorable and worthy exceptions I know.

I must say in justice to Mr. Rollins, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that to my knowledge he has called the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to many of these fraudulent transactions, and to many of the men who are guilty of these frauds.

These men are not removed from office. I have been told that the Secretary of the Treasury makes representations to the President of the United States; but I have yet to learn that a single man who has been engaged in these fraudulent practices has been removed by the President of the United States. Hence, Mr. Chairman, I think the chief reason for these frauds is inherent in our present political situation, and that we never can get rid of them except in one way, that is by having harmony in the administration and harmony in legislation, and administration and legislation on the side of the Government.

Mr. WOOD. As bearing directly upon this question of appointments, will the gentleman permit me to have read the testimony of Mr. Rollins given before the Judiciary Committee in regard to representations made as to parties committing these frauds? I understand the gentleman to say that notwithstanding the representations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and of the Secretary of the Treasury to the President, no attempt has been made by the President to remove any of these derelict parties. I call the gentleman's attention to the testimony of Mr. Rollins given before the Judiciary Committee of this House, directly contradicting the statement which the gentleman has just made.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to give me the date of that testimony.

Mr. WOOD. I will send the gentleman the book.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not desire the book.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman will find it on page 884.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire the date of the testimony.

Mr. WOOD. July 20, 1867.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield to have that testimony read. It was read here, I believe, last night. It is no reply to the proposition I make. Does the gentleman pretend to say that the President of the United States, who is sworn to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and the Secretary of the Treasury, who has the supervision of this revenue bureau, are not required to see that the laws are executed, and if there are frauds practiced by the officers of the Government, that is not their duty to see that those officers are removed?

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the President in several cases removed officers and nominated other men to the Senate, which body failed to confirm them, thus sustaining in office the parties whom the President had endeavored to remove.

Mr. ALLISON. I of course am not prepared to dispute the statement of the gentleman from New York; but I do know that in his own city corruption in revenue matters is without limit, and as my friend from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] suggests, without precedent in the history of this country; and I do know that with one or two exceptions no officer in that city has been removed by the President of the United States. I know that in another city of this Union, Richmond, Virginia, the fraudulent practices have gone to such an extent that even the judicial ermine has been stained by them; and yet no removals are made.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I cannot go into a controversy upon this question. The facts are patent to all. I know further, that Mr. Rollins, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as late as December last, called the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to other great frauds upon the revenue, and named to him some thirty or forty officers who should be removed because of their complicity in these frauds; yet I have not heard of a single removal under that recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. WOOD. I trust the gentleman will allow me a single remark. As he has already stated, the President appoints and removes only the collectors and assessors. Now, it is well known that these frauds are perpetrated by inspectors and storekeepers, and subordinate agents, who are directly appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the President having no knowledge of those appointments, and no control over them directly or indirectly.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman, that is only a change of responsibility. I insist that these collectors and assessors are the appointees of the President, that the other officers are the appointees of the Secretary of the Treasury, and therefore the responsibility rests either upon one or the other. I should like to know whether a revenue inspector or a revenue agent could commit frauds upon the revenue in any collection district without the principal officer, if he is a man of any capacity or honesty, being able to discover and check those frauds. Therefore the responsibility is upon the executive department of the Government, and not upon another department of the Government. So much for this question of the responsibility for the frauds upon the revenue.

I now desire to say a few words with reference to the question of tax on distilled spirits. I do not know but it is possible to collect two dollars a gallon on distilled spirits with honest officers under the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. But, sir, I do know it is impossible in the present condition of affairs to collect two dollars a gallon; and I do not need anything else but the statistics to convince myself. We manufacture seventy-five million gallons of whisky per annum and only seven millions pay tax, or less than $14,000,000 is paid when we should have $150,000,000. Now we do not collect the tax on whisky. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am for reducing the tax to seventy-five or sixty cents per gallon, and I want to give the reasons why I am in favor of so doing.

Mr. Chairman, there is to-day no production of distilled spirits in the West except in a few cities. In Chicago I am told they are producing distilled spirits to a considerable extent, which I believe is in fraud of the revenue, because there little or no revenue is collected from that source. With a few exceptions the distillation of spirits is confined to New York and the other large seaboard cities. How is this done? A great portion of the illicit product is made from cane molasses, imported from abroad. Molasses are resorted to because it is a material more easily concealed from the public than corn. For the proof of what I say I need only refer to the fact that the chief demand for molasses in our large cities is from those engaged in this illicit business; and also to the fact that the importation of molasses is steadily and largely on the increase, notwithstanding the revival to some extent of its production in Louisiana, and also the large production from sorghum.

By a reference to the statistics of importations it will be found that in—

	Gallons.
1864 there were imported.....	28,753,668
1865.....	34,385,000
1866.....	43,840,000
1867.....	46,776,465

into the Atlantic States alone; and the current year will show an importation of more than fifty million gallons at the Atlantic ports, or an increase in four years of nearly one hundred per cent. of importations of this article. Notwithstanding this large importation, the price of molasses has constantly advanced, while the price of nearly every other article has been reduced from ten to fifty per cent. The year 1867 alone shows an increase of importation of cane molasses of over ten and one quarter per cent. Owing to the large increase of sugar refineries in this country raw sugars have been largely imported; but the price of refined sugars has so depreciated that it is said our sugar refiners are now working, if at all, without profit. During the month of April last two million gallons more were imported than during the same period last year.

Mr. PRICE. How much whisky does a gallon of molasses make?

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad that my colleague has asked me a question. One gallon and a half of molasses will make one gallon of whisky under the mode adopted.

There is another fact in reference to this molasses question. Not only has the importation of molasses increased enormously, but the importation of sugar has also increased for refining purposes. While the price of sugar has been decreasing the price of molasses has been steadily going up, notwithstanding the increased importation.

Mr. PRICE. How much whisky will a bushel of corn make?

Mr. ALLISON. A bushel of corn will make from three to four gallons of whisky. I am told by those who have experience that in the hands of a skillful distiller a bushel of corn will make four gallons of whisky. I will leave this, however, to be answered by those members here who understand this better than I do. I believe about seven tenths of a gallon of molasses will produce a gallon of whisky if the fermentation be allowed to continue long enough, but this these illicit distilleries cannot allow.

Mr. COVODE. I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that all the whisky is not made of molasses. I am told by one of the largest distillers in Pittsburg that whisky made out of corn transported to the East and there distilled is selling in Pittsburg for $1 05 a gallon.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank my friend for making the suggestion, but I very much doubt whether any very large quantity of distilled spirits are manufactured in Philadelphia from grain. I know that the average price of distilled spirits in that city for the last six months has been from ninety to one hundred and twenty cents per gallon; and in New York, I believe, it has not exceeded $1 20 during that time. The chief portion of whisky is made from molasses, and in proof of that I cite the fact that corn whisky is chiefly in bond to-day in the West. Men cannot afford to manufacture whisky from corn and sell it at present prices. At least they do not do it if legitimately manufactured, and tax paid.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. He stated that from three to four gallons of whisky can be made from a bushel of corn. Is he aware of the fact that no distiller in Kentucky, and I believe our State has the reputation of making the best whisky, under the old process, now kept up, of using the copper still, can make more than nine quarts to a bushel? So that the manufacturers by the new process, who make twelve quarts to the bushel, will have an advantage over those who use the old system.

Mr. ALLISON. I am told they make the best whisky in Kentucky, and I presume that is so. I have no doubt if they make the best article that they require a bushel of corn to make nine or ten quarts; but I am speaking now of the large distillers and it may be that our bill will require modification in that regard. That was a question of considerable discussion in the committee.

Now, the whole amount of distilled spirits in bond to-day is twenty-five million gallons. In the western States it is chiefly manufactured from corn, but in the large cities it is chiefly made from molasses and is substituted by means of fraudulent officers for corn whisky that has been thrown upon the market because it is more valuable.

Mr. PRICE. I would like to ask my colleague a question. If a bushel of corn costs sixty cents, which is the average price in the West, and will make even two gallons of whisky—I will put it at a low figure—that will bring the cost of the raw material for the whisky at thirty cents a gallon. Now, if a gallon and a half of molasses only make a gallon of whisky, and the molasses costs forty-five cents a gallon, that will bring the cost of the raw material up to sixty cents. Now, how can whisky made from molasses at that rate come in competition with whisky made from corn?

Mr. ALLISON. That is a practical question, and I will answer it. I am speaking now of the fraudulent distillers. A bushel of corn costs sixty cents, which makes two gallons of whisky at thirty cents per gallon for the raw material. Now, sixty cents tax, as I propose, will make ninety cents, which the distiller of corn is compelled to pay. Now comes the distiller of molasses, who wants to make it without paying any tax. A gallon and a half of molasses at forty-five cents a gallon costs seventy cents. Then it is not so valuable as corn whisky by about thirty per cent., so when the producer of corn whisky finds his product is taxed sixty cents he is about on a par with the man who makes it out of molasses and pays no tax whatever. Now, if the tax is one dollar a gallon, if the whisky distiller from molasses pays no tax he makes forty cents profit on the gallon, and that is a sufficient inducement to engage in the business.

Mr. PRICE. Now, I understand it, I believe. I had heard so much said about making whisky out of molasses that I supposed it could be made cheaper, but I now understand it is not so, and that the reason why it costs less is because the man who makes molasses whisky is presumed to be cheating, while the man who makes corn whisky is not cheating. [Laughter.] Is that it?

Mr. ALLISON. That is substantially the fact. A man can make whisky from molasses in garrets and cellars, while if he makes it from corn he is compelled to make it in open day where it is seen of all men. That is the theory and that is the fact as stated by those best acquainted with the subject. Of course, by connivance with dishonest officers, any distiller can for a time at least defraud the Government. Therefore I say that in my judgment the only way to prevent this illicit distillation from molasses is to reduce the tax upon distilled spirits so that the legitimate manufacture will be transferred to the corn growing States, and thus give us a market for twenty or thirty million bushels corn per annum. It is a fact that in the West no whisky is made at the present time, except in the cities where it can be done fraudulently. It is a further fact that alcohol is to-day shipped from New York and Philadelphia, even west of the Mississippi, made in those cities and produced from molasses or from corn shipped from the West.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to ask the gentleman one question right here, and it is this: whether he believes that the large amount of whisky that was in bond last winter in New York, and out of the tax upon which the Government was cheated by its removal from one bonded warehouse to another, under an order from the internal revenue department, after a law had been passed requiring the tax to be paid before the whisky was removed, was all molasses whisky or not?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know anything about the fact of which my friend speaks.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I will state that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue acknowledged the fact before the committee that orders had been issued of that kind.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know, however, that an order issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue transferring whisky from one warehouse to another resulted in defrauding the Government. If it be true, it is quite possible that a portion of the whisky was made out of corn. I know that it has been a favorite method of defrauding the Government by removing whisky in bond, but I think this bill will effectually put a stop to that.

Mr. MYERS. As my friend's hour is nearly exhausted, I wish to ask him a question on another subject. As to the tax on whisky, for myself, I am in favor of taxing the fermenting capacity of the distillery. That is the way to collect a tax on whisky, in my judgment.

Under the present law the tax on cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes of all kinds is five dollars the thousand. That was the amendment offered by myself last year, and which took the place of the sliding-scale proposition reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. Now, it is proposed to double that tax, and impose a dollar tax on each cigar-maker, on every boy that makes a cigar. In view of the fact that we once had a tax of ten dollars per thousand on cigars, and that in nine months under that law we only collected one seventh more of tax than we did in nine months' operation of the present law, I wish to ask whether the Committee of Ways and Means intend to insist on that ten-dollar tax on cigars, especially when we remember that this House last year passed that amendment and said that ten dollars a thousand was too severe a tax upon the manufacture of cheap cigars, and when all these manufacturers ask that we shall keep the tax at the present rate?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the question by simply saying that, so far as I know, the committee propose to leave the tax on cigars where it is, at five dollars a thousand.

Mr. MYERS. You do not so report.

Mr. ALLISON. We do not, but we propose to reduce it. The chairman of the committee so stated in his opening remarks.

Now, I desire to say a word further on the question of distilled spirits. I listened to the remarks of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HUNTER] last night as to his plan of collecting the tax on spirits, and I was pleased to find that he is in accord mainly with the Committee of Ways and Means with reference to the method of collecting the tax on whisky. And if I had not known that with great care and elaboration he had prepared and presented to the House a bill upon the subject, I would have supposed that he had read our bill and was advocating it. The only material difference between his proposition and that of the committee is that he proposes a form of receipts, while we propose a form of stamps. We have thrown around our bill every guard he mentioned yesterday except that we do not propose to brand the bottles or the drinks that a man takes from day to day. That is the only modification I believe that he proposes.

Mr. HUNTER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield for a question.

Mr. HUNTER. I would ask the gentleman how, when liquor is taken from the barrel and put in a vessel holding less than ten gallons, under his system you are going to identify that whisky after it gets in a vessel holding less than ten gallons?

Mr. ALLISON. We have a process of identification of which I cannot now go into a particular explanation. But I will do so with pleasure when we reach that section, and come to the five-minute debate upon it.

This bill proposes a division of this tax on distilled spirits. We first put a special tax on the distiller. Then we put a daily tax on the distillery, or a tax on the capacity of the distillery. We then put a specific tax on the spirit; then a tax on the wholesale dealer, a tax on the rectifier, and also a tax on the retail dealer.

I have made a careful estimate of the amount of revenue that can fairly be expected from the bill under consideration should it be substantially enacted into a law. In making this estimate I have been careful to come within the lowest estimate which I think possible of the amount of annual consumption in this country. The bill provides, in the first place, for a special tax of $200 upon all distilleries having an annual capacity of two hundred gallons or less, and in addition one dollar per barrel upon all spirits distilled over and above two hundred barrels in any one year. I should say, however, in making up this estimate I have estimated the total consumption per annum at seventy five million gallons. It will be apparent, I think, that no distiller will apply for the privilege of manufacturing spirits under this law unless he intends to pay the tax at least upon the greater portion of his manufacture, as the law provides that the distillery and distillery premises must be unencumbered by any lien to any person whatsoever. Assuming that no distillery will be licensed of a less capacity than two hundred barrels per annum makes the special tax upon the annual amount of whisky produced two and one half cents per gallon; and assuming that even with the stringent law, as proposed, the annual illicit production will reach fifteen million gallons, we have a production upon which the special tax will be paid of sixty million gallons, equal in amount to $1,500,000 per annum.

There is in addition to this a provision for taxing the capacity of distilleries by estimating the capacity of their mash-tubs, which is five dollars per day upon a mashing capacity of one hundred bushels of grain, and three dollars per day upon each additional hundred bushels of grain. I believe that the effect of this bill will be to concentrate the business into the hands of men owning large distilleries. So that it is safe to assume that few distillers will pay the special tax unless having a mashing capacity of at least one hundred bushels per day, and I think they will average two hundred bushels per day, which would make a daily tax of eight dollars upon each distillery; and assuming that twelve hundred distilleries will pay the tax there will be paid from this source $3,504,000. Fixing the specific tax upon the spirits distilled at sixty cents per gallon, which is the lowest amount of specific tax I would place upon spirits, and assuming that sixty million gallons will pay this tax, and allowing for fifteen million gallons of illicit distillation as before, there will be paid into the Treasury $36,000,000 per annum. We have taxed wholesale dealers in liquors at the rate of two and a half per cent. upon all sales of distilled spirits, and estimating the value of each gallon in the hands of the wholesale dealer at one dollar and fifty cents, and estimating that there will only be three sales by wholesale dealers until the product reaches the retail dealer, we will have from this source a tax of two and a half per cent. upon $200,000,000, or a gross sum of at least $5,000,000, to which should be added at least $1,000,000 for sales of foreign liquors, wines, and malt liquors, making a total of $6,000,000 from wholesale liquor dealers. We also tax rectifiers and compounders of liquors, from which we will receive at least $500,000 per annum. Under the existing law, retail liquor dealers pay twenty-five dollars each annual special tax realizing for the year 1867, in round numbers, $3,000,000.

The bill under consideration increases this tax in proportion to sales, rating from twenty-five to one thousand dollars. I think it is safe to say that the average special tax upon retail liquor dealers will reach three times the present tax, or an average of seventy-five dollars each, which will give us, upon the basis of last year, $9,000,000.

To recapitulate, we will receive—

From special tax—distillers.....	$1,500,000
From capacity of mash-tubs—daily tax.....	3,504,000
Specific tax on spirits, at 60 cents.....	36,000,000
Wholesale liquor dealers.....	6,000,000
Rectifiers and compounders.....	500,000
Retail liquor dealers.....	9,000,000
Total.....	$56,554,000

Upon the basis of the above estimate the total receipts that may be relied upon, should this bill become a law, are $56,554,000, which, I am satisfied, is below what the actual receipts would be if the law is administered with fair ability and integrity on the part of officers. In all these estimates I have not taken into account any tax upon $15,000,000 of illicit product, which will be largely reduced under an efficient administration of the law. I am well satisfied, however, that should the tax be reduced as proposed alcohol will be largely used for industrial purposes and in the arts, as before the tax of two dollars per gallon was imposed; so that, I think, we can estimate, fairly and reasonably, that the annual consumption under this bill will be increased ten million gallons, or one fifth of the present estimated consumption, which would increase the revenue, in round numbers, $10,000,000.

With all the safeguards and restrictions thrown about the law a large amount of illicit whisky will be produced. In the mountains and valleys, in the cellars and garrets, will be found a class of men who will run the risk of fines and the penitentiary for the purpose of defrauding the Government of its honest due.

Mr. HARDING. How can we tax the capacity of those concealed distilleries? How will you cook the hare before you catch it?

Mr. ALLISON. The first rule of the cook-book is to catch the hare before you undertake to cook it. Therefore you cannot tax that which you know nothing about. There will be illicit distilleries.

But I do not agree with the Special Commissioner of Revenue that the amount of consumption of spirits in this country will be as small as he estimates in his last published report. However, he has recently revised his estimate on that subject. He based his former estimate upon the consumption of distilled spirits in Great Britain and the provinces and in the United States, as shown by the census of 1860. In Great Britain the consumption of distilled spirits is only seven tenths of a gallon per capita. But the latest statistics show that while the consumption of distilled spirits in Great Britain is only seven tenths of a gallon per capita, twenty-three million barrels of beer are consumed, or two and four tenths gallons distilled spirits in that form for every man, woman, and child. Now, the whole amount of beer consumed in this country is only about seven or eight million gallons.

The quantity of distilled spirits produced in the United States during the year ending June 1, 1860, as returned to the Bureau of the Census, was eighty-nine million three hundred and eight thousand five hundred and eighty one proof gallons; or, including one million one hundred and four thousand gallons of alcohol distilled continuously from the grain and returned as alcohol about ninety-three million gallons. As no tax or restriction of any kind was then proposed on the manufacture of spirits, and as, consequently, no motive for concealment or deception then existed, the above return may be considered as approximately correct—the acknowledged tendency being, however, in such cases to over, rather than underestimate.

As the annual production of distilled spirits thus returned was even at that period at least four times as great as the maximum annual production of distilled spirits in Great Britain or any other of the leading States of Europe, it is a matter of interest, in the first instance, to inquire in what manner a product comparatively so excessive was enabled to find a regular and legitimate disposition or consumption.

The materials for answering the inquiry are to be found mainly in the report of the Revenue Commissioner, transmitted to Congress in March, 1866.

In 1860 the illuminating agent of almost universal use in the United States, in places where gas was not available, was the so-called "burning fluid"—which was commercially prepared by mixing one gallon of rectified spirits of turpentine (camphene) with four or five gallons of alcohol. Each gallon of alcohol thus used required 1·88 gallon of proof spirits; by which term is to be understood a mixture of about fifty per cent. alcohol and fifty per cent. water. The amount of proof spirits used for this manufacture was estimated by the Revenue Commissioner to have been at the rate of about twenty-five million gallons per annum; but subsequent evidences obtained have rendered it probable that this estimate was too low, and that the actual amount of proof spirits annually used for the manufacture of burning fluid was in excess of thirty million gallons. In a debate in the House of Representatives, April 22, 1864, it was stated by Mr. HOLMAN that in the city of Cincinnati alone the manufacture of burning fluid had been sufficiently extensive to require an amount of alcohol equal to the product of twelve thousand bushels of corn for every twenty-four hours.

Estimating a product of twelve quarts (three gallons) per bushel, and three hundred working days per annum, it appears that the city of Cincinnati alone must have consumed in its manufacture of burning fluid about eleven million gallons of proof spirits per annum, while the amount of burning fluid produced in the cities of New York and Brooklyn during the same period is known to have been considerably in excess of that produced in Cincinnati.

Upon the imposition of the tax of two dollars per gallon upon proof spirits, this business, with its consequent use of alcohol, was swept out of existence and has not since been resumed.

The average price of proof spirits in the New York market from 1858 to 1862, inclusive, was about twenty-four cents a gallon, and reached at times a point as low as fourteen cents a gallon, while the price of alcohol during the same period ranged from thirty to sixty cents a gallon. This excessive cheapness induced a most extensive and lavish use of spirits for a great variety of industrial, medicinal, and domestic purposes, such as the manufacture of varnishes, hats, vinegar, white lead, furniture polish, perfumery, tinctures, transparent soaps, percussion caps, picture frames, imitation wines, patent medicines, and in dyeing, cleaning, lacquering, bathing, and for fuel.

The report of the revenue commission above referred to furnishes in detail a great amount of evidence concerning the enormous consumption of distilled spirits, at the period mentioned, for industrial purposes, a consumption which has had no parallel at any time in Great Britain, France, or any of the other States of Europe.

With an advance in the cost of spirits consequent upon the imposition of the tax, from fourteen cents to $2 25 per gallon for proof spirits, and from thirty cents to $4 50 per gallon for alcohol, the use of spirits and alcohol for all the industrial and other purposes above specified greatly diminished or entirely ceased.

In Great Britain, where the exact disposition of all the spirits produced is accurately known, the whole amount of spirits used for industrial purposes does not exceed three millions proof gallons per annum, although spirits which have been subjected to a process called methylation (that is, the addition of wood naphtha) are allowed to be used free of tax for industrial purposes.

It is the judgment of experts that the present consumption and use of alcohol in the United States for industrial, mechanical, and domestic purposes is less than one third of the quantity so used in 1860, or prior to the imposition of the high tax on distilled spirits; and that the present maximum consumption of distilled spirits in the United States for the above purposes, with the great economy in the use of alcohol now everywhere practiced, is not in excess of five million gallons per annum. As illustrative of the truth of this estimate a single fact may be cited. The manufacture of chemicals, many of which depend mainly upon the use of alcohol, is larger in Philadelphia and vicinity than in all the rest of the United States; and yet the amount of distilled spirits now consumed in Philadelphia for all industrial purposes is estimated by a committee of the Philadelphia Drug Exchange as not exceeding, under the most favorable circumstances, twenty thousand barrels, or about eight hundred thousand proof gallons per annum.

The present exportation of distilled spirits is estimated at about five and a half million gallons per annum. Prior to 1863 the exportation of distilled spirits had never exceeded three million gallons in any one year. If now the estimates and statistics already given are correct, there is, if the census return of ninety-one million gallons production in 1860 was approximately true, if of the quantity thus returned, from thirty to thirty-five million proof gallons were used for the manufacture of burning fluids, fifteen million for industrial and domestic purposes, and less than one million gallons were exported, there remained at that time a product of about forty-five million gallons, the disposition of which can be accounted for only on the supposition that it was used for drinking purposes. With a total population in 1860 of thirty-one and a half million, such a consumption would have been at the rate of about one and four tenths gallons per capita for each man, woman, and child in the whole country. This ratio, on the basis of the estimated present population of thirty-seven million twenty thousand would indicate an annual aggregate of fifty-one million eight hundred and thirty thousand proof gallons. If, however, we assume, in accordance with the popular belief, that the present annual production of distilled spirits in the United States is in excess of the aggregate annual product in 1860—say one hundred million proof gallons—it is incumbent on the advocates of this assumption to show in what manner such a quantity is disposed of.

If we allow five million for exportation and ten million as the amount annually consumed for industrial purposes, there will then remain, on the hypothesis of one hundred million gallons annual product, eighty-five million gallons to be carried to the account of the annual whisky drinking consumption of the country, exclusive of the consumption of foreign wines and spirits, domestic wines, beer, cider, &c., a drinking consumption at the rate of over two and one third gallons per head, or over ten gallons per head for the entire voting population, the present entire male population of the United States, white, black, and red, over twenty-one years of age, being about nine million.

The inquiry next arises, does any other civilized nation or people consume distilled spirits in like proportion? On this point the Special Commissioner of the Revenue has published some definite statistics. Thus in Canada the production of distilled spirits from 1862 to 1864 inclusive, with a tax of fifteen cents per gallon was officially estimated at about three million six hundred thousand proof gallons. Making due allowance for illicit distillation, this would indicate, on the then basis of population, a total consumption of domestic distilled spirits for all purposes of less than one and one fourth gallons per capita.

In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the domestic production of distilled spirits is for-bidden by law; and not a single distillery, open or covert, is believed to exist in either of these provinces; and as the spirits consumed are imported under moderate duties, the data for estimating consumption are unusually favorable. These indicate for Nova Scotia a total annual consumption for all purposes of one and three tenths gallons per capita, and in New Brunswick of one and one quarter gallons per capita.

In Newfoundland and Prince Edward's Island the official estimate of consumption is about one gallon per capita. The above data, therefore, seem to show that an allowance of one and four tenths gallons as the annual drinking consumption of distilled spirits per capita for the whole population of the United States is sufficiently ample.

On the other hand, the return of the consumption of spirits in Great Britain for the year 1867, as submitted to the Special Commissioner of the Revenue by the officers of the British board of inland revenue, give an essentially different result. These returns, made up from data which do not admit of a question as regards accuracy, state that the consumption of domestic distilled spirits in the United Kingdom for the year 1867 amounted to only three fourths of a gallon per capita. There were, however, consumed during the same year about twenty-three million vessels of beer, or about seven tenths of a barrel per capita of the above population. The quantity of malt charged with duty the same year was about fifty million bushels. In an average of years one bushel of malt yields two gallons of proof spirits; so that the malt yearly made into beer in Great Britain would yield the enormous quantity of one hundred million gallons. In the fermentation of the wort, or extract of malt, for the manufacture of beer, the whole of the sugar is not transformed into alcohol, but from one quarter to one half may remain unchanged in the beer. "The quantity of malt, therefore, which is consumed in Great Britain for the making of beer does not, in reality, indicate the consumption of so large a number of gallons of proof spirits as the distiller would extract from it." But making all due allowances, the officers of the British revenue estimate the amount of spirits at present annually consumed in the United Kingdom, in the form of beer, to be equal to two and seven tenths gallons per capita, which, added to the consumption of distilled spirits proper, would make a total consumption of distilled spirits of domestic production in all forms of over three and four tenths imperial proof gallons per capita, or four and two thirds American proof gallons. It should, however, be remembered that the population of Great Britain is chiefly industrial and congregated in large towns and cities, and that their employments as well as their climate favor excessive drinking. On the other hand, the population of the United States is in a great degree rural, more temperate in their habits, while the use of beer as a substitute for food is a thing unknown in the United States.

These facts, therefore, seem to indicate that while the present production and use of distilled spirits is large, it is not so excessive in amount as is generally asserted and popularly believed.

I have but one further special subject in this bill to refer to, and that is the taxation of banks. Many gentlemen on this floor have had great anxiety about the taxation of banks. We have transferred from the general banking law to this bill all that relates to the taxation of national banks. And we have transferred the whole matter of taxing banks to the internal revenue department, and have provided that this tax shall be assessed and collected as others taxes are assessed and collected.

Not only that, but we increase the tax upon the circulation of the banks one per cent. It is now one per cent. We propose to tax the circulation of national as well as other banks two per cent. The Committee of Ways and Means, after a careful examination of this subject, came to the conclusion that that was all the taxation that these banks could fairly and properly be required to pay. At two per cent. the revenue upon the circulation of the banks will yield $6,000,000. I have here a table carefully prepared by the Comptroller of the Currency, to which I would call the attention of members, as follows:

NOTE.—The banks in Mississippi, (2;) South Carolina, (2;) and Nevada, (1)—in all five banks—not having reported, are not included in the above statement.
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY, May 28, 1868.

If gentleman will examine this table they will see that to-day the national banks are taxed by the General Government two and a quarter per cent. on their capital; and they are taxed by the State governments two and twenty-two hundredths per cent. upon their capital, or four and forty-seven hundredths per cent. altogether.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the gentleman's time be extended, so that he may finish his remarks on this branch of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the House for general debate in Committee of the Whole has expired; and the committee has no power to extend it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS. There is no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I will only occupy a few moments more.

Mr. Chairman, at the present the General Government collects from national banks taxation to the amount of more than nine million dollars, and the State governments over eight million dollars, making in all $18,000,000. This we propose to increase by $3,000,000; so that the total amount raised from national banks in this country, including both State and national taxation, will reach over twenty-one million dollars.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have only a word more to say with reference to this bill. Repeating partially what I said in my opening remarks, I will say that it has been the constant aim of Congress to reduce the burdens of taxation; and we must be careful, while reducing these burdens nominally, that we do not impose upon the people additional burdens, to be collected by means of fraudulent practices on the Government. Why, sir, to-day while nominally the tax on distilled spirits is two dollars a gallon, we collect from this source only $13,500,000. It must be remembered that the people of this country are actually paying over $100,000,000 in the shape of taxation to the "whisky ring" and those who are engaged in whisky frauds. Taxes should be so imposed that at least nearly every dollar exacted by the General Government shall go into the Treasury, and not be taken from the pockets of the people to be placed in the hands of a few men who may be engaged in defrauding the Government. Now, if we proceed to levy taxes on this principle, my own judgment is that this is not the last year that we shall reduce taxation. I have no faith in the remark of the gentleman on the other side, [Mr. NIBLACK,] my distinguished colleague on the committee, that this tax bill is only an experiment. It is no experiment; or, if it is an experiment, it is such an experiment as will show that the Government can raise under it more revenue than is necessary for the current expenses of the Government and the payment of the interest, and of a considerable sum annually upon the principal of the national debt. As estimated by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, there will be $43,000,000 of a surplus during the next fiscal year after an expenditure of $350,000,000, and we ought not to have such an expenditure by at least $25,000,000.

As I have already stated, the amount of taxation during the fiscal year 1866 amounted to sixteen dollars per head upon every man, woman, and child in this country. The taxation here proposed will amount to eight dollars per head, or a little less, upon every man, woman, and child in the country. Now, we can still reduce that taxation ten per cent.; and in twenty years from this day we can pay the interest upon our national debt, pay the current expenses of the Government, and pay every dollar of that debt.

For one, I am not in favor of hastening the payment of our national debt. We have paid it too rapidly within the last two years. Notwithstanding the extraordinary expenses of the Government, yet from the 1st of August, 1865, to the 1st of November, 1867, we paid $266,- 000,000 of the principal of our national debt, or over ten millions per month. I believe, for one, that it is not expedient or prudent to pay off the debt with such rapidity unless we can pay it off by some such project as that proposed by the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wood,] without the payment of taxes or the issuing of new bonds or evidences of indebtedness.

Within the last few years our national expenditures have been constantly decreasing. I read lately a speech made in Parliament by Mr. Gladstone, in which he stated that during the last year the expenses of the peace establishments in Great Britain had increased three million pounds, to which must be added the extraordinary expenses for the Abyssinian war. Thus while we, by the policy we have adopted in Congress, are constantly decreasing our expenses and our taxation, we find that other Governments are increasing their expenditures and are compelled to increase their taxation.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for having listened to me so attentively.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means will not close without informing us whether, to the best of his information, the greatest amount of fraud is in the small distilleries, or in the large ones where distillation is carried on openly, and which are professedly honest distilleries?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman, so far as that is concerned, I think I might answer him by saying both, if it were not a contradiction in terms. Of course there have been great frauds by large distilleries, but they must have been committed in most cases by the connivance of the revenue officers, or because they neglected their duties.

The CHAIRMAN. All general debate has terminated under the order of the House. The bill will now be read by sections for amendment, and debate under the five-minutes rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and the same is hereby, established and constituted a department of the Government, to be designated and known as the department of internal revenue, the head and chief officer of which department shall be the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose salary shall be $6,000 per annum. And whenever the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall become vacant by death, resignation, or otherwise, the President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint, a suitable person to fill said office.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Chairman, I am compelled, notwithstanding the earnest and able arguments of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to move to strike out this section, the first section of the bill; and although I am confined to five minutes, I shall endeavor in that time, if the committee will give me their attention, to state the reasons why I make this motion.

It is proposed to commit to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the absolute power of appointment of all the revenue officers of the United States. That we undoubtedly have the right and power to do it I do not question; but let us see the effect. We have the right legally and constitutionally; we ordain by law that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall possess this power; we adjourn; then, next day, President Johnson suspends the present Commissioner and puts in one of his own friends. I ask this committee who then controls all of the revenue appointments of the country?

Mr. LOGAN. Why does he not do it now?

Mr. BLAINE. He cannot. He has the tenure-of-office act restraining him. This proposes to remove this very operation of the tenure-of-office law, and to put the appointments in the hands of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The President must keep within the law. I wish gentlemen to observe that, keeping within the law, he can suspend the Commissioner just as he suspended Secretary Stanton, and the next day appoint another man; and we give to that man absolute autocratic power, unrestrained power, to remove and appoint at pleasure all the internal revenue officers of the Government throughout the whole length and breadth of the land.

Mr. BENTON. Does it give this ad interim appointee this power?

Mr. BLAINE. Of course it does. I am surprised the gentleman asks the question. It gives the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for the time being, no matter who he is, this power. I wish to know whether General Grant, when made ad interim Secretary of War, did not have all the powers of Secretary of War? And if the President should suspend Mr. Rollins and put in Cornelius Wendell, or any partisan of his, would not the new appointee have all the powers conferred by this bill to-day upon the Internal Revenue Commissioner?

Mr. BENTON. If that be so it could be very easily remedied by a provision confining the power merely to the Commissioner nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. Then A B now in office would have the power to remove and appoint, and C D would not have it. That would be very handsome legislation!

Mr. PILE. The remarks of the gentleman apply more particularly to section six of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. It opens the whole question. The question is whether it shall be established as a separate department now. I am not intending to answer the argument of the chairman of the committee as to whether this ought to be established as a general rule, and whether it would, as a general rule, make this officer more efficient. But I say to do it now is to give to Andrew Johnson the absolute control of every revenue officer in the United States, regardless of the tenure-of-office law; and for one I am not willing to do it. To-day the internal revenue officers of the country are protected, both collectors and assessors. They hold their offices just exactly as other officers who have been appointed by and with the advice of the Senate. But this bill proposes to make them subject to appointment and removal by a gentleman who himself is entirely subject to suspension and removal by the President of the United States. Therefore you place in him the whole power. This section, if it had been devised for the purpose, could not have been more absolutely efficient in giving to the President of the United States the entire power over every internal revenue officer throughout the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to oppose the proposition of the gentleman from Maine. I am very much surprised to hear any gentleman on this floor say that the first section of this bill gives power to any officer outside or irrespective of the tenure-of-office law. Why, sir, it does not affect the tenure-of-office act; it does not repeal it in whole or in part; but, being a subsequent law, it becomes itself subject in its operation to the tenure-of-office law. All the provisions of that law that are applicable to appointments or removals from office will apply as well to this office as to any other.

Again, what objection is there to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue having the right to appoint officers that does not apply to any other man having the right? The power to appoint must rest somewhere, and I will give my reasons, so far as I can in the brief time allowed me, why I favor this proposition. We charge here that the President is responsible for the appointment of these officers who have perpetrated frauds upon the Government or that the Secretary of the Treasury is responsible. The power of appointment belongs to that officer in some instances and to the President in others. When we charge that the opposite side deny the fact, and say the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is responsible.

Now, sir, I want to fix the responsibility of appointing inefficient officers somewhere. Let it rest in some head, so that we can hold that person responsible and accountable to Congress and the country for maladministration or improper conduct in reference to the public revenue.

Now, sir, suppose, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] says, that this would place the appointing power in the hands of the President. Why, my conscience! Is it not there now?

Mr. BLAINE. No.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, it is, by and with the advice of the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no.

Mr. LOGAN. An officer cannot be suspended or removed except by the advice and consent of the Senate, as I understand the law already in existence. Now, the President has the appointing power, and the Secretary of the Treasury has it, and the object of this bill is to fix it in the head of one Department and let that Department be held responsible. If the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is to be responsible for the collection of the revenues, why let him have such officers as he believes are honest and efficient, and if he fails in his judgment, let him answer then on his own responsibility for that failure. While you leave the appointment of a part of these officers—the inspectors—wholly in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury and the appointment of assessors and collectors in the hands of the President, the Commissioner has no power or control over them in any way whatever. And when you charge the Secretary with improper appointments, he shifts the responsibility on the President; the President says he would have removed them if he had been notified. Hence you never can get at any one who is responsible. Each one shifts the responsibility upon the other. Now, we want to have the responsibility rest somewhere, and the Commissioner himself is the proper person upon whom that responsibility should rest.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JUDD. I move to amend the section proposed to be stricken out by inserting after the words "per annum," in the ninth line, the words "and who shall be subject to removal or to suspension from the performance of the duties of the office only with the advice and consent of the Senate."

My object in offering this amendment is to reach the point that has been so much discussed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and by my colleague, [Mr. LOGAN,] who has just taken his seat, and to fix responsibility for the conduct of this department upon some single person.

I subscribe most fully to all that has been said in regard to this triple execution of power. The responsibility in relation to this most important branch of the Government, and upon which its very existence depends, ought to be placed upon some one individual. If the President is competent to direct, if the Secretary is competent to control, if the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is competent to control, then the power might as well be with one as with three.

It is well known that the actual execution and performance of the duties of the office belong to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and it is only questions of appeal, questions of order, which override and control the decisions of the Commissioner that, as a general rule, reach the higher officers. I desire by this amendment to obviate the objection that the gentleman from Maine takes. I desire to fix the responsibility upon one individual, and when that responsibility is fixed, to prevent any other official from interfering with his discharge of the duties of the office.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to oppose the amendment. I am glad that this doctrine of giving power where there is responsibility is at last recognized by the majority of this House. It is the doctrine of the Constitution that where responsibility is imposed in the discharge of a public trust the necessary power shall be given by which to execute and enforce it. That is the doctrine of the Constitution with reference to the President. The President is made the chief executive officer; the power of enforcing and administering the laws is given to him, and yet throughout the whole of this Congress and the last Congress the effort has been made to deprive the President of the power to carry out the laws of Congress.

Now, this first section of the bill and all the first six sections propose to give to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue unrestricted and unlimited power. They place no control over his acts. He is not obliged to consult the Senate or the Secretary or the President. He is the sole individual authority, without any responsibility to any one whatever. There is no responsibility under this act. It is so indefinite and vague that you cannot fix the responsibility. You take from the President the power to enforce the law. You hedge him around in every way. You deprive him even of the ordinary authority of appointing his own clerks; and now you propose to give to a subordinate officer unlimited and unrestricted power, because you say that there should be some responsibility somewhere.

Mr. LOGAN. I would ask the gentleman from New York, who is speaking of the constitutional power of the Government, whether it is not provided in the Constitution that the appointing power shall be in the President and Senate, or with courts or heads of Departments, as Congress may determine?

Mr. WOOD. I referred to that constitutional difficulty last night. The Constitution has been correctly quoted by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] But there is nothing said there about giving the power of appointment to heads of bureaus.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir.

Mr. WOOD. You propose to change the thing by altering the name; you continue the bureau, but call it a department, seeking in that way to avoid a constitutional difficulty. Now, I suggest, and I do it respectfully, that in changing the name you cannot change the thing itself.

Now, I am in favor of consolidation of executive power. I believe all authority should be given to the Executive to carry out the laws; that is the essence of republican government. Where the legislative department makes a law representing the popular will, power should be given to the executive department to carry out that will so expressed by the Legislature. I would not take a subordinate officer, under whose administration most of these abuses have been already perpetrated; I would not take a subordinate officer, however pure, high, or experienced he may be, and give him this unrestricted authority.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "subject to removal," and insert the word "removed." I do not think this correction needs the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD,] however wholesome that amendment may be.

And I hope the section will not be stricken out as proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] He has anticipated the discussion on this subject. We are not now considering who shall make these appointments. That matter is to be taken into consideration later in the bill. This first section is proposed simply to settle the question whether this department shall be double-headed, or whether it shall have one responsible person at its head.

But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] sees danger in this. He says that if this power is given exclusively to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the President may remove him after the adjournment of Congress, and thus obtain the control of the whole matter. Sir, as it is now, the Secretary of the Treasury does not act, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue does not act, except as subordinate to the President. After all, it is a question of form, and not one of substance.

I have here a list of twenty-seven assessors and collectors, in regard to whom the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in July and in December of last year asked that they might be removed for causes which he stated. And to this day, out of the whole twenty-seven, there has been but one actually removed.

What are the facts? One of these officers is shown to have employed a clerk at four dollars per week, instructing him to return, under oath, at fifty dollars per month, which he did, the assessor retaining the difference between the two amounts, a direct, palpable swindle proved upon the assessor. Other gross misconduct is also proved against the assessor. And to relieve gentlemen on the other side I will say that this assessor professes to be a Republican. The President still keeps him in office.

Now, what does the Secretary of the Treasury report in this case? Why, that they have the case under consideration for the purpose of deciding upon a successor. And they have now been considering the case for the best part of the year in order to determine who shall take the place of a thief. And until they find somebody to be appointed against the wishes of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, perhaps against the wishes of the Secretary of the Treasury, who will answer the purpose of a tool, nobody will be appointed, I suppose.

Now, what is the second case on the list? A man who is shown to have been guilty of gross neglect, by reason of which $100,000 worth of whisky was withdrawn upon bonds proved to be worthless, and to have recommended for appointment as inspector the person through whom the fraud was perpetrated, and whose retirement from the office of deputy collector the sureties of the collector had demanded. That man is still there.

Now, what is said about him by the Secretary of the Treasury? He says that the Commissioner has withdrawn his recommendation in this case. But by reference to that very letter, it will be found that the Commissioner asks, not that his recommendation be withdrawn, but that action upon his case should be postponed until the action of the court in March, in a suit pending against the party. But, says the Commissioner, "I respectfully recommend such postponement, not beyond, however, the close of the March term of the court." That was last March; and nothing has yet been done.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I have referred to but two of these twenty-seven cases. I will try and give the rest before we are through.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this section. It provides—

That the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and the same is hereby, established and constituted a department of the Government, to be designated and known as the department of internal revenue, the head and chief officer of which department shall be the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose salary shall be $6,000 per annum.

The proposition is to retain as the head of this department the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who was originally appointed as a mere subordinate of the Treasury Department. I oppose this, and I will state the reason. Under the Constitution all officers whose appointment is not vested in the courts of law or in the heads of Departments, must be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Congress may create, if it pleases, a new department; but whenever a new department is created the head of that department must be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. We cannot by a single act of Congress create a department and at the same time elevate a mere subordinate of the Treasury Department to be the head of such department. By any such act we attempt to nominate and appoint to office, a power vested under the Constitution exclusively in the President, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate. I say nothing about the character or competency of the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue. What I object to is, that by this bill we propose not only to create a department, but to appoint the person who shall be the head of that department, assuming thereby executive authority.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like the gentleman to explain in what part of the section under discussion there is any provision made for any particular individual serving as head of this department.

Mr. BECK. There is this provision:

That the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and the same is hereby, established and constituted a department of the Government, to be designated and known as the department of internal revenue, the head and chief officer of which department shall be the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

As I understand this, it provides that the present Commissioner shall be the head of this department; and that I understand to be the object. Otherwise, when this bill goes into operation, the office of head of this department will be vacant, and the President, under his constitutional authority, will make the appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, which the advocates of the bill do not pretend is its meaning. It is the avowed purpose to create an office for the present Commissioner.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I move to amend the section by striking out "Commissioner" and inserting "secretary;" so that the clause will read, "the head and chief officer of which department shall be the secretary of internal revenue."

Mr. UPSON. I submit that that motion is not in order while the present amendment is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Judd.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend that amendment by striking out "the duties of his office," and inserting "his official duties." I offer this amendment in order to say that I should be glad if gentlemen on the other side who oppose this section would show wherein it differs in its form from previous legislation creating separate departments of the Government. How does it differ in form from the act of 1862, creating the Department of Agriculture and elevating the Commissioner of Agriculture from the position of a bureau officer under the Department of the Interior to be the head of a Department? There was no objection to that legislation that I am aware of.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman will permit me I will answer it. The appointment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue must be submitted by the President to the Senate for confirmation, but this bill proposes to continue the present head without submitting his name to the Senate to be confirmed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will add nothing to what my colleague on the committee from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has said on that point. I have not time to repeat it.

Does not the gentleman know when the Department of Agriculture was created that the Commissioner was holding the office as a bureau officer, and that he continued during that Administration and the present Administration up to the hour of his death? How does this legislation differ in its character, in letter and spirit, from that which created the Department of Agriculture?

But once more. I attempted, in the remarks I submitted to the committee this morning, to maintain and sustain this creation of the Internal Revenue Bureau into a separate department. Let me add some additional reasons. The executive patronage of the Government is already greater than many people believe to be in harmony with safety to the great interests of the Government. I would not increase that patronage. I would not confer any powers upon that officer additional to those he now has. I do not think there is any reason for it. This is a new department of the Government which has sprung up within the last eight years in the United States. It is an extension of patronage, it is an amount of official duty which we did not have at the beginning of the war, and, therefore, it should properly fall within a separate and distinct department of the Government. The fact that the power exists is no argument against its exercise; and I beg gentlemen, especially on this side of the House, to consider that the power already exists. The difficulty we now have is to make anybody responsible for its exercise. If we can give the head of the department that responsibility so he can be held responsible for it, then whatever party has possession of the Government, instead of its being a political weakness, as now, it will give increased efficiency.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to say a very few words in reply to the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and mainly in reference to one of my districts, the eighth district of New York. As an illustration what he was saying he said this district was filled very improperly by a person who badly conducted it, so that no revenue could be obtained. I made an effort for over two years to obtain a change, and five or six Democrats were nominated to the Senate, all of whom were neglected, or, in the end, thrown over and rejected by the Senate; so that for over a year, under the tenure-of-office law, thousands, and perhaps millions, were lost to the revenue by maladministration in that district. The fault was in the tenure-of-office law, and that alone, for it was not in the power of the President to make a change; and if he did not make changes in this district and twenty-six other districts it was because there was fault in the Senate. Nominations after nominations had been sent to the Senate, and it would have been folly on his part to have thrown repeated nominations into the Senate with an indisposition on the part of the Senate to respond to them. At last, sacrificing all interests to the public good, feeling it was indispensably necessary there should be a change in my district, I obtained that change with the consent of the Senate by declining any further to suggest the nomination of any Democrat for the position. And it was only by the nomination of a Republican that the change took place. Hence, when this censure is thrown upon the Secretary of the Treasury, as well as upon the President, I say the fault was not with them, but with the Senate. If there are twenty-six others in the same category, the possibility, if not the certainty, is that what was my experience in the eighth district of New York was the experience in those districts.

The fault is in the Senate. The other is in the tenure-of-office bill. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] has a like experience, and I give him the rest of my time.

Mr. WOODWARD. I rise simply to corroborate what the gentleman from New York has said, and to state a case in the district of Pennsylvania which I have the honor to represent. When I came to Congress I found my predecessor had nominated six citizens of that district for the office of assessor, every one of whom had been rejected by the Senate. I know those six men, and I do not know more responsible and respectable men in that district or out of it. It became my duty to nominate a seventh man. I did so, and the seventh man was rejected. It then became my duty to nominate an eighth man. I did not take the course which the gentleman from New York says he took, of putting in a Republican, but I nominated another Democrat, and he was confirmed by the Senate, and is acting as assessor to-day. But the district was without an assessor for a year and a half; not through the fault of the President or of anybody, but through the fact that seven most responsible and respectable citizens were rejected by the Senate of the United States. But the eighth was at last confirmed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MAYNARD. My amendment was a mere verbal one, and I withdraw it.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I renew the amendment. The gentleman from Tennessee has asked us to point out wherein this bill differs from the act creating a Department of Agriculture. I propose to point out the distinction. The act passed May 15, 1862, creating the Department of Agriculture, provides "that there is hereby established at the seat of the Government of the United States a Department of Agriculture." Section one goes on to describe the general designs and duties of that Department. Section two provides—

"That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a Commissioner of Agriculture"

An officer who was not then in existence—

"who shall be the chief executive officer of the Department of Agriculture, and shall hold his office by a tenure similar to that of other similar officers appointed by the President, and who shall receive for his compensation," &c.

Now, the bill under consideration provides for the establishment of a department of internal revenue, and declares who shall be the head or chief officer of that department, who is a person already in existence, and described as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. This is an attempt to legislate a man into an office, and if this bill shall become a law it will be claimed that this is a description of the person who shall be the head or chief officer of the department of internal revenue. I think that the difference between the two is plainly discernible.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in reference to the amendment of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. Judd.] I do not believe it cures the difficulty. He proposes that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall not be changed except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The gentleman from Tennessee brings up as an analogy the Department of Agriculture, and says that the officer was advanced without requiring a new nomination. Well, I have a case on the other hand. Two years ago the Congress of the United States advanced to the rank of paymaster general, from that of colonel or brigadier general, Benjamin W. Brice, a paymaster with the rank of colonel. But it was held, both inside and outside of Congress, that it required a new nomination to confirm him as Paymaster General with the new rank. Now, I do not say it absolutely requires a new nomination to confirm Mr. Rollins if you advance him from a Commissioner to a head of a department. But I say there is a question in it, and a very serious one, just as much a question as if the President acted upon it and removed him. The case, then, would be without remedy, for we have seen that tried in the Senate. The principle was elaborately reviewed in the case of the removal of Secretary Stanton. If you make this a department the President construes the act that it requires a new nomination, and gives him the power of removal. He then makes a new appointment by suspending him—not considering him in office. Where is the remedy?

A MEMBER. What remedy will you have?

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman asks what remedy I would adopt. Why, I would have the internal revenue officers throughout the United States protected as they are to-day, by the tenure-of-office law. I admit that the President can suspend a collector or assessor, but whenever he does so the senior deputy within the district takes the place, and the President cannot put in one of his own men. You have absolutely got the President barred on that point. But under this proposition you cannot hedge it in so that he cannot control the whole matter within the law or within what the Senate will hold to be the law, and you cannot review it till next December.

Mr. COBB. How is it arranged about the deputy collector or assessor taking the place?

Mr. BLAINE. Why, when a collector or assessor of internal revenue dies or resigns or is removed, the senior deputy collector or deputy assessor within that district performs the duties.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman let me say one word?

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman can have his own time. I have only five minutes, and cannot yield. The point I make, and I want to repeat it, is this: that if we enact this proposed change in the law we give to the President the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and we confer on the Commissioner of Internal Revenue absolute, autocratic, unlimited, and illimitable power over every revenue appointment within the United States. You will confer upon Andrew Johnson, by an act of legislation, more power than was ever given in this way without the consent of the Senate to any President or subordinate officer of the Government since it was founded, and I for one, am not willing to do it.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. COBB. I renew the amendment. My only object is to ask the gentlemen who have charge of this bill and who are undoubtedly informed on the subject, how it is that under the existing law the present state of things exists in the city of New Orleans? As I am informed, when General Steadman resigned the collectorship of that district he left a corps of deputies there, but there being some delay in the appointment of his successor, an arrangement was entered into here by which Captain John Hancock, General Hancock's brother, goes down there and takes entire charge as senior deputy, although in point of fact he received his appointment as deputy collector long after all the others had received theirs. Is the "senior deputy" somebody who is designated by the outgoing collector or by the President?

Mr. JUDD. I desire to say one word in reply to the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] He seems to be in very great tribulation lest we should violate the Constitution in some way or other. He discussed this first section of the bill as if it was creating some new office. That is an entire misconception of the language. It merely recognizes the existence of an official in an office that has been created by a former statute, and whose appointment has been confirmed by the Senate of the United States, so that for all purposes he is to-day regularly appointed under that Constitution that my friend from Maine is so fearful that we shall break, and is discharging the duties of the office. Now, what more?

Mr. BLAINE. You advance his rank.

Mr. JUDD. We do not advance his rank. That is an entire mistake. We impose additional duties upon him—nothing further, and that is done at every session of Congress and in regard to every public officer that holds a commission under the Government; and no one has ever questioned the right of Congress within the sphere of his duties to impose additional duties upon a public officer regularly appointed.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Do we not advance his salary?

Mr. SCHENCK. What of that?

Mr. JUDD. I say, yes; the bill does enlarge his salary; but who ever heard that an act of Congress which provided for the increase of an official's salary was unconstitutional on that account or changed the character of the officer?

Mr. SCHENCK. It does not even enlarge his salary.

Mr. JUDD. Well, assuming that it does enlarge his salary, who ever heard that the members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress ceased to be members of Congress because that Congress enlarged their salaries, or that the office they held ceased to be the same office that it was before? This section of the bill proposes nothing in the world but to change the duties of this officer.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if I had my own way, I would pass a bill through Congress, and it would have but a single section in it, dividing the Treasury Department into four separate departments, relieving the Treasury Department from the cumbersome machinery that now enables the Secretary to evade the responsibility that properly belongs to him.

Now, we know that practically the Secretary of the Treasury cannot oversee the duties of the various Departments devolved upon him. The time is not far distant when, as the machinery of this Government shall increase, we shall be compelled from necessity, and I take it we shall be compelled by policy, to divide the Treasury Department into several independent departments.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COBB. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I renew the amendment to the amendment. I have sat here and listened with some surprise to the proposition of gentlemen on the other side of the House in reference to the first section of the bill. First, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] says that the reason why he could not get a man confirmed was because of the tenure-of-office law. Does not the gentleman know that the Senate had a right to reject his man without the tenure-of-office law, and prior to its enactment? The Senate had exactly the same power of rejection before that they now have.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] says that in his case eight different nominations had to be made before one was confirmed.

Now what do these statements and arguments prove? Gentlemen first assail this bill because they say the appointing power is in the head of the Department. Then they charge that they could not get men appointed because they could not get the Senate to confirm them. They oppose the bill because it does not retain the power of confirmation in the Senate; and then they object to it because the Senate will not confirm those they recommend. Now that is strange logic. I cannot tell from the arguments of gentlemen whether they are in favor of or are opposed to the power given by the Constitution to the Senate to confirm nominations.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] says that he cannot submit to clothing a Department in this country with such power as this. Now, this bill does not propose to clothe a Department with any power whatever that does not already exist in the Government, in the Departments of the Government as now organized. It is nothing more than taking a burden from one officer or head of a Department and assigning it to another officer where the labors are not now so cumbersome. That is all; there is no stretch of power under the Constitution in any way whatever. The Constitution clearly provides that subordinate officers shall be appointed by the President, or by the heads of Departments, or by courts, as Congress may determine.

Now, Congress hitherto has provided that the Secretary of War shall be at the head of a Department; so with the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, etc. Afterward Congress made the Agricultural Commissioner the head of a Department. This is but a similar power which has already been conferred upon heads of Departments under the Constitution. It is merely changing the authority from one head of a Department to another.

And when a man gets up here and asserts that the Constitution is interfered with by this change of authority he either only shows that he wishes to elude the main point, or he exhibits his ignorance of constitutional law, such an exhibition as no man versed in the law would fail to recognize in a moment. It is not an interference with the power now possessed by the Secretary; but even if it was, we have a right to do it. It is precisely the same power, precisely, except that we assign certain duties to it that do not now belong to it. That is all there is in it.

As I have before remarked, this is fixing and fastening the authority upon individuals, so that you can bring them to a direct accountability for any improper exercise of that authority.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. I would if I had any time left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JONES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES. I wish to inquire whether this bill does not erect this office into a new department of the Government, and at the same time propose that the office of the head of that department shall be filled by the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and whether such a provision is in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, which gives the President the sole power to fill such offices by appointment, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I will make a single remark and then give way to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I wish to know whether this bill will give the President any more power than he now has. The President has now the power to suspend this officer or send to the Senate the nomination of somebody else. Why does he not do this if the present Commissioner is distasteful to him?

Mr. JONES. That is not the point I make. My point is that this bill proposes to create a new department of Government; that it makes a new office of an office already in existence, giving it a different salary—

Mr. LOGAN. Not a different salary.

Mr. JONES. And it proposes at the same time that this new office shall be filled without a new appointment by the incumbent of the present office. I wish to know whether that is constitutional. In my view, when we create a new department the chief officer of that department is to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know whether all that is a question or not. If it be, the section answers it in providing that—

The office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and the same is hereby, established and constituted a department of the Government, to be designated and known as the department of internal revenue, the head and chief officer of which department shall be the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

We have at this time in the Treasury Department, established by law, an office of internal revenue, at the head of which is the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. What is proposed by this bill? Not to interfere with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, not to change his salary, but to convert that bureau into a department, adding some powers or not, as the House in acting upon future sections may determine.

Mr. JONES. Does it not propose to clothe the officer with new powers—powers which he does not possess now?

Mr. SCHENCK. Every day we are clothing officers with new powers; every day we are taking powers away from officers; and I have never yet heard that either of these legislated the officer out of office. In this case we change the name of the office, and call it a department; we do not change the head of it. We leave the Commissioner as he is, with his salary unchanged. If other sections of this bill should prevail, we shall add to his powers. But this section about which gentlemen are so much concerned does not even do that. Gentlemen have anticipated the discussion which may properly arise on subsequent sections.

Mr. JONES. But, Mr. Chairman, the other sections all flow from this. This proposes to create a new officer and the other sections refer to his powers. In the first place, we are to discuss whether it is proper to create any such office, and more particularly we are to discuss whether it is constitutional for Congress to attempt to appoint the officer in the face of the provision conferring the appointing power with respect to all such offices upon the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOGAN. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I renew the amendment; and, Mr. Chairman, I renew it for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to this fact. The motion is to strike out the first section. What is that? It is not one in reference to the powers to be exercised by the Commissioner at all. They are provided for in other sections. They cannot adopt those or reject them. The object is that this department of internal revenue should have one head; and I would not give a sixpence for all laws if you are to go on collecting the revenue with the President, Secretary of the Treasury, the Commissioner, and the Senate, all to be consulted, and in the meantime nothing to be done except stealing. "I steal, you steal, they steal—we all steal;" such seems to be the conjugation of the verb with which we are engaged at this time. [Laughter.]

The only object of this section is to have a responsible head for this department; and the objections of the gentleman from Maine, the gentleman will permit me to say, have no foundation.

Mr. JONES. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that in my judgment that object of the chairman of Committee of the Ways and Means is commendable, and I heartily approve of it. But, sir, I do object to the power of this House or this Congress to create a new department and then proposing at the same time to fill the office of Commissioner by legislation.

Mr. SCHENCK. I respect the gentleman's judgment. He sees a constitutional objection in it, and I wish to explain why I do not see it. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAINE. About one fifth of the revenue offices are in the hands of thieves. If this prevails it will be in the power of those who protect the other four fifths to remove that one fifth in thirty days.

Mr. PILE. I think, instead of one fifth being in the hands of thieves, that precisely the reverse is the truth; that one fifth perhaps are honest men and four fifths are thieves; and the effect of the law proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means will be to secure four fifths honest men, leaving only one fifth thieves.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman let me ask him a mathematical question?

Mr. PILE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. About seven eighths are Republicans; and I wish to know how many thieves belong to the Republican and how many to the Democratic party?

Mr. PILE. I hope that we shall be able to keep the question of politics out of this bill. This is a question of collecting the revenue and lightening the burdens of taxation, which bear upon all men—Republicans or Democrats, Conservatives or Radicals or Know-Nothings, rebels or loyal men. What we want to secure is efficiency of administration by keeping honest men in office. If these dishonest men are Republicans, then I say that they ought to be put out of office, and the gentleman ought not to oppose it. We ought to put them out, and if they are thieves we ought to put them in the penitentiary, whether they be Democrats or Republicans. If they are stealing and heaping burdens upon honest people, unnecessary taxation, then they ought to be put out of office.

Mr. Chairman, administration is always behind the provisions of law. The great thing to be secured is efficiency of administration. Theory is always in advance of practice.

Human theory on all questions of morals, ethics, and government has always been beyond and in advance of practice, and hence I think it is wise in this bill to secure efficiency of administration. I believe this can only be secured by making one man responsible and conferring upon him power to control the department, and hold him responsible that it is done and well done.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PAINE. I renew it, and yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. There is a very celebrated case in the third district of Pennsylvania. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue recommended that the collector should be removed, and the Secretary of the Treasury has been considering it for six months. What is the case? The proof shows "that he is a political adventurer, closely intimate with distillers and rectifiers in his district; that one of his deputies has been in the penitentiary for receiving corrupt bonds covering five thousand gallons of whisky, which was totally lost to the Government. The collector is strongly suspected, and the proofs look very strong. I must say, of connection with that particular transaction. The deputy is convicted in spite of the efforts of the collector to get him clear."

Mr. RANDALL. Allow me one word. I would not defend this man or anybody else if he is guilty; but in the trial of the case to which the gentleman alludes, there was not a particle of evidence adduced to implicate the gentleman. And I would not, on the other hand, strike down a man until he is proved to be guilty. That is my position.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman has alluded to politics. Now, I have refrained from that. I admit that in one case I did allude to the politics of a party, but he was a Republican. This man is one of the bread and butter fellows, I believe.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield for a single question?

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman has said enough for me to reply to already. Suppose it is claimed that all that is said about this man only makes his character and reputation extremely doubtful. Suppose the collector has no confidence in him. I say you ought to have a condition of things where these men would be so far above suspicion that the collector should be able to remove a man that he believed was in complicity with rascals and scoundrels.

Now, I believe I must do the Secretary of the Treasury the justice to say that he wants to get rid of the man, and that leading Democrats want to get rid of him, but some how or other there he is. They have been considering for six months what they should do about the recommendation of the Commissioner. That is the Secretary's own report. Whom he is considering I do not know. I suppose he is doing as the cow did—"consider cow, consider." But in the meantime the whisky ring prevails, and thieves are not affected. What we aim at is to bring about a condition of things in which somebody shall be responsible for his subordinates, and can be held responsible. Then we shall not have such scenes as are enacted on this floor. When you talk about the Commissioner it is said to be the Secretary's fault, and when you talk about the Secretary it is said to be the President's fault, and when you talk about the President it is said to be the Senate's. I do not want this thimble-rigging business. I want to know under which thimble the ball is, else I do not desire to bet at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. MULLINS. I desire to oppose the amendment, and to offer a few views upon the question under consideration. One declaration that I make is this: I have lived long enough to find that mankind everywhere, as a class, are no more honest than the laws make them be. If your laws are deficient, to that extent will corruption and neglect of duty be found. We are now, Mr. Chairman, considering a bill that of all others the people of the country are most interested in. Talk about your elections, talk about your President, talk about your Senates, and all parties and classes, yet, sir, the masses are sensible, more so upon pocket nerve than all the rest. This is a bill that goes directly to the pocket of every individual in the United States. If the law is efficient it will reach the object; but to slough off all bad men, to bring them up before a tribunal and punish them for crime is a further stretch of power than is within the grasp of this body. Why do you oppose this section? Because, say one side, it is creating a new office or a new officer. How old is the present office? It was created but a few years ago, when there was an internal revenue officer.

It is but three days old, and why not now clothe it with a different name? It is our child and we have a right to alter its name by law. What principle of the Constitution do we violate by adopting the proposed measure? The way this department stands now is precisely on all fours with the way all rascals have escaped punishment from the day God drove Adam from the garden down to this hour. How is it now? There is no one individual who is directly responsible to the law-making power and to the people. Hence this hydra-headed monster, this triangle is playing tweekedum and tweekedee between the people and the officers. [Laughter.] If you get one fast, he says "it was not I that did it; it was the serpent that beguiled me." [Laughter.] If you get hold of another, he says "the woman thou gavest unto me did this." [Laughter.] And what shall we do? We will make one great head, a representative and responsible man. The people's pockets are at stake in this matter. The whisky ring is making its way into every department. It is now, as it was during the war, running every blockade and taking every individual captive. It seems to me that the love of whisky has superseded the great proverb declared by revelation, and that it is "the root of all evil," instead of money.

Sir, I cannot favor the amendment to this section. Let it stand. Let us define by law the proper head and representative of this department of the public service. This is no new office. The office was created some years back. I know gentlemen say that we are creating it anew; but we are only recognizing an individual and applying the law to him and holding him responsible to the people, and then, if there is wrong and fraud committed in this department, you will have a responsible head who will be responsible to the Representatives of the people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAINE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew the amendment simply for the purpose of saying a few words in reply to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has stated. He says that politics does not enter into this matter. I think he is possessed of too much political sagacity and foresight to seriously asseverate that fact. If, however, he deceives himself, I assure him he deceives no one else; for I venture the opinion here, and I believe that all sides of this House believe candidly, as we do on this side of the House, that but for the fact that you want to get possession of the host of revenue officers under this Government this provision of the bill never would have been inserted.

Mr. PILE. With the gentleman's permission I desire simply to say, in answer to a question propounded to me, that so far as the revenue officers in my district and in the West are concerned, so far as I am acquainted with them, they are all supporters of the President and Democrats.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, about one in twenty are Democrats, and those that have been put in have been forced there by corruption and compromises in the surroundings of the Senate of the United States. There is where the mistake is. You should let these men, whether they are Democrats or Republicans, if they are honest, be confirmed, and not place them in the position of selling out to both sides. That is the trouble; a man who will sell in politics will sell in every-day life.

Now, a word further as to the gentleman to whom allusion has been made as the collector of the third district of Pennsylvania. That gentleman, like the gentleman from Ohio, went into the war and served from the beginning to the end of it, and fought bravely and well. I esteem him and have always esteemed him as a man of character. I am ready to protect him here; to defend his military record, his social record, and his business record, so long as he proves himself correct in all those relations of life. When he shall fail to perform his duty, then I will no longer defend him; but I will not desert him because a few Democrats in his district want his office; nor will I permit him to be condemned because the head of the bureau, as I believe, is engaged in persecuting him for political purposes and none other. Until shown to have done wrong his character should stand free from aspersion.

I believe I have stated all that is necessary on the two points upon which I deem it necessary to say anything.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has replied directly to my allusion to an officer in the third district of Pennsylvania, an officer about whom the President has been thinking for six months, with the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue before him that he was not to be trusted, and, as I think, though I have no personal knowledge upon the subject, with the desire of the Secretary of the Treasury to sustain the Commissioner—

Mr. RANDALL. I think that is true.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think so. I think all, Republicans and Democrats, Secretary and Commissioner, are disposed to get rid of this man.

Mr. RANDALL. Do not call the Secretary of the Treasury a Democrat.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well.

Mr. LOGAN. What is he?

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, I believe he is a Conservative.

Mr. WARD. I rise to a point of order. Is this discussion about men in order upon this section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not in order. General statements of fact in regard to officers are in order, but not statements in regard to the character of a particular officer.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I suppose it would not be in order for me to refer to an officer in the gentleman's own State. It all begins and ends in the same way. Gentlemen ought to be satisfied by this time that there is a necessity for giving to some one the control of this department.

As I rose only for the purpose of sustaining the allusions I made by way of illustration when up before, I will not occupy the attention of this committee any further. If this amendment should be withdrawn, and the committee are not desirous to continue the discussion, but are ready to come to a vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Judd,] I will move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this section.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WOOD. I renew the amendment to the amendment. I am very glad the committee have been brought back to the question under consideration. I do not believe that corruption or virtue is confined to either party. I do not believe that all the fraud on the revenue has been perpetrated by any particular party for any particular purpose.

It is not my purpose to introduce in the least degree any particular considerations in the discussion of this great question of taxing the people of the United States in the mode here proposed.

We all agree as to the existence of the evil. I believe there is no difference of opinion on either side of the House or in the whole country as to the fact that gross frauds have been perpetrated and are being perpetrated, and will continue to be perpetrated, unless a remedy is in some way afforded. Nor is it peculiar to this country alone that frauds on the revenue system are practiced. It is officially alleged in England that the tax is collected only upon about one third of the spirits actually distilled there. And notwithstanding the experience of that country, and, indeed, of all Europe, upon the subject of internal revenue, yet from the inherent wickedness of our nature, from the premium offered by the attempt to impose heavy taxes upon particular branches of industry, frauds have been perpetrated there, and I believe they are being perpetrated there now; therefore, we all agree as to the fact of the existence of frauds.

Now, as to the remedy. I understand the Committee of Ways and Means have given consideration to this subject, and as the result of their examination, they have framed this bill, which, in their judgment, will provide a remedy. They propose to continue precisely the same machinery, without any alteration except in the name.

Now, why do they do that? I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to tell me why it is proposed to change this from a bureau to a department? I will tell the reason why. It is to meet a provision of the Constitution which gives to heads of Departments, when so authorized by Congress, the appointment of subordinate officers. It is to evade that constitutional provision. But does that create any more efficiency in the execution or the administration of the laws for the collection of revenue? Will the change of the name from bureau to department give any more efficiency? Not at all.

And it is proposed to confer upon this new department most extraordinary powers, powers which, in my judgment, are worse than the frauds which they seek to remedy. The remedy itself is worse than the evil, because by this power every private right, every sacred tie between man and wife, all the nearest and dearest interests of every individual in the community at large, are committed to the keeping of one man, who is not responsible to the President of the United States, or to any other authority.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] Whatever may be our views in regard to making this Internal Revenue Bureau a separate department, I do not think we ought to strike out this section entirely. I have prepared, and shall at the proper time take occasion to offer, an amendment which saves the body of the section, but strikes out so much of it as proposes to make the Internal Revenue Bureau a separate department. I wish to say a few words in regard to the amendment which I propose to offer.

If we are to make this bureau a separate department for the sake of any political gain, it seems to me we are as likely to lose as to profit by it; and hence, even if we were working for such a purpose, we ought to dismiss the project. In the next place, if we expect to improve the condition of the department by preventing fraud, I do not see that the object will be accomplished by the proposed change; for it only removes the difficulty one step farther; it only requires the rascality to take one additional step; and I cannot see that the revenue will be any better protected than it is now.

Besides, sir, the proposition is liable to two or three very serious objections, which I beg leave to state. The first is the constitutional difficulty which has already been raised by several gentlemen who have spoken. The question is whether the effect of this proposed legislation will not be to create a new office and to legislate into it a particular man, and whether thereby we do not usurp what is really an executive function. That question is likely to be raised, and, indeed, is raised. The outcome is likely to be what it was over in the Senate a few days ago in reference to the Secretary of War.

But, beyond that, and laying aside all political considerations, it seems to me unwise for us to do any more than has already been done in the way of dividing authority and responsibility. There is just as much reason for creating a separate department for the collection of customs as there is for erecting the Internal Revenue Bureau into a separate department; and I think such a project could be more easily defended, because the collection of customs is transacted at comparatively few points on the sea-board, and the business could be administered by comparatively few hands. In favor of such a proposition there could be presented a more plausible argument than that which is urged here for the creation of this new department.

If we go on in this way dividing authority and responsibility in the Treasury Department, making separate and independent departments instead of having one central responsible head that shall be with reference to all subordinate departments a sort of supreme court of appeals, to decide questions which may be brought up, we shall, it seems to me, have a total lack of that unity which is necessary for the proper conduct of fiscal affairs. On this ground, therefore, I am opposed to this measure.

I will only add, in conclusion, as my time is about expiring, that so far as I am concerned I do not desire that this Congress shall shoulder any more executive responsibility.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WOOD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, it would doubtless simplify governmental matters very much to have one supreme head of all; and perhaps we are drifting in that direction. That seems to be my colleague's idea of the best administration of any department of the Government. An emperor, therefore, would be an improvement. Hence, whether we shall have "a President or a king" becomes, perhaps, a very practical question.

But let me add that there are other reasons of which I am reminded by the course of my colleague's argument, and which, I think, show clearly the propriety of retaining the section as proposed by the committee. I find among other reasons that the business of the Commissioner is now seriously delayed by the necessity he is under of withholding his conclusion upon so many important matters until he can have an opportunity to consult with the Secretary. This renders prompt action impossible.

Such is the variety of the Secretary's duties that most matters pertaining to internal revenue are passed upon by his clerks, who are necessarily less fully informed than the clerks of the Internal Revenue Office. In many cases the carefully formed opinion of the Commissioner is overruled by the Secretary's clerks.

The Commissioner is now often unable to give positive instructions in reply to a question from an officer, as he cannot know how the subject will be treated in the Secretary's office.

Representatives of the Secretary's office now frequently give instructions to officers which conflict with instructions from the Internal Revenue Office, and the energy of the service is much weakened by the doubt thus engendered.

I state that simply as my brief in this case. It shows some of the reasons why there should be an independent and separate department of the internal revenue. They are conclusions deduced from the facts which I have found on careful inquiry at the proper quarter in reference to the present condition of things.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to close the debate upon this section, and will move that the committee rise for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is near at hand when the committee will take its recess.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that while there are a great many reasons in favor of making this bureau a department under a responsible head, and while I should like to vote for it, still I am constrained to come to the conclusion that it is unwise to attempt to erect it into a department. I am inclined to believe the effect would be to legislate Mr. Rollins out of office. There is great doubt on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, the committee, in pursuance of the order of the House, will take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

At half past seven o'clock the House reassembled in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, the pending question being on Mr. BLAINE's motion, to strike out the following section:

That the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and the same is hereby, established and constituted a department of the Government, to be designated and known as the department of internal revenue, the head and chief officer of which department shall be the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose salary shall be $6,000 per annum. And whenever the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall become vacant by death, resignation, or otherwise, the President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint a suitable person to fill said office.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee took a recess the gentleman from Illinois was on the floor on a pro forma amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I was about saying, when the committee took a recess, that at the best this provision of this bill raises a very grave doubt as to whether we do not by the first section legislate the Commissioner of Internal Revenue out of office. It creates a new office, and Congress has not the authority to legislate a man into it. We cannot legislate a man into office. Mr. Rollins is now a subordinate at the head of a bureau, and if we provide for a new department is not that putting him at the head of it? Who is to judge of the question? The President. How will he be likely to judge? As best suits his policy. What remedy is there if he judges wrong?

If we do not legislate Mr. Rollins into office, if we are not creating a new office, if we have a right to do this and the President thinks we have not, where is the remedy? He sets him aside and appoints another when Congress adjourns, and where is the remedy? We have none. We have already seen that we have none when he flagrantly violates the law; we certainly have none where there is any doubt about the violation of law.

Then, sir, if we create this department and give to the head of it this great power to appoint all the revenue officers throughout the United States, there is an incentive, an inducement for the President to set him aside and fill his place with another man who will be a creature of his own to control this vast amount of patronage in the United States to suit his purposes and the purposes of the party. I have confidence now in the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue; but, under ordinary circumstances, ay, under almost any circumstances, I would be opposed to clothing one man with the power to appoint this vast horde of officers. I think it is a very doubtful policy to clothe any one man, without the supervision of the Senate, with this enormous power, this immense patronage. As was said by the gentleman from Maine, if we pass this section, and the sixth section of the bill in connection with it, there is every inducement for the President, if he sees fit to exercise his authority, to set aside Commissioner Rollins and appoint a creature of his own who can turn out all the collectors and assessors throughout the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I agreed to move that the committee rise.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is unnecessary at the present time; there is not a quorum in the House. We may as well discuss the subject.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I leave it to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection; there is no quorum present.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Chairman, it is well enough to inquire what is proposed to be done by the section under discussion. What will it accomplish if it becomes a law? It proposes first to abolish the office of internal revenue.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, it proposes to abolish the Bureau of Internal Revenue, whether it does in express terms or not. I ask my friend what becomes of your office of internal revenue if this bill goes into effect? Is it in existence after this becomes a law? Not for a moment. The bill may not say in terms that it abolishes that office, but its effect is to do so, to wipe it out of existence. What, then, follows? It creates an absolute department, a coequal with any other in this Government. Who is at the head now of the office of internal revenue, which is to-day but a simple bureau of the Treasury Department? A bureau officer. It does not matter now what his name is or what his functions are; a bureau officer, known to the law as such, and entirely unknown to the law as a head of the department, is at the head of the Internal Revenue Bureau.

Now, I ask what is to become of that bureau officer who presides over that bureau when you have abolished the office? Is it not a necessary implication that that officer ceases to be when the office over which he presides is stricken out of existence? Nothing to me is plainer. By a repeal of the law which established the bureau, or by abolishing the bureau itself, the officer presiding over it ceases to exist.

And this section proposes to create a new department, for there is no such department at the present time. It is not enlarging the bureau in the Department. It is annihilating it and creating a new department. That is all it is. You cannot make it anything else. It is not enlarging the powers of the Commissioner. It is wiping him out of existence and creating a head of a department in his stead. I do not care anything about his name, whether it be Rollins or Smith makes no difference. The present head of the bureau is the officer in charge of it, and it is an adjunct of the Treasury Department. When it ceases to be such it ceases by virtue of your law which wipes it out of existence. By virtue of your law you create a new department, and having done it you propose to legislate a head on to that department, which you have no authority for doing under the Constitution.

It is not a legislative act. The creation of the department is a legislative act; the appointment of a head for it is an executive act. It belongs to the Executive to appoint the head of the department, and not to Congress. It belongs to Congress to create the department, and not to the Executive. These distinctions or limitations of their powers are apparent and known to all who are familiar with legislation. It would be, in my opinion, a violation of the Constitution for Congress to create a department and then fill it by the appointment of a Cabinet officer; for he will be a Cabinet officer by virtue of his position, although he may not be invited to a seat in the Cabinet. I know it is at the option of the President and that there is no constitutional obligation to recognize the head of a Department as a Cabinet officer. But he is to be at the head of a department and you create that department what for? For the purpose of empowering him to make appointments under the Constitution and law which he has no authority for making as the head of a bureau. The head of a bureau cannot make appointments of assessors and collectors. He has no such authority under the law or under the Constitution, and now you propose to swell him up to the proportions of the head of a Department. What for? To give him an authority which he does not possess as the head of a bureau. This is not a correct way of doing things. I do not believe that it can be sustained; you have no precedent for it, and I do not believe you have any authority for it in the Constitution. It is not worth while to argue here whether it is going to benefit the revenue or not, whether it will be advantageous to this party or to that party, whether it will be for the benefit of the country or whether it will relieve the President and the Secretary of the Treasury from onerous duties. We cannot argue that question. The first point of inquiry is, have you constitutional authority and warrant for doing this thing? If you have not you must stop. In my opinion, you have not got that authority. And, sir, in order to reach the very object for which this section is intended, you must strike out some words, and I will point them out.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. The trouble with the gentleman is about the Constitution. The trouble is that we undertake to make a Cabinet officer.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not at all; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, that we are making a coequal department.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Only creating a department.

Mr. SCHENCK. We are creating a department, the gentleman says, and making a Cabinet officer, although he may not be called into the Cabinet. I thought that long since gentlemen had read enough of the Constitution—for this has been a matter of discussion here, and attention has been attracted to it—to know that there is nothing about a Cabinet in the Constitution of the United States. A custom has grown up, arising, I suppose, out of the fact that the President is authorized to ask for the opinion in writing of the head of a Department, which the early Presidents did occasionally; a custom has grown up of holding a sort of town meeting up here at the White House, where they take votes; but I protest against any argument founded upon that which is not to be found in the Constitution at all, which if it be not a mere excrescence, is simply a usage which has grown up of calling together, in order to consult orally and compare notes, these different heads of the Departments.

It has reached that pass now, I believe, that when the Secretary of the Navy has a particular law to enforce, according to its letter and according to the usage of fifty years, instead of doing that which the law requires him to do—he being in charge of all that relates to the business of the Department, at the head of which he is placed—he is compelled to draw his business into this Cabinet council, to be voted down and compelled to violate the law by the judgment of those whose duty is not to execute that particular law, but who vote him down and prevent him from doing that which the law requires him to do. I have a case exactly of that kind in my mind at this moment.

What is there in all this to raise the difficulty the gentleman sees? He says we create something entirely new in the shape of a Commissioner at the head of a department. Sir, we do nothing of the sort. We simply say that the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be extended into a department. We leave the Commissioner with his salary and with his duty, adding or not adding to those duties as we may by further legislation, and keep him at the head of that department.

Now, as my friend from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has resorted to a military simile, I will suppose that upon the field there happened to be brigades and divisions, and a brigade is extended into a division. Now, would it follow from that that it would be unlawful to permit the brigadier general who had before commanded the brigade to continue to command it after it had been extended into a division? And because he commanded the division would he cease to be a brigadier general? You might just as well claim that every colonel in the Army, when he succeeded to the command of a brigade by the enlargement of his command, ceased any longer to hold the commission of colonel.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish the gentleman would take the exact illustration I used. I said that Paymaster General Brice—

Mr. FARNSWORTH. As the gentleman has referred to military practice—

The CHAIRMAN. To which gentleman does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, I think I will not yield to either gentleman just now. Now, what are the difficulties here? What are the bugbears that terrify gentlemen who seem to fear that something will be done by which everything will be unsettled, by which the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will be left at the mercy of the President, and be suspended from his office as soon as Congress adjourns, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] apprehends, and there will be mischief generally to pay in consequence of his subordinates being appointed by some one not now holding that office?

Sir, I say, in the first place, this is all aside from the question. The question is whether we shall concentrate power in one head for the purpose of having some assurance of responsibility. What is the power of the President now? As soon as we adjourn what can or may he do? Under the pretext that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue either has committed some crime or misdemeanor in office, or is incompetent to discharge the duties of his office, he may suspend him from office. The gentleman from Maine says that in the case of assessors and collectors, when they are suspended from office, the deputy assessors or deputy collectors will take their places. But how is it with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue? When he is suspended from office, no one being provided by law to take his place, it will be in the power of the President to select some one to perform his duties ad interim, until the matter can be laid before the Senate at the next session. What does the gentleman gain in that regard? Nothing whatever. The President can interfere with the Commissioner just as well, if he is the head of a department, as he can if he be not the head of a department, but only the head of a bureau in the Treasury Department, no more and no less.

Mr. BLAINE. It is proposed to give the Commissioner extraordinary powers.

Mr. SCHENCK. And if extraordinary powers are given him, the gentleman is afraid that somebody will be substituted in his place to exercise those powers. Well, sir, I say that somebody may be substituted for him as the law is now, if the President chooses to affirm that he is a proper subject for suspension from office.

Mr. BLAINE. I admit that.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then, what becomes of all the gentleman's argument?

Mr. BLAINE. Just this, if the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. SCHENCK. I admit that the President, if he pleases to regard the head of this bureau, or this department, as the case may be, as having committed a crime or misdemeanor in office, or as being incompetent, can suspend him from office under the tenure-of-office law. And I do not know that the President would run much risk in doing such a thing, considering the kind of constitutional law by which we are to be governed hereafter, according to the Senate. But so far as that is concerned it is the same thing under the present law as it will be under the law which we propose. Therefore, regard this matter as you will, in all its aspects and in all its lights, there is nothing in it except an attempt to do what, as we think, differing from these gentlemen, we can constitutionally do, to concentrate the responsibility of this office in one head by making that head the head of a department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Chairman, I want to answer my friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] on one point. The gentleman says that the President has now the same power to suspend the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as he will have after this bill shall have passed. I grant that; I consider his power plenary under the law in any event. But the difference is that if he suspends him from office to-day and puts another man in his place, the man he puts there will not have the absolute appointment of all the revenue officers of the United States.

Now, it is proposed in advance to give the Commissioner absolute power over all the officers of the revenue department. Then if the President suspends him and puts one of his tools in his place, we will be entirely at his mercy. It is possible I may be unduly influenced in this matter. But take my own State for instance; every revenue officer in that State, with possibly a single exception—and I do not know that I should make even that exception—all of them are the fast political friends of the party to which I belong; and I know just as well as I know the future about anything that if this bill is passed those gentlemen will be made to walk out mighty quick, and others that we do not want there will walk in mighty quick.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. And how as to our State?

Mr. BLAINE. You do not benefit your State by this. You want to get us down without being able to get up yourselves.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. But we can get up.

Mr. BLAINE. You suppose the President will put down Mr. Rollins's friends, but will not put down Mr. Rollins himself. Sir, if I have studied the President's character to any purpose for the past few years, I have learned that he is mighty shrewd in the matter of appointments. For one I do not want to be held responsible for putting any such power in the President's hands. I know that in my own State I should be laughed at if I should go for it.

Mr. POLAND. As I understand it, this bill proposes to accomplish two things. It is desired that all these revenue officers, assessors, collectors, &c., shall be under the entire and absolute control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; that he shall have the sole power of appointment and removal; or, to use the language of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that all power shall be concentrated in one head.

Now, I agree entirely that the reasons which have been given for this are very cogent, perhaps are sufficient. I think I myself should acknowledge that they were sufficient for the purpose, for the reason that has been urged, that all these officers should be under the control of one head, and not have the responsibility divided among so many.

But it seems to me that another object, another purpose, which is apparent from the face of this bill, is that Mr. Rollins, the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be retained as that head.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it is perfectly impossible in law that we shall accomplish those two things. The old maxim, "You cannot keep your cake and eat it too," applies to this project of accomplishing these things at the same time and in the same bill.

In order to give the Commissioner the control they say he ought to have over subordinate officers, it is necessary he should be made the head of the department, because we have no constitutional power to invest him with the power over these subordinates, except by making him a head of the department. Therefore, this bill attempts to create a department of internal revenue. That is clearly within our power.

Mr. MAYNARD. Suppose we enact this bill, I ask the gentleman from Vermont whether, in his judgment, we have it in our power to say that the present incumbents shall be retained in office until their successors shall be appointed and confirmed?

Mr. POLAND. I will endeavor to answer the question of the gentleman from Tennessee. We have the power to create this department. This bill undertakes to say that we shall create it and indicates the man who shall be at the head of it. While it is clear that Congress has power to create a new department, in my judgment it is beyond our constitutional power to say that we shall create a new and separate department and that Mr. E. A. Rollins shall be at the head of it. Why? Because the Constitution vests that power in the President. He has the power of appointment.

Now, what is attempted here? We attempt to say in effect that we create this department, and Mr. Rollins, who holds the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be at the head of it. In my judgment we might, with the same legal propriety, say in so many words in that section of the bill, that we create the department of internal revenue and indicate that E. A. Rollins shall be at the head of that department.

Now, it has been undertaken to allege it is but the devolution of new duties upon an existing officer. In my judgment that is not so. What is the Commissioner of Internal Revenue now? He is a mere subordinate of the Treasury Department.

Mr. MULLINS. The law declares that the sheriff shall execute writs, and that the coroner shall do other duties. Now, cannot the law transfer the duties from one to the other, or put them both upon one individual? I ask the gentleman for an answer to that question.

Mr. POLAND. There is no sort of difficulty about that, because the Constitution says nothing about coroners or sheriffs. They are mere creatures of the Legislature. Of course the Legislature can abolish either of them, or devolve the duties of both upon one individual, or abolish both of them, or devolve the duties upon some other officer. Not so with the head of a Department. A Department is a branch of the Government recognized by the Constitution, and when we create a new and separate department it is entirely a different office, different in its nature from that of a mere subordinate in the Treasury Department. When we undertake to say we will create a separate office and call it by the name of some subordinate place, it is a mere pretext to get around the appointing power and to fill the place with our own man. Although I should be as glad as the chairman of the committee to accomplish what is desired to be accomplished by this bill, it seems to me that it is beyond our power.

I give notice that when in order I shall move the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "that" in third line to the word "is" in fourth line, and insert the word "there."

Strike out the word "the" in the seventh line, and insert "a;" and insert after words "per annum" in the ninth line, "to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

So it will read:

That there is hereby established and constituted a department of the Government, to be designated and known as the department of internal revenue, the head and chief officer of which department shall be a Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose salary shall be $6,000 per annum, to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and whenever the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall become vacant by death, resignation, or otherwise, the President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint, a suitable person to fill said office.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. What is the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it. The CLERK. Strike out the words "of the duties of the office," and insert "his official duties."

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of order. Is not the pending amendment the one offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD?]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moved an amendment, to which an amendment was moved by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] just reported, which was afterward withdrawn by him, but was renewed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO.]

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. My question of order is that this debate has been going on on the original motion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] to strike out the section, whereas the subject before the committee is the amendment made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD.] Or if there is an amendment to that amendment pending, then the debate should be confined to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule, and then the Chair will decide.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"When debate is closed by order of the House any member shall be allowed in committee five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which any member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it; and there shall be no further debate on the amendment; but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to the amendment; and neither the amendment nor an amendment to the amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof unless by the unanimous consent of the committee."

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment was first proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] to strike out the section, which he debated five minutes, and there was then five minutes' debate against it, which exhausted debate on that proposition. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUDD] then proposed an amendment to the section, which was debated by him five minutes, and there was five minutes' debate on the other side. That exhausted the debate on that amendment. An amendment to the amendment was then proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] which was debated five minutes on each side. That amendment was withdrawn, and has been renewed several times since, the debate not being confined to the amendment, but covering the whole ground. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that under the rule the debate must be confined to the amendment actually before the committee. Debate has been exhausted on the former amendments, and none is now in order except such as pertains to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DELANO. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. JUDD, as follows:

After the word "annum" insert the words "who shall be subject to removal, or to suspension from the performance of the duties of the office, only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. BLAINE to strike out the section.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment to the section; and I ask the gentleman from Maine to accept it in lieu of his motion:

Strike out the words "established and constituted a department of the Government, to be designated and known as the department of the internal revenue," and insert in lieu thereof the word "continued," so that that part of the section will read as follows: That the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and the same is hereby, continued, the head and chief officer of which department shall be the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose salary shall be $8,000 per annum.

This amendment strikes out the words which makes this a department, and it continues the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue as it now is. I want this section to remain, because the bill repeals all the laws on the subject, and you therefore want to reenact, or rather to put into this bill, a provision for the continuance of the present officer. I want to accomplish the same thing the gentleman from Maine desires without destroying the provisions of the first section.

Mr. BLAINE. I withdraw my amendment to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, I will say only a word more on my amendment. I said to-day that I had no desire to discuss this matter in a merely political light, and I presume the committee has no such desire. I am very sorry that I should feel under the necessity of differing from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means at the very outset, and I wish to say in this connection that the bill, as a whole, is a marvel of work, and of very valuable work for the House, and that the change I propose to make, so as to retain the law in its present shape in this regard, will, in my judgment, in no way interfere with the general efficiency of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I feel complimented by my colleague's speaking of this bill as a marvel of work, a good body that we have created. I would feel very much more obliged to him if he would not attempt to take the soul out of it. He wants to reinstate the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under the Secretary of the Treasury and the President just where it now is. I do not; neither under this nor any other President, this nor any other Secretary.

The duties of the office of Secretary of the Treasury do not, if they are rightly performed in relation to other matters, enable him also to manage, except through his clerks and subordinates around him, this vast machinery of the collection of internal revenue, and experience has proved it.

My colleague says that he does not wish to consider this in the light of politics at all. Neither do I; but in the light of facts I do; and what are the facts? Why, that as managed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the Senate conjointly, it has proved a failure—a failure, and the country knows it if Congress does not. The responsibility has been so divided, so diffused, as I have said over and over again, under the present construction of the system by which appointments are made, officers selected, and business carried on in that Department that it has resulted in the disgraceful exhibition before the world of a country and a Government unable to control its subordinates and collect its revenue at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Not just now. I have not, if we look at persons merely, quite as much confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury as my colleague has.

Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague will certainly allow me to say a word.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not put it upon the ground of confidence in a particular man, whether that man be the President or the Commissioner; but I put it upon the ground that if you are going to succeed in this matter at all, you must change your system.

This may be wrong, but it is a conviction derived from at least five months of close, studious, careful observation of this whole system and its working, with a multitude of facts to enlighten me and those who have been laboring with me in regard to the working of this system.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, if the committee will allow me to answer it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to know if the gentleman does not base his argument, and whether he has not based the first section of this bill, upon his supposition or construction of the Constitution or constitutional authorities, that if we pass this bill it will not legislate the present Commissioner out of office?

Mr. SCHENCK. Not entirely upon that; I do not believe it will.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If the gentleman believed it would legislate the present Commissioner out of office, would he still desire it?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will be frank enough to say to the gentleman that I consider that only a subordinate question. Whether we have this Commissioner or another, I predict that if you do not change your system and get one known, certain, responsible officer at the head of the department which collects your internal revenue—which is a peculiar kind of labor to be performed and a service to the country filled with all that is onerous, and all that is odious in many respects, all that is difficult, all that requires activity, vigilance, and honesty—if you do not do that you will not know to whom to look, and everything will go wrong hereafter as it has done heretofore.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. One other question, and I will not trouble the gentleman further. [Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has expired.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire the permission of the committee to ask the gentleman one question.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in the power of the committee to extend any gentleman's time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose, then, to move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this section in ten minutes. Perhaps, however, this will be agreed to by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the proposition that on this section debate shall terminate in ten minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The question which I desired to propound to the gentleman was this: whether in his opinion we are likely to get a better set of revenue officers throughout the country than we now have, if we give the entire control of these matters into the hands of Mr. Johnson, through some creature whom he may put into the Revenue Bureau or department, whichever you call it? Do the Committee of Ways and Means believe that we should have a more honest set of officers and that the revenue would be better collected by allowing a creature of Andrew Johnson to appoint and turn out officers at his pleasure from now till the presidential election? I would like the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the committee, to give his opinion on this point. For my own part, I have not much faith in any such proceeding. This is the ground of my objection to creating a new department and authorizing the head of that department to appoint all the revenue officers of the United States.

We have already seen the disposition on the part of the President, so far as he has been able to control these appointments, not to collect faithfully and honestly the revenues of the country, but to appoint, for party purposes, thieves and swindlers. In my opinion, this bill, as now framed, will not only continue this power in the hands of the President, but greatly enlarge it. If this is to be the effect, certainly it is very bad policy for the honest men of this Government to put such power into his hands. In my own district we have a full set of revenue officers belonging to the Republican party—good, honest, faithful men. I believe such is generally the case in the State of Illinois.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question: how does he get those good reliable Republicans in office in his district, or how does he keep them there?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, a part of them have been kept in office ever since we have had a Bureau of Internal Revenue. The assessor in my district was never removed. The collector was removed and an objectionable man nominated, but the Senate refusing to confirm him the President at last sent in the name of a good, honest man. But for the interposition of the Senate we should not now have an honest man as collector.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Cannot Congress by a clause in this bill provide that the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall remain in office until December next, that the President shall neither suspend nor remove him? I say that we can, and that we ought to do it. Extraordinary cases require extraordinary remedies.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I say that Congress has no power to legislate any man into a department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the theory of this section, it embraces two distinct ideas. The first is a separation of the Internal Revenue Bureau from the Treasury Department. The second is the elevation of the character of that bureau, so that it shall hereafter be called a department, and that its chief shall have power to appoint all subordinate officers. As to the first question, I apprehend that those who have reflected upon the subject—a majority, I think, of the House—must have come to the conclusion that it is wise to make the separation. The magnitude of the business connected with the collection of our internal revenue requires it. I venture the opinion that the internal revenue of this nation will never be properly collected until this separation shall be made.

To this separation in the manner proposed in this bill it is objected that it attempts to continue in office the present Commissioner, and that this cannot be done when the bureau is raised in dignity to a department. I admit that much can be said upon both sides of this question. My own opinion is that this measure can be adopted without violating any provision of the Constitution, that there is no difficulty about it. I admit, however, that there are arguments upon the other side; yet granting this, the question will come before the Senate when the President, after the change shall have been made, shall nominate to that body a person in place of the present officer; and the Senate will then settle the question. In view, therefore, of this contingency, I would accept the measure.

The next question is, whether it is advisable to give to the head of this department, as it is hereafter to be called, the power which this bill proposes to give him with reference to all the officers connected with the department. In my opinion this power is necessary—necessary to the efficiency, the strength, the proper administration of this branch of the public service. In the present condition of our finances, in the present attitude of our Government, this internal revenue department is to be one of the most important in the Government, involving in its administration some of the most difficult questions connected with any branch of the public service. Unless you give the head of this department the power here proposed, making him responsible for the faithful exercise of this power, you will not have such an administration of internal revenue affairs as the Government needs.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question bearing upon the point he is discussing?

Mr. DELANO. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER. There is no doubt, I presume, that Congress has a perfect right to create this new department; but I desire to ask the honorable gentleman whether, in his opinion, Congress has the right to declare by legislation who shall be at the head of this department.

Mr. DELANO. I have already said, Mr. Chairman, that in my opinion the separation of this bureau from the Treasury Department, and the calling of it after that separation a "department," is consistent with the general policy of our laws; but, however that might be, I should feel justified in supporting this measure, because the result would be that the President would nominate a new chief for the department, and then the Senate would settle this question.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent all debate upon the section and amendments thereto is now closed. The first question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to an amendment would be in order, but no debate can be had upon it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend by striking out before "Commissioner" the word "the" and inserting "a," so that the clause will read, "the head and chief officer of which shall be a Commissioner of Internal Revenue."

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order as an amendment to the pending amendment.

The amendment of Mr. GARFIELD was read, as follows:

Amend the section so that the first clause will read as follows:

That the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and the same is hereby, continued, the head and chief officer of which shall be the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose salary shall be $6,000 per annum.

On agreeing to the amendment there were—ayes 44, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCHENCK and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 47; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, directed the roll to be called, when the following-named members failed to answer:

Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Burr, Butler, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coyode, Cullom, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Glessbrenner, Gravely, Haight, Hawkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jencks, Johnson, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, Mercer, Morrissey, Mungen, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Pike, Polsley, Pruyn, Raum, Robinson, Ross, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—33.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and finding itself without a quorum had caused the roll to be called, and had directed him to report the names of the absentees to the House.

A quorum having answered to their names, the committee resumed its session.

The tellers resumed their places.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 49.

The Chairman voted in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. I submit the following amendment:

Strike out all after the words "shall be," in the seventh line, and insert as follows: "appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and whose salary shall be $6,000 per annum."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to strike out the entire section.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I wish first to move to perfect the section. I move to strike out the word "the," in line seven, and insert "a;" and also to strike out these words: "wherever the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall become vacant by death, resignation, or otherwise;" so it will read:

That the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and the same is hereby, established and constituted a department of the Government, to be designated and known as a department of internal revenue, the head and chief officer of which department shall be a Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose salary shall be $6,000 per annum. And the President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint, a suitable person to fill said office.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. FARNSWORTH's motion to strike out the first section.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 60; no quorum voting.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If the gentleman from Ohio will give us a vote in the House I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; I am not willing to consent to that.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. FARNSWORTH and Mr. DELANO.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 60.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair votes in the negative.

So the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be charged with the duty of superintending the assessment and collection of all internal taxes and penalties imposed by law, and the preparation and distribution of all instructions, regulations, forms, blanks, stamps, marks, and hydrometers, or other instruments which may be necessary for those objects. The printing of such regulations, forms, and blanks shall be done at the Government Printing Office, except in cases where the Superintendent of Public Printing may be unable to perform the work; but the Commissioner shall have authority, after due public notice, to receive bids and make contracts for supplying stationery, blank books, and blanks to the assessors and collectors in the several collection districts. The said Commissioner shall have the privilege of franking and receiving free of postage all letters, documents, or other mail matter pertaining to the business of his department. And it shall be the duty of the said Commissioner to digest, prepare, and lay before Congress at the commencement of the December session, in each year, a detailed report on the subject of internal revenue, giving the amounts received from these several sources and objects of taxation, estimates of the amounts to be received, plans for increasing or decreasing such taxation, the expenses of collection, and information and his views generally in regard to all matters pertaining to his department.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

Strike out in lines thirteen and fourteen the words "to the assessors and collectors in the several collection districts," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "for the use of his department, and for assessors, collectors, and other officers of internal revenue."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the department of internal revenue shall include the following officers and clerks, who shall be appointed by the Commissioner aforesaid, to wit: one Assistant Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose salary shall be $4,000 per annum, and who shall be charged with such duties as shall be required by the Commissioner, and shall perform the duties and exercise the powers of Commissioner in case of the temporary absence or disability of that officer; six deputy commissioners, with a salary each of $3,000 per annum; twenty-five clerks of class four; forty clerks of class three; forty clerks of class two; twenty-five clerks of class one; and fifty female clerks. The Commissioner may employ three messengers, three assistant messengers, and ten laborers, whose compensation shall be as is now by law provided. And there shall also be one solicitor of internal revenue, with a salary of $4,000 per annum, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move the following amendment from the committee. In line fifteen strike out the word "now," so that it will read "whose compensation shall be as is by law provided."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "clerks," in line thirteen, insert "And there shall be a disbursing clerk for the department, the said clerk to be appointed out of class four by the head of said department, and to receive such sum in addition to his regular salary as may amount in all to $2,000 per annum. But it shall be his further duty, when designated by the head of the department for that service, to superintend the buildings; and he shall give bonds as required by the independent Treasury act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SELYE. I move to amend by inserting in line thirteen, after the word "clerks," the following:

Provided, That no females shall be employed other than wives, widows, or daughters of soldiers who served in the late war.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I offer this amendment for the purpose of giving preference to the relatives of those who have fought the battles of the country, and who in many cases have become poor and needy by reason of service performed for the Government. That is all I have to say on that subject.

Mr. UPSON. On which side may they have served in the war?

Mr. SELYE. No matter, sir. [Laughter.] No one supposes we are legislating here for rebels who never have been in the service of the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to insert after the word "served" the words "in the Army of the United States."

Mr. SELYE. I accept that.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I know of at least one case where an orphan sister is the only representative of a dead soldier, and she is now employed. Does the gentleman mean to turn her out? [Laughter.]

Mr. SELYE. Not at all; take her in. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. There might be mothers also who have lost sons in the war.

Mr. SELYE. Very well; we will take in sisters and mothers of those who served in the war.

The Clerk read the amendment, as modified, as follows:

Provided, That no females shall be employed other than wives, widows, daughters, sisters, or mothers of soldiers who served in the Army of the United States in the late war.

Mr. SELYE. I have one word more to say and that is, I am credibly informed and believe it to be true that more than half the females employed now in the Secretary of the Treasury's office and in the Commissioner's office, or any other Department of the Government are daughters of wealthy men in this city who opposed the war and are rebels yet.

Mr. MAYNARD. Allow me to speak in behalf of another class of ladies, some of whom I know are in the Departments. They are not connected, as I am aware, with soldiers, but they themselves were engaged in the hospital service of the country during the war and they labored faithfully and honestly, and in many instances impoverished themselves.

Mr. SELYE. Very well, include them.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to suggest to the gentleman that he has omitted the Navy and the Marine corps. Although not as numerous as the Army, I know of no reason for drawing a distinction, if we are going to put this in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the gentleman if he thinks this to be a proper subject of legislation? It is to be presumed that we will have some patriotic man in this office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue who will select this class of persons for appointments, and I am satisfied that if we undertake to designate particular classes we shall omit many meritorious and worthy persons.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would suggest that this amendment flies in the face of our idea of the equality of all persons before the law.

Mr. ALLISON. I am obliged to the gentleman for the suggestion. I only wanted to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if he thinks this a proper subject of legislation?

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to answering the gentleman. I do not think this a proper amendment to go into this bill. It should be the subject of independent legislation. This House has already voted that the appointing power ought to make this distinction in the appointment of persons to office.

I am warmly in favor of making such distinction; and I think it ought to be made; but I am sorry to say, however, that very little regard is paid by the appointing power either to the recommendations, resolutions, or legislation of Congress on this subject.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio if we have not provided by law, in increasing the force in the Third Auditor's office, that soldiers should be appointed?

Mr. SCHENCK. That was a temporary arrangement.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, I suppose this may be a temporary arrangement.

Mr. SCHENCK. The time will come, however, when we shall have nobody of the class designated to fill these places.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then we can change the law.

The question was taken on Mr. SELYE's amendment, and it was disagreed to—ayes 40, noes 57.

Mr. SELYE. I move now to insert after the word "clerks," in line thirteen, the following:

Or as many thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That each officer and employé shall perform duty at least eight hours each day, or in accordance with law.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I am most earnestly opposed to this six-hour system which has grown up in the different Departments of this Government contrary to the pecuniary interest of the Government, contrary to the interest of all employes, contrary to law; and above all, contrary to the future welfare, morals, and general prosperity of all young men and ladies who are allowed to practice that system while employed by the Government. Who does not know that the cloven-footed devil is always looking up the idlers; and where does he lead to? Is it not to the faro-bank, the billiard-tables, and the drinking hell-holes in this city of sin and iniquity; whereas if they were employed the usual time all such temptations would be avoided, to a great extent at least, and the officers of the Government, whose duty it is to see that the laws of the country are faithfully executed, will have the satisfaction of knowing that they have not daily violated the law of the land or contributed to sustain a system so pernicious and ruinous to all who are thus employed.

The following is the existing law in relation to the hours of labor. I read section twelve of the act to reorganize the General Land Office, approved July 4, 1836. (Statutes-at-Large, vol. 5, page 112:)

"From the 1st day of the month of October until the 1st day of the month of April in each and every year the General Land Office and all the bureaus and offices therein, as well as those in the Departments of the Treasury, War, Navy, State, and General Post Office, shall be open for the transaction of the public business at least eight hours in each and every day, except Sundays, and the 25th day of December; and from the 1st day of April until the 1st day of October in each year all the aforesaid offices and bureaus shall be kept open for the transaction of the public business at least ten hours in each and every day, except Sundays and the 4th day of July."

Besides, Mr. CHAIRMAN, can any man succeed in any business of any kind, professional or otherwise, by laboring only six hours out of twenty-four? The population of this nation could not be clothed and fed under any such system. What would become of your income-tax if all of the people should adopt the six hour rule? We all know that there would be no income-tax—not one dollar. Is there one single member in this House who has accumulated anything like a competency for himself and family by laboring six hours per day? If none, why require the people to pay a tax to support a system that no man of usual energy, industry, and integrity ever practiced, or ever will, and at the same time pay their honest debts. I hope, sir, this amendment will be adopted.

The question was taken on the amendment; and there were—ayes 52, noes 45.

Mr. SCHENCK called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendments being offered to the third section, the Clerk read the fourth section, as follows:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall organize a system for the distribution of labor and duties in his department by establishing six divisions therein, to each one of which shall be referred whatever relates to a particular class of subjects, as follows:

Division No. 1.—All that relates to special taxes, and taxes on sales and gross receipts.

Division No. 2.—All that relates to stamps.

Division No. 3.—All that relates to taxes on legacies and successions, incomes and salaries, banks and other corporations.

Division No. 4.—All that relates to the taxes on distilled spirits and oils.

Division No. 5.—All that relates to the taxes on tobacco, snuff, and cigars, and fermented liquors.

Division No. 6.—All that relates to the bonds of revenue officers and others, and the keeping and settlement of the accounts of collectors and other officers.

The Commissioner may from time to time change, add to, or take from the duties and subjects pertaining to either of these divisions, as may seem to him expedient for the dispatch of business and for the public interest; and he may distribute among them, at his discretion, other matters pertaining to the department not herein enumerated. He shall assign to duty at the head of each of said divisions one of the deputy commissioners, and in the absence, or during any disability, of the deputy, any other officer or clerk of the department whom he may select for such service or supervision. And he shall assign to each division, from among the clerks and employes of the department, such number of clerks and others as he may deem proper and required for the transaction of business.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend in line fourteen by striking out the words "and oils," so that it will read, "all that relates to the taxes on distilled spirits."

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I will state the reason for that amendment. I propose when we come to the section on mineral oils, to move to strike out the tax on oils entirely. The Senate, it will be remembered, reduced the tax which had previously existed at twenty cents per gallon to ten cents per gallon, and the House concurred in that amendment. The whole amount of revenue derived from that tax, at the rate of ten cents per gallon, was but $3,000,000. It requires a great deal of machinery to collect it, involving a large expense to the Government; and I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] who so eloquently advocated "the poor man's light," that we can give up that tax. I propose, therefore, when we come to the sections which impose the tax and regulate the machinery for its collection, to move to strike out all those sections. We may as well meet the question here as in any other place and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MULLINS. I rise to oppose the amendment upon the ground that although it is assumed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] that he will move to strike out the tax of ten cents per gallon on mineral oil, when we get to that part of the bill, still if he should fail in that, then this bill will have been mutilated to no purpose. "Sufficient to the day is the evil thereof." If his future amendment should carry, then these words will be nugatory.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. What I mean to say is that if the tax on oil is to be taken off we may as well meet the question here as at any other place. And if the Committee of the Whole adopt this amendment, it will be an indication that they intend to take off the tax on mineral oils altogether. I think it is one of the great industries of the country that ought to be encouraged.

Mr. MULLINS. It is time enough to count chickens after they are hatched, not before. I do not want to mark this until it is really mine. I do not want to change the bill in this respect until a change is made in the other respect. I cannot see the propriety of striking out these words here if they are not stricken out of the other part of the bill. If the tax on mineral oils is not stricken out of the other part of the bill, of course some officer will have to take cognizance of it; and if this amendment is made here some arrangement will then have to be made in some other part of the bill. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the amendment so as not to strike out the word "and" before "oils." I do this for the purpose of saying that the object of my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts,] must be obvious to this committee. It is to present a test question whether mineral oils shall or shall not continue to pay a tax of ten cents per gallon.

Now, I think, and I will so suggest to the gentleman, that perhaps it would be better to reserve this question for the consideration of a fuller committee than we now have. If we divide upon it now, we will do so at the risk of finding ourselves without a quorum; we will do so with a very thin committee, at all events. It is a question of some importance, of so much importance that I think we ought not to dispose of it without a division.

Now, I do not say this because I am entirely opposed to this amendment. I have been gradually drifting to the conclusion, having reduced the tax on mineral oils from twenty cents to ten cents per gallon, yielding us a revenue of a little over two million dollars, that that amount of revenue can be made up by putting mineral oils in among other general manufactures which pay a special tax of ten dollars, and a tax of two tenths of one per cent. on all sales over $5,000, thus making a saving by getting rid of all the machinery now provided in reference to the transportation of mineral oils.

Now, I suggest that as the gentleman has indicated the view he takes of the matter by the motion he has made, it would be well for him to withdraw his amendment at this time; and if we strike out the other provisions of the bill providing for the tax on mineral oils, and have them, as they would, to take their place among other general manufactures, we can, by common consent, turn back here and make the necessary change.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will consent to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and withdraw my amendment, with the understanding that if the change I have indicated is hereafter made in the sections imposing a tax upon mineral oils, I shall then be allowed to renew this amendment to this section.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope unanimous consent will be given for that purpose.

No objection was made; and the amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

No further amendment was offered to the section.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That separate accounts shall be kept of all moneys received from internal taxes in each of the respective States and collection districts, and of the amount collected from each subject of taxation, so as to exhibit, as far as may be, the amount received from each source of revenue, with the moneys paid as compensation and for allowances to the collectors and deputy collectors, assessors and assistant assessors, inspectors, and other officers employed in each of the respective States and collection districts, an abstract in tabular form of which accounts it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, annually, in the month of December, to lay before Congress.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out in the section just read the word "inspectors." It has been put in by some inadvertence, as we propose to dispense with inspectors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next section was read as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have power to appoint and remove all collectors, assessors, assistant assessors, supervisors of internal revenue, inspectors, gaugers, storekeepers, and other officers and clerks provided for in this act, who shall severally give bond for the faithful performance of their duties, as may be required by law.

Mr. SCHENCK. By direction of the Committee of Ways and Means I offer the following amendment:

Strike out after the words "internal revenue" the words "inspectors, gaugers, storekeepers, and other officers and clerks provided for in this act, who shall severally give bond for the faithful performance of their duties as may be required by law," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "gaugers, storekeepers, and other officers and clerks employed in the internal revenue service, except as otherwise provided for in this act," so that the section will read as follows: That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have power to appoint and remove all collectors, assessors, assistant assessors, supervisors of internal revenue, gaugers, storekeepers, and other officers and clerks employed in the internal revenue service, except as otherwise provided for in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PILE. I move further to amend this section, as follows:

Strike out the words "collectors, assessors," and after the word "that," where it first occurs, insert the following:

"All collectors and assessors of internal revenue shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and," so that the section will read as follows:

That all collectors and assessors of internal revenue shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have power to appoint and remove all assistant assessors, supervisors of internal revenue, gaugers, storekeepers, and other officers and clerks employed in the internal revenue service, except as otherwise provided for in this act.

Mr. Chairman, my object in offering this amendment is to leave the appointment of assessors and collectors as it now stands under existing laws, giving to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the head of this department, if this bill should become a law, the appointment of all the subordinate officers. I have doubts as to the propriety of giving to the head of this department authority to appoint, without the advice and consent of the Senate, so many and so important officers, embracing the collectors and assessors of internal revenue in all the districts of this country. It is such power as, I believe, is not possessed or exercised by any other Department of the Government. While I can see that there are at the present time reasons for this provision which may not exist a year hence, while difficulties in the collection of the revenue may arise from permitting these assessors and collectors still to be appointed and removed as they now are, I think we shall find ourselves in greater difficulty if, after erecting the Bureau of Internal Revenue into a department, we make the appointment and removal of all these officers subject to the will of one man without the advice or concurrence of any other department of the Government, and that man not, perhaps, the present incumbent, but some other individual who may be appointed to his place by the present Executive of this nation.

I simply offer the amendment as a test amendment on this point, and shall not press it if not sustained by the majority of the committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. I accept the amendment as a test; and it is a very important one. The gentleman from Missouri thinks it dangerous to give to the head of a bureau the appointment of assessors and collectors. He is willing to give the appointment of subordinate officers, except assessors and collectors, to the head of the bureau; but assessors and collectors he desires shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. That is the way they are now appointed; and beautifully it is done! It is another of those difficulties which arise from the fact that the responsibility is not felt as responsibility ought to be felt, if we are going to have the revenue department administered with the energy necessary to collect the taxes.

The gentleman may say there is a distinction between these officers and others; that they are more important than others, and therefore should be confirmed by the Senate on the nomination of the President. Why, sir, we have this anomaly existing now. While assessors and collectors are nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate before they can be commissioned, there is a class of officers called special agents appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the head of the Department alone exercising vastly more power than the collectors and assessors. We have not only sent special agents to all parts of the country to range over the collection districts and to thrust aside the collectors and assessors and perform the duties of both of these officers, but there is another provision that a collector under commission by the Senate may be transferred by the head of the Department to any other collection district to which he has not been appointed in any part of the United States. Such officers are in collection districts to-day doing the duty appertaining to regular officers.

Mr. WARD. Suppose this section should become a law, and the present incumbent should be suspended during the recess of Congress, would not the ad interim appointee remove and fill the places of every collector and assessor?

Mr. SCHENCK. By the first section he cannot be suspended except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. There is specific legislation; but these gentlemen rate more highly than I do the Senate confirmation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PILE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out the sixth section; and I desire to call the attention of the committee to its provisions. It declares that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have power to appoint and remove all collectors, assessors, assistant assessors, supervisors of internal revenue, inspectors, gaugers, storekeepers, and other officers and clerks provided for in this act, who shall severally give bond for the faithful performance of their duties as may be required by law. This section, to use the language which my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] applied to another subject, is the soul of the first section. The first is the body, of which the sixth section is the soul. Now, I desire to call the attention of the committee to its provisions.

There are now in the revenue service of the United States twenty-one hundred and five officers, who are appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. There are two thousand and four others, as I gather from the gentleman's statement in his speech. He will correct me if I am wrong. There are two hundred and forty-three assessors and two hundred and forty-three collectors, two hundred and thirty-eight revenue inspectors, two hundred and sixty-eight special inspectors of spirits, and so on, making up a total of twenty-one hundred and five not now appointed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. In the third section there is provided that officers and clerks to the number of two hundred and four—I am not quite clear but I am underestimating it, but the gentleman will correct me if I am wrong—to be appointed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. There were forty-one hundred and nine officials in the revenue department during last year, at a total salary of $6,500,000.

Mr. BLAINE. Collecting $200,000,000 of revenue.

Mr. GARFIELD. These persons have the sole charge, according to this bill, of the assessment and collection of $200,000,000. This bill proposes to put the whole internal revenue of this country into the hands of one man—the entire power of appointment and removal at pleasure, without the consent, let, or hindrance of any mortal man. All these four thousand people, receiving an aggregate salary of $6,500,000, have the control of the assessment and collection of $200,000,000.

I mean further to say that such a proposition as putting this power into the hands of any one man I have not heard of in the history of this Government down to this hour. Suppose Mr. Rollins should die, and the day after his death the President of the United States should appoint any creature of his choice, and suppose the man so appointed to that place should choose to take three thousand men out of the Tombs and other prisons of the country for his subordinates. Of course this is a violent supposition; but suppose he should attempt to fill the entire revenue department with rascals. The entire amount of the revenue is then in the hands of just such villains as any one bad man may appoint.

One thought more. The talk of the tremendous power of the whisky ring. What will that ring be in comparison with the ring that will control all this revenue, not only all the whisky tax, but all other proceeds of the Internal Revenue Department of this Government? The proposition appears to me monstrous in its effect upon the future of this country, and I am unwilling to legislate to set in motion all this vast new and untried machinery just because we have a President and Secretary of the Treasury to be in office only for a few months longer whom some of us do not like, I among the number. I hope this section will be stricken out.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, collectors and assessors of revenue are now nominated by the President and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. But all these thousands of officers, without the reduction of some seventeen hundred that we propose in our bill, are now appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury without such confirmation by the Senate. Not a word does the gentleman say about all these thousands in the custom-house and elsewhere. The gentleman has had no alarm on account of the Secretary of the Treasury possessing too much power over them; but when we propose to take a part of them away and diminish that part by reducing very considerably the number and giving the appointment of them to the head of another department to be created, then the country is to be alarmed at this monstrous attempt.

Mr. HIGBY. A single question. Is it not charged that they are rascals now?

Mr. SCHENCK. Oh, I do not care whether they are rascals or not. I am replying to the argument of my colleague. These subordinate officers are not confirmed now by the Senate. They are appointed now by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the gentleman is afraid that somebody else will have the appointment of part of them. I do not see the consistency of his argument. I do not see why this alarm has not been sounded throughout the country before this time. Sir, we have sounded it; we have said that the Treasury Department has grown up, has become inflated to such an extent in the amount of its patronage, has been brought to such an inconvenient condition from the fact that the Secretary as one head of it is not able to give his personal attention and responsibility if he undertakes faithfully to do his duty as to all these ramified powers vested in him, that it would be better to aggregate a part of them, reduce the number of subordinates, and put them under somebody who shall be able to have the immediate supervision and control of them, because he will be directing the particular duties in which they are to be employed. That is the whole proposition. It is to bring down in some degree, to divide, to distribute, to make secure, to bring under more distinct light and observation a portion of the duties of that officer, the power over which has been heretofore wielded by the Secretary of the Treasury. That is what we propose.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is not in order at this time to move an amendment for the purpose of perfecting the section?

The CHAIRMAN. That is now in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move, then, to add after the word "removed," in line two, the following: "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and not otherwise;" then in line three, to add the word "and" between the words "collectors" and "assessors," and then after the word assessors, in line three, to add "and shall have full power to appoint and remove all assistant assessors, supervisors of internal revenue, gaugers," &c.

Mr. BLAINE. He cannot make nominations to the Senate.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, I would rather leave it there for three or four months. My object is that we shall not destroy the whole system that we have lived under so far and go to something which is entirely antagonistic to our past system, so radical that without a trial the gentleman who has charge of this bill cannot imagine what the possible result might be. We have in some form or other collected revenue, internal or external, from the foundation of the Government, and I feel somewhat of the foreboding of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] when I contemplate the placing of this immense power in the hands of the man who is at the head of the revenue bureau. Not that he is a dangerous man in himself, but something may transpire which shall remove him from the duties of that office in less than ten days, perhaps in a single day; and who have we got there then to administer this office?

I do not believe that any person under this Government ought to have the power of appointing the assessors and collectors of this internal revenue except the President; not because of the present President, but because I hope we are to have a better President in time, and not many months hence. Why is it necessary to legislate here in regard to this great interest now? Two months of consideration and legislation in this House and in the Senate will probably be required to perfect this bill. There will then remain of the present President's term perhaps six months, and you are going to revolutionize the entire system of the Government for the sake of administering the internal revenue department under a different system for some six months, and after the expiration of those six months it is expected you will bring in a bill to repeal the whole thing and place the appointing power back where it now is, in the hands of the President. I am, therefore, opposed to it, and I want to so amend the section as that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have full power over the appointment of these inferior officers, but not of assessors and collectors.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois for the reason that any amendment that partially cures the evils of this section, in my judgment, will only make it more difficult to strike the whole section out.

I need not repeat to my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] that I dislike, perhaps more than any other man upon this floor, to differ with him; but it seems to me that in carrying us into the principle of this section he is trying a scheme which no man can see the end of.

Now, the fact that my colleague has alleged has strengthened the point I made. He said that I had understated the figures in one particular to the extent of seventeen hundred. I answer that that makes my case stronger, because, instead of four thousand, that makes nearly six thousand persons who are to be appointed by this one man.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said that we propose about seventeen hundred less than the number that he wants to keep for the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; then I misunderstood him.

Now, I must say to my colleague in the utmost kindness that I do not consider it quite fair in argument here, when we are talking about the merits of such a bill as this, to intimate that one who holds the views I hold upon this subject is the peculiar champion of the Secretary of the Treasury and to use such language as "the gentleman's beloved Secretary."

What have I said to eulogize the Secretary of the Treasury or any other person? Most of all am I unwilling to have anybody suppose that I find the least fault with the conduct of the present head of the Internal Revenue Bureau.

The gentleman says there are only a few hundred of these persons who are now appointed by and with the advice of the Senate. Well, sir, whatever few hundred there are, it is now proposed to take from the Senate any voice in their appointment, and from the day this bill becomes a law the Senate of the United States will have no control whatever over the appointment, the removal, or the suspension of a single officer of the internal revenue, except this very Commissioner himself; and in his case only when there shall be a vacancy by death or resignation.

We have thought it necessary for the protection of this Government to pass a bill known as the tenure-of-office law. But here is a proposition before us to take these five thousand officers of the Government entirely out from under the operation of the civil-tenure-of-office law, and make them absolutely independent both of us and of the Senate, at any time when Congress may not be in session. I shall feel that we have taken a larger load upon our shoulders; that this Congress has taken a heavier burden upon its back than any Congress ever successfully carried, if we enact this section into a law. I hope the section will be stricken out.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I desire to say but a word or two in reply to a remark of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.] I desire, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, to say to him that if a single member of that committee was influenced in framing this bill by any reference to providing against the present incumbent of the presidential chair, or any other officer of this Government, I certainly failed to become aware of it.

The Committee of Ways and Means were actuated by a desire to provide in some manner for the better collection of the revenues of this Government. The developments that came before us were such as to justify almost any step whatever that they believed would result in that improvement. I do not believe that the committee had the slightest possible desire to merely meet the emergency growing out of the fact that any particular man now occupies any particular office of this Government. For one, I desire to repudiate entirely the idea the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] has thrown out upon that point.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion until I can modify my amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. INGERSOLL. After I have modified my amendment I hope I may be allowed to say a word in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRISWOLD.]

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well; I modify my amendment so as only to strike out the words "collectors, assessors," in the third line of the section.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I renew the motion that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled, a joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 278) to supply books and public documents to the national asylums for disabled volunteer soldiers.

MIAMI AND ERIE CANAL.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, presented the following communication, preamble, and resolutions:

STATE OF OHIO, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.
COLUMBUS, May 30, 1868.

Sir: I have the honor to transmit herewith joint resolution "looking to a survey of the Miami and Eric Canal," adopted by the General Assembly of Ohio, May 16, 1868.

Very respectfully,

R. B. HAYES,
Governor.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE, Washington, D. C.

Joint resolution looking to a survey of the Miami and Erie canal.

Whereas the great and increasing population and resources of the State of Ohio, and of the West and southwest of the United States, and the necessity of furnishing easy water communication between the East and West, both in peace and in war, demand that some step should be taken for the improvement of our present means of transportation for the products of these portions of the country: Therefore Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the Representatives of the State of Ohio in Congress be, and they are hereby requested, and the Senators from the State instructed, to use all proper efforts and influence to procure a survey of the Miami and Erie canal, from Cincinnati to Toledo, for the purpose of causing the same to be enlarged to the capacity of a ship-canal for the connection of the waters of the Ohio and Mississippi with the great lakes.

Resolved, That the Governor of this State be requested to cause a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution to be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

JOHN F. FOLLETT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

WM. LAWRENCE,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Adopted May 16, 1868.

THE STATE OF OHIO,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, John Russell, Secretary of State of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution therein named, adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio on the 16th day of May, A. D. 1868, taken from the original rolls on file in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the seal of this office, at Columbus, the 23d day of May, A. D. 1868.

JOHN RUSSELL,
Secretary of State.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I introduced a bill some weeks since, which was referred to the proper committee, to authorize an enlargement of the Miami and Erie canal so as to make a ship-canal from Cincinnati to Toledo, thus connecting the waters of the Ohio and the Mississippi with the great lakes. If this should be done, as it will be done sooner or later, Cincinnati, Toledo, and the cities of my district will have most if not all of the advantages of the sea-board cities. Ships will go directly from Cincinnati by way of Troy, Pequa, and Toledo through the great lakes out to the ocean and to all the ports of the world. That this work will be made is one of the certainties of the future. It is only a question of time. Forty years ago no one could have foreseen the completion of our stupendous canals, railroads, and other improvements, and in the near future we will realize the completion of a ship-canal, not only on the route proposed, but on one less important but more discussed from Chicago by way of Joliet to La Salle, so as to connect Chicago with the Mississippi river.

The House has this day passed a bill giving two hundred thousand acres of land in Minnesota to build a dam across the Mississippi. That may be important to the interests of commerce, but not so much so as the proposed ship-canal. I move the reference of the preamble and resolution I have presented to the Committee on Commerce, and that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BROOMALL: The petitions of 15 manufacturing firms of Chester and Delaware counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, employing, when in full operation, 324 workmen, now employing 174 workmen, representing that the productive interests of the country are suffering for want of efficient protection against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries; that the customs duties, which, under a high gold premium, were sufficient to create and foster manufactures, are now wholly inadequate, and, in prospect of a continued decline in gold, must shortly prove ruinous; that much of the distress now prevailing would be relieved by the legislation suggested in Special Commissioner Well's report of last year, and perfected in the tariff bill as passed by the Senate, which failed in the House March 1867; and praying that Congress will resume consideration of that measure and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

Also, the petitions of 155 operatives of Todmerden and Manchester Mills at Media, Pennsylvania, praying that Congress will resume consideration of the tariff bill which failed in the House of Representatives March 1867, and enact it into a law at the earliest practicable moment.

By Mr. BOYER: The petition of William Hemphill, guardian of the minor brother of David Hemphill, deceased, late private in company E, seventy-second regiment Pennsylvania volunteers, for a pension.

By Mr. CAKE: The petition of Captain C. F. Glover and others, manufacturers of and dealers and workers in tobacco, against an increase in the tax on cigars, and recommending the collection of the tax by a revenue stamp instead of an inspector's stamp.

By Mr. FARNSWORTH: The petition of sundry cigar manufacturers and dealers in tobacco, of Rockford, Illinois, upon the subject of the tax on those articles.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut: A remonstrance of sundry citizens of Hartford, Connecticut, against proposed increase of tax on cigars.

By Mr. LINCOLN: A remonstrance of Aaron Ogden and others, of Owego, New York, against an increase of the tax on cigars.

Also, a remonstrance of Farrand & Platts and others, of Ithaca, New York, on same subject.

Also, a remonstrance of Westcott & Kent and others, of Binghamton, New York, on same subject.

Also, the petition of Cigar-maker's Union of Binghamton, New York, on same subject.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: The petition of Miss A. E. Hamilton, of Alleghany city, Pennsylvania, praying that pensions may be allowed her for her two adopted sons who were killed in the war.

By Mr. O'NEILL: A remonstrance of journeymen cigar-makers and manufacturers of cigars, against the proposed changes in the tax upon cigars.

By Mr. RANDALL: The petition of sundry cigar-makers, asking various amendments to the proposed revenue bill now being considered.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 5, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, in favor of a survey of the Miami and Erie canal, with a view of having the same enlarged; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of Richard B. Duane, representative of the estate of Washington Tams, deceased, praying to be refunded rents for premises from which he was evicted by United States troops; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Horace Tyler, praying compensation for deepening the channel across the bar at the mouth of the southwestern pass of the mouth of the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial of John A. Dix, Richard M. Blatchford, and George Opdyke, praying for the passage of a law in reference to certain accounts on the books of the Treasury Department against them; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of the Selma, Rome, and Dalton Railroad Company, praying Congress to except from the operation of House bill No. 267 the lands heretofore granted to the State of Alabama for the Alabama and Tennessee river railroad, and since transferred to the first named corporation; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McCREERY presented a resolution of the Mechanics' State Council of California, in favor of the passage of a law making eight hours a legal day's work in all Government workshops; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented three petitions of citizens of the United States, praying the passage of a law making eight hours a legal day's work in all Government workshops; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CONNESS presented the memorial of Samuel F. Butterworth, praying to be relieved from all liabilities as security for W. G. Kendall, late deputy postmaster at New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the memorial of the Baltimore Copper Company, praying the admission of foreign copper ores free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented a petition of Cigar-makers Union No. 73, of Fort Wayne, Indiana, praying that the tax of five dollars per thousand on cigars may be retained, and that the present tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. WILLEY, it was Ordered, That Henry Bodenheimer & Co. have leave to withdraw their memorial from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 372) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Brownville, Nebraska, and for aiding other railroads in the State of Nebraska to intersect the Union Pacific railroad, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 198) to reestablish the boundaries of the collection districts of Michigan and Michilimackinac, and to change the names of the collection districts of Michilimackinac and Port Huron, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 538) to extend the boundaries of the collection district of Philadelphia so as to include the whole consolidated city of Philadelphia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1120) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the names of certain vessels, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of James F. Joy, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Emma M. Moore, widow of E. W. Moore, deceased, praying payment of the amount due him as an officer of the late navy of Texas, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 605) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 513) concerning land claims in the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 514) for the relief of Monroe Young; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CONTRACTS PAYABLE IN COIN.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there be no further morning business, I desire to call up a bill to which, so far as I know, there is no objection, and yet which it is very desirable should be passed soon. It is the bill in regard to contracts for the payment of gold. I move to take up Senate bill No. 180.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 180) relative to United States notes was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is scarcely worth while to read the original bill. The amendment only, which is a substitute for it in a few words, need be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:

That any contract hereafter made, specifically payable in coin, shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms, anything in the several acts relating to United States notes to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "hereafter made," and the reason of that is very plain. No law takes effect until its passage, and I think no law should be passed giving a construction to a past law. That rests with the judiciary, and I think it ought to be left an open question for the judiciary to determine whether the existing law authorizes such contracts. The insertion of the words "hereafter made" necessarily implies a kind of legislative intimation that under the legal-tender act, as it is called, contracts specifically payable in coin might be paid in paper. I do not think that is the construction of that law, with great deference to those who entertain a different opinion; but whether that be so or not, by striking out these words we leave the bill without any intimation of that kind, because it only takes effect from its passage, and cannot affect any contract made antecedent to its passage. If antecedent to the passage of this amendment contracts were made payable in coin, and yet the law of the land authorized a party to pay them in paper, by striking out these words that right will not be affected. That is clear, because the law only takes effect from its passage. I submit, therefore, that the words ought to be struck out, and I make the motion to strike out the words "hereafter made" in the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will state the reason why the committee refused, I think unanimously, to make this provision retroactive in its character. If the words "hereafter made" are stricken out the section will legalize all contracts payable in gold at the time. There are several suits now pending in the Supreme Court that would be affected by such an ex post facto law, if it may be so called, although that term cannot be properly applied in strictness to a law relative to contracts. We propose to make the law clear and definite as to contracts in the future, leaving existing contracts to stand upon the rights of the parties as they now are. This provision does not affect them in the least, or give a construction to the law as it now exists, but simply provides that contracts payable in coin hereafter made may be enforced by our courts. There are several suits now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States that the motion of the honorable Senator would affect. We thought it was not right to affect contracts already made, and especially not to change the law relating to contracts in suits now pending. The section as it is reported I believe meets the assent not only of the Committee on Finance, but of the whole business community, and will, no doubt, prepare us to deal in specie again, and lead the way eventually to specie payments. It is universally demanded by the business interests of the country in all parts. I would not, therefore, like to introduce a question that might be embarrassing at this time. I hope the Senator will waive his amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. It surprises me to hear the honorable Senator from Ohio contend that a law passed now having no retrospective language would affect a contract previously made in any way. I never heard of such a principle of law myself. I do not see that it is possible, and I would be one of the last men in this body to urge an amendment which should affect an existing right pending in a court of justice. But it cannot possibly have that effect. The law speaks only from the time of its passage. Strike out the words "hereafter made" and the law simply remedies the future; it leaves the past to the construction of antecedent acts. Is there a lawyer in this body who can doubt that that is the legal effect of necessity of passing the law in the shape which I indicate? If I thought there was the slightest ground in the objection of the honorable Senator from Ohio, I would not only withdraw the amendment, but I would never have proposed it; but it is impossible that a law with no retrospective language could affect contracts made antecedently to its passage; and if it could not affect them, they would stand on the former law. But, on the contrary, leaving the words "hereafter made" in, is a kind of congressional or legislative intimation as to what is the proper construction of an antecedent law. It ought to be done in neither way. We should simply pass an act that governs the future, and leave the past to judicial interpretation under antecedent acts of Congress. I submit, therefore, that the words ought to be stricken out.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware. I do not think the objection of the Senator from Ohio is a sound one. I do not think this proposition is retroactive in its nature. While it is not competent for the Legislature of a State, under the provisions of the Constitution, to make a contract invalid which was valid at the time it was made, yet it is competent even for a State Legislature to remove a legal impediment to the execution of a contract; in other words, to make that valid which otherwise would be invalid. That is not regarded as retroactive legislation.

Now, sir, I do not know why a man who has agreed in the past to pay in gold, when the contracting parties knew there was a difference in the value between gold and currency, should not be in good faith required to pay in gold. The trouble is because of the legislation of Congress; and if the legislation of Congress is in the way of carrying out in good faith a contract between two parties, they understanding the subject of the contract, I am in favor of removing any such impediment. Nor is this in the way of the policy of the Government making Treasury notes a legal tender. If parties waive that let them do so. In the absence of an express contract, of course the legal tender pays the debt, but if the parties have agreed to pay in gold they ought to do it. In my practice of the law this case came to me; a guardian deposited gold the first or second year of the war, and took a special certificate of deposit in which the banker agreed to pay it back in gold. Gold appreciated. When the demand was made the banker refused to pay, and there had to be a compromise. The banker got the gold and then refused to live up to his bargain. I am not in favor of any such legislation as will allow a man to do that. We know there is a difference between gold and currency in value, and if a man sells his property to be paid in currency, let it be so paid; but if he sells his property at the gold standard, let that be the standard which shall govern in the judgment as it did in the contract.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected—ayes nine, noes not counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the committee; that is, the substitute for the original bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed; and its title was amended so as to read: "A bill relating to contracts payable in coin."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives requested the return of the bill (H. R. No. 448) to change the name of the ship Golconda, it having been inadvertently sent to the Senate as having been passed by the House.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 278) to supply books and public documents to the national asylums for disabled volunteer soldiers.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1117) to supply partial deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1868, with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 28) to protect the rights of actual settlers upon the public lands of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 202) to create the office of surveyor general in the Territory of Utah, and establish a land office in said Territory, and extend the homestead and preemption laws over the same;

A bill (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of navigation of the Mississippi river;

A bill (H. R. No. 934) amendatory of the act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, and of the acts amendatory thereof, approved March 21, 1864, and June 21, 1866;

A bill (H. R. No. 1121) to prevent an appropriation therein mentioned from lapsing because of delay in the adjustment;

A bill (H. R. No. 1118) to confirm to J. M. Hutchings and J. C. Lamon their preemption claims in the Yosemite valley, in the State of California;

A bill (H. R. No. 1156) authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a patent to F. N. Blake for one hundred and sixty acres of land in Kansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 1157) to cede to the State of Ohio the unsold lands in the Virginia military district in said State;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 281) to provide for the removal of a suit pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, West Virginia, to the circuit court of the United States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 286) relative to the lands of the Cherokee and Great and Little Osage Indians.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 331) to extend the time for completing the military road authorized by an act entitled "An act granting lands to the States of Michigan and Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a military road from Fort Wilkins, Copper Harbor, Keweenaw county, in the State of Michigan, to Fort Howard, Green Bay, in the State of Wisconsin."

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 188) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of the inhabitants of the cities and towns upon the public lands," approved March 2, 1867; and

A bill (S. No. 190) to further provide for giving effect to the various grants of public land to the State of Nevada.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 278) to supply books and public documents to the national asylums for disabled volunteer soldiers, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read through.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps I can save time by briefly stating to the Senate what the changes made in the House bill are. The bill as it came from the House of Representatives provides for the admission of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress. The committee have amended the bill so far as to strike out Alabama, and, as the bill is printed, to insert Florida, but a majority of the committee do not agree to the insertion of Florida; and that is a mistake. Florida should not be in the bill as the report of the committee, although, as one member of the committee, I was in favor of inserting Florida. A majority of the committee, however, are opposed to it, and, although printed in that form, Florida is not inserted by the majority of the committee. It arose out of a misunderstanding as to how the majority of the committee stood, the committee not being full at the time the vote was taken and Florida inserted.

Alabama is stricken out for reasons which are known probably to the whole Senate. The election on the ratification of the constitution in the State of Alabama took place while the law required that a majority of all the registered voters should vote on the question of ratification. There are in the State of Alabama, as appears by the official report of General Meade, 170,631 registered voters. On the question of the ratification of the constitution, as also appears by an official report, there were cast 70,812 votes. One half of the registered voters would have been 85,315. Only 70,812 votes were cast on both sides at the election held for the ratification of the constitution in the State of Alabama. It is known that the vote was almost entirely upon one side. Only 1005 were cast against the constitution in the State of Alabama, the opponents of the constitution not going to the polls as a general thing. For that reason, the Committee on the Judiciary, the constitution not having been ratified in accordance with the law at the time the vote was taken, have stricken out Alabama.

The other States, the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Georgia voted after the passage of a law by Congress requiring only a majority of the votes cast to ratify the constitution, and in those States, as appears by a report which I have before me from the general of the Army, based upon returns made by the generals in command of the military districts embracing those States, it appears that in the State of North Carolina 92,590 votes were cast for the constitution and 71,820 against it, leaving a majority of some 20,000 and upward in favor of the constitution. In South Carolina the vote for the constitution was 70,758, against the constitution 27,288, leaving a majority of 43,000 votes and upward for the constitution. In Georgia the vote for the constitution was 89,007, against it 71,309, leaving a majority of over 17,000 in favor of the constitution. In Louisiana the vote for the constitution was 66,152, and against it 48,739, leaving a majority of 17,000 and upward in its favor.

Those are the only four States that remain in the bill according to the report of the Judiciary Committee. I will state, however, in regard to Florida, what the evidence is of the ratification of the constitution in that State. While the bill was pending before the Judiciary Committee I addressed a note to the General of the Army asking for any official information in his possession in regard to the ratification of the constitution in Florida, and received this answer:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., June 3, 1868.

SIR: Since my note of yesterday to you, I have received a telegram from General Meade, of which the accompanying is a copy, reporting the result of the Florida elections, and I send it to you in full answer to your inquiry.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
U. S. GRANT, General.
Hon. LYMAN TRUMBULL, United States Senator, Chairman Committee on Judiciary.

[Telegram received in cipher 2.40 p. m.]

WASHINGTON, June 2, 1868.

(From Atlanta, Georgia.)

To General U. S. GRANT,
Commanding Armies of the United States:

Official returns of the Florida elections, this day received, show for the constitution 14,511 votes; majority for the constitution 5,050 votes. In the office of Governor, Harrison Reed received 14,421 votes; George W. Scott received 7,731 votes; and Samuel Walker received 2,257 votes.

GEORGE G. MEADE,
Major General Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY UNITED STATES.

Official copy: GEORGE K. LEET,
Assistant Adjutant General.

REPRESENTATION OF ARKANSAS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1039) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS of Pennsylvania, Mr. F. C. BEAMAN of Michigan, and Mr. JAMES BROOKS of New York, managers at the same on its part.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before proceeding further with the bill under consideration, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the message from the House of Representatives disagreeing to the Senate amendment to the bill recognizing the State government in Arkansas, that we may have a committee of conference appointed. The House disagree to our amendment and ask for a committee of conference. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment and agree to the conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Messrs. TRUMBULL, DRAKE, and WILSON the conferees on the part of the Senate.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. House bill No. 1058 is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. When interrupted, Mr. President, I had read a letter from General Meade stating the vote in Florida. The papers to which I have referred furnish the evidence of the ratification of the various constitutions. I will now state the amendments made by the Senate committed to the House bill. The House bill contains a provision declaring that the constitutions of the several States named "shall never be amended or changed so as to discriminate in favor of or against any citizen or class of citizens of the United States in their right to vote, who are now entitled to vote by said constitutions, respectively, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted; and no person shall ever be held to service or labor as a punishment for crime in said States except by public officers charged with the custody of convicts by the laws thereof; and that so much of the seventeenth section of the fifth article of the constitution of the State of Georgia as gives authority to Legislatures or courts to repudiate debts contracted prior to the 1st day of June, 1865, and similar provisions in all other of the constitutions mentioned in this bill, shall be null and void as against all men who were loyal during the whole time of the rebellion, and who during that time supported the Union, and they shall have the same rights in the courts and elsewhere as if no rebellion had ever existed."

The first part of this fundamental condition is similar to the one which passed the House of Representatives in the Arkansas bill and which the Senate struck out and substituted for it an amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE,] and the committee have recommended the striking out of this fundamental condition and inserting the words contained in the amendment which was adopted by the Senate to the Arkansas bill with the exception of the words "or any other rights." Those words which were in that amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri are omitted by the Judiciary Committee in reporting this bill, it being thought that there was no necessity for their insertion, and that it might lead to a misunderstanding as to what their true purport was. The citizens of these States are protected in all their civil rights independent of this bill; and it might lead to misconception or misapprehension as to what the words "any other right" meant. It might be construed by some persons as applying possibly to social rights, or rights in schools, which the Senator from Missouri did not intend; and as the committee thought there was no importance in these words, they are left out of the amendment.

The committee also changed the latter part of the fundamental condition inserted by the House of Representatives, which declares null and void the clause in the constitution of the State of Georgia which repudiates all debts contracted prior to 1865, so far as loyal persons are concerned. It will be observed that the House bill repudiated the constitutional provision only in reference to loyal persons. The Committee on the Judiciary went further and also provided for striking out another provision in the constitution of Georgia besides the one relating to debts. I will read the provisions which are stricken out by the Senate amendment. One is the first sub-division of the seventeenth section of the fifth article, which reads as follows:

"No court in this State shall have jurisdiction to try or determine any suit against any resident of this State upon any contract or agreement made or implied, or upon any contract made in renewal of any debt existing prior to the 1st day of June, 1865; nor shall any court or ministerial officer of this State have authority to enforce any judgment, execution, or decree rendered or issued upon any contract or agreement made or implied, or upon any contract in renewal of a debt existing prior to the 1st day of June, 1865, except in the following cases."

Then follow certain exceptions in regard to trust debts and debts due charitable institutions, debts due mechanics, and then follows a proviso:

"Provided, That no court or officer shall have, nor shall the General Assembly give jurisdiction or authority to try or give judgment on or enforce any debt the consideration of which was a slave or slaves or the hire thereof."

The Committee on the Judiciary recommend an amendment which declares null and void all this first subdivision of the seventeenth section of the fifth article, except the proviso applying to debts contracted growing out of the sale or hire of slaves. The committee also have recommended to declare null and void the third subdivision of this seventeenth section. The third subdivision imposes a tax upon debts. Perhaps it will be best understood if I read it:

"III. It shall be in the power of the General Assembly to assess and collect upon all debts, judgments, or causes of action when due, founded on any contract made or implied before the 1st day of June, 1865, in the hands of any one in his own right, or as trustee, agent, or attorney of another, on or after the 1st day of January, 1868, a tax of not exceeding twenty-five per cent., to be paid by the creditor on pain of the forfeiture of the debt, but chargeable by him as to one half thereof against the debtor and collectable with the debt."

It will be observed that the Legislature is authorized by this provision to impose a tax of twenty-five per cent. on the amount of a debt collected, and one half of that is to be paid by the debtor. That is, the debtor is to pay his whole debt and twelve and a half per cent. beside; and the creditor is to pay twelve and a half per cent. of the amount of the debt. To that provision is appended this proviso:

"Provided, That this tax shall not be collected if the debt or cause of action be abandoned or settled without legal process, or if in judgment, be settled without levy and sale; And provided further, That this tax shall not be levied so long as the courts of this State shall not have jurisdiction of such debts or causes of action."

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary declares null and void both of these provisions, and requires that the Legislature of the State of Georgia shall, by solemn public act, declare the assent of the State to this fundamental condition. That is in accordance with the requirement made upon the State of Missouri in 1821 when that State was admitted into the Union.

There is a slight amendment also made in the second section of the bill as it passed the House. The House bill authorized the presidents of the conventions which formed the constitutions in those States to convene the Legislatures in case the time fixed by the constitutions themselves should have expired before the passage of this act. The committee have recommended to amend that so as to authorize the Governor-elect in each State to convene the Legislature, and also so as to provide for a case where the time shall not have arrived when the Legislature would be convened according to the constitution, but has so nearly arrived that there is no opportunity, in the opinion of the Governor, to call the Legislature together at the time prescribed. That is merely an amendment to perfect the bill.

The amendment in the third section is only to carry out the amendments that are made in the other sections.

I believe I have stated substantially what the changes recommended by the committee are, and I have no further suggestion at this time to make in regard to the matter.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose the question will be on the amendment reported as a substitute for the bill. I move to amend that amendment in the fourth line of the first section by adding after the word "Georgia" the word "Alabama;" so that it will read, "that each of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida shall be entitled," &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I rise, Mr. President, to express the hope that we shall not exclude Alabama from the benefits of admission with these other States. It seems to me that if there is any one of these States which ought to be welcomed here it is the State of Alabama. That State prepared its constitution earlier than any other State. The vote was taken at an unpropitious season of the year, at a time when storms and floods swept the State. A larger percentage of registered electors voted for that constitution than for any one of the constitutions of these States, with the exception of South Carolina; forty-four per cent. of the voters of Alabama voted for the constitution; in Georgia forty-three per cent. voted for the constitution, and in Arkansas thirty-eight per cent. voted for the constitution. In Alabama there was a vote of seventy thousand given for the constitution, and thirteen thousand of the votes registered were in counties where no votes at all were taken, including one county where nearly three thousand votes were taken and destroyed. I saw, when we adopted the provision requiring a majority of the registered voters to vote on the constitution, it would cause the failure of these States, and if we had adhered to it in these six other States only, I think we would have adopted the constitution. If that law had not existed, and the people had been summoned to vote for and against the ratification of the constitution, I have not the shadow of a doubt that the State of Alabama would have adopted her constitution by from thirty to fifty thousand majority.

I do not think we ought to take advantage of our own mistake, not to say blunder. Nobody is harmed by the admission of this State. Admit the State with the others; let the State government be organized; let the people be protected; let the State begin a career of peace and prosperity and advancement.

I do hope, sir, that the Senate will incorporate Alabama into this bill, and that she will share the fate of her sisters. If the vote had been taken in Alabama on the same principle that it has been taken in these other States, there would have been but very little contest in that State. With the exception of South Carolina I have not a doubt that Alabama is the strongest State, in proportion to her vote, for the reconstruction policy of Congress of any one of these States, and she failed solely on account of that provision of the law which we hastened to change as soon as we realized its workings. The result has been that these six other States have ratified their constitutions, and yet this State of Alabama gave a larger vote for the constitution than any other State, with the exception of South Carolina. Under these circumstances I think the Senate ought to adopt this amendment. We ought to agree with the House of Representatives to admit this State at the earliest possible moment, and to hasten the restoration of all these States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. DRAKE. I ask the honorable Senator to allow me to make a suggestion in this connection before he proceeds with his remarks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather go on, but I will hear the Senator.

Mr. DRAKE. I was going to make this suggestion for the consideration of the Senator from Ohio and the Senate: as there is now a committee of conference appointed on the part of the two Houses with regard to the main point in all these bills, to wit, the fundamental condition, might it not promote the early termination of the whole subject to lay this bill aside for the moment until that committee can agree upon the fundamental condition, and then we shall have got rid of the only ground of contention between the two Houses? I make the suggestion.

Mr. SHERMAN. The question to which I wish to address myself does not relate to the fundamental condition, in which when imposed on States being admitted into the Union I have not much confidence—certainly not quite so much as my friend from Missouri. The only subject to which I wish to address myself is the question of the admission of Alabama. I am convinced that in Alabama the people are more in a condition to maintain a State government than they are in any other of the southern States, without exception. The constitution of Alabama, as presented to us, is very similar in form to the constitutions of the other States. Their proceedings have been as regular, and perhaps more regular, than those of any other State. They have complied with every stipulation in the law except one, and the question now is whether on account of their inability to comply with that stipulation they shall be excluded from restoration to the Union. If that inability grew out of a want of loyalty to the Government, or any cause within their power of correction, I would hold them to strict compliance with the law; but the official papers here on our table show that they did all that it was possible for them to do to comply with the law, that they were deterred by physical causes totally beyond their power to overcome, and that they did more and made a greater effort to comply with the acts of Congress than any State among the southern States. All I wish to do now is to ask the attention of the Senate to a few facts put before us in official form to show what I here state; and then, in the face of these facts, the Senate will exclude the State of Alabama from admission here, the same arguments should prevail to exclude every one of the southern States.

Under the first supplementary act to the reconstruction act we required a majority of all the registered votes to be cast on the question of ratifying the State constitution. In fraud of that provision of the law, the rebels of the State of Alabama organized to defeat the constitution by deterring people from voting on the adoption of the constitution. For that we have the official statement of General Meade, supported by the testimony of two hundred witnesses, or about that number, laid on our table. The total registration according to the report of General Meade—I mean the first registration, the only one which ought to be counted—showed 166,685 voters. There was a subsequent registration, which swelled the number to 170,000; but the first registration, that which I take to be the legal one provided for by the act, bore the names of 166,685 persons. There were four counties in which it was impossible to vote, for reasons fully disclosed here. I exclude those counties from the computation, because in them there was no election, no opportunity whatever to vote, and consequently it would be very wrong to charge the whole of the registered population of those four counties as voting against the constitution, because the people there had no opportunity to vote for the reasons stated. That reduces the registered vote to 153,000. Seventy-one thousand eight hundred and seventeen persons voted, nearly all of them for the constitution. They only lacked four or five thousand of a majority of the whole registered vote. How is that accounted for? Why, sir, in every one of the counties of Alabama bands were organized for the purpose of deterring people from voting. They discharged by wholesale freedmen because they showed a disposition to vote; they threatened them with violence, with loss of employment, with injury, with all kinds of cruelty.

Unfortunately, as it so happens sometimes, nature came to the relief and to the aid of these rebels by storms and by the rising of the rivers, which prevented parties from getting to the polls. According to the testimony laid upon our tables hundreds of voters on the way to the voting polls were prevented from voting by the rise of the rivers and by other natural obstructions and causes. I say that no effort was made in any State so persistently to comply with the acts of Congress, as in the State of Alabama; and for us to enforce against them a rule harsh in the beginning, wrong in the inception, which was seized upon by the rebel element to defeat the will of the loyal people there, it seems to me would be highly improper. If you applied the same rule to the reconstruction in all the other States you would exclude four of these States. In four of the States you propose now to admit there was not a majority of the registered vote cast for the constitution. They voted after the law changing the requirement in that respect was passed; but will you enforce that provision of the law against these people who did all they could to get in? I think it would be unjust and wrong, and I approve of every word contained in the report of the House Reconstruction Committee on this point, which sums up with a good deal of ability the whole question. The same point was made in the House of Representatives, the same objections were made there, and the House finally agreed to admit Alabama to representation. We have waived this restrictive clause in regard to the other States. We have allowed Arkansas to come in, casting for the constitution less than half the registered vote. We propose by this bill to allow four other States that have not cast for the constitution one half the registered votes to come in. Why exclude Alabama, the earliest, the most faithful of those to attempt reconstruction upon the terms proposed by Congress? It seems to me it is harsh and unjust to do it.

But there is one other consideration that is more important yet, which would influence my vote for the admission of Alabama even if there were irregularities, and that is, that there is a vital necessity to close as rapidly as possible the work of reconstruction in order to have the question of the adoption of the fourteenth article of amendment settled forever. Now, it is a matter of dispute whether that amendment has been adopted, what number of States is required for its adoption; until that dispute is settled there will be grave controversy springing up on the presidential election. It is absolutely necessary—one of those vital questions that present themselves foremost—to settle this matter before the presidential election, so that there shall be no controversy as to the right of any State to vote at that election. It seems to me it is vital to secure the adoption of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and that we cannot plead technicalities in order to prevent the accomplishment of that end. Here the people of Alabama have, in compliance with your act, done all that you required of them that it was possible for them to do. They have done more than any other State has done, and made a braver effort to accomplish that result, and now you turn your back upon them and say that they alone of these States shall be excluded from representation here.

Let me warn Senators of another fact. If you do not admit the State of Alabama, you have anarchy and lawlessness and strife and violence all over that State. What government is there in Alabama if you deprive them of the State government formed by themselves? The military government is being superseded. It was merely put there as a scaffold upon which to erect this work of reconstruction, and it ceases as soon as the work is performed. General Meade tells you the reasons why the people could not succeed in complying with your acts, and they are reasons that it was not within their power to avoid. He urges upon you the necessity of giving these people the benefit of local law, of local regulations. The Legislature is ready to convene, ready to adopt your constitutional amendment. It is loyal. It represents the loyal element there. It was elected by a larger vote than has been cast for the Legislature of any other of these States. It seems to me it is unjust to exclude them. By this course you work into the hands of the rebels, for you thus enable them to carry out their cunningly devised scheme to defeat reconstruction in Alabama. You leave the local government of Alabama in disloyal hands; you leave Johnson's minions and tools, put in power there under his plan of reconstruction, to possess the local government of that State, and you refuse to organize a government based upon your own laws and your own plan. You decide in favor of the State government of Alabama as organized by Johnson against the State government of Alabama as organized under your law.

It seems to me this is too grave a question to be decided by mere technicalities. The only difficulty in the way is the absence of four or five thousand votes. If five thousand votes more had been cast for this constitution or against it at the election your law would have been literally complied with; but that five thousand is more than accounted for in the testimony by causes beyond their power, by actual threats and violence. In one case, according to the testimony, more than two hundred persons were excluded from a single poll by an officer under some pretense or technicality. According to the statement of C. W. Pierce, of Gainesville, two hundred and sixty-nine ballots were refused—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to inform the Senate that there is a special order for this day, being the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that that be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I must decidedly object. There are seventy-three pension bills on the Calendar, and some of them have been there since February; and to-day having been set apart for their consideration, it seems to me we had better go on with them regularly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will not seek to take up these pension bills to-day. They certainly are less important than this great measure.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. They may be less important in a public sense, but they are certainly important to the parties concerned.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are important to the parties, but they will doubtless have attention. I hope they will not be taken up to-day. I believe a motion was made to postpone their consideration; if not, I now make that motion.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to amend the motion so that they be postponed to Monday, and made the special order for one o'clock of that day.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope not. I hope Monday will not be assigned to the consideration of these bills. We shall undoubtedly come early to their consideration; but it seems hardly right to set Monday apart, and I hope it will not be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is first on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. The original motion was to postpone the special order of to-day, pension bills, until to-morrow. The amendment is to postpone that order until Monday, and make it the special order for that day.

The amendment was not agreed to—ayes seven, noes not counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from California, to postpone the special order of to-day until to-morrow.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. To-morrow is set aside for bills from the Committee on Commerce, and that was the reason I proposed Monday for pension bills. Because I am interfered with I do not think I am justified in interfering with another committee.

Mr. CONNESS. This motion amounts simply to a postponement for the present; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to postpone, if agreed to, amounts to a postponement for the present. It does not disturb the order already made setting apart to-morrow for bills reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take this opportunity to lay before the Senate some House bills for reference.

The following bills and joint resolution, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (H. R. No. 23) to protect the rights of actual settlers upon the public lands of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of navigation of the Mississippi river;

A bill (H. R. No. 934) amendatory of the act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, and of the acts amendatory thereof, approved March 21, 1864, and June 21, 1866;

A bill (H. R. No. 1156) authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a patent to F. N. Blake for one hundred and sixty acres of land in Kansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 1157) to cede to the State of Ohio the unsold lands in the Virginia military district in that State; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 286) relative to the lands of the Cherokee and Great and Little Osage Indians.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 202) to create the office of surveyor general in the Territory of Utah, and to establish a land office in said Territory, and extend the homestead and preemption laws over the same—to the Committees on Territories.

The bill (H. R. No. 1118) to confirm to J. M. Hutchings and J. C. Lamon their preemption claims in the Yosemite Valley, in the State of California—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 1121) to prevent an appropriation therein mentioned from lapsing because of delay in the adjustment—to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 284) to provide for the removal of a suit pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, West Virginia, to the circuit court of the United States, was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask that that bill be not referred at this moment until it can be examined. There is an importance in its early passage, if it is to pass at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table at present.

DEFICIENCIES IN APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1117) to supply partial deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1868.

The House amendment was to add to the Senate amendments the following item:

To supply a deficiency in the contingent fund of the Pension Office, $10,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

CITIES AND TOWNS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 188) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of the inhabitants of cities and towns upon the public lands," approved March 2, 1867, which was in line thirteen to insert the word "valid" before the words "mining claims."

Mr. STEWART. I hope that amendment will be concurred in. I do not think it changes the bill.

The amendment was concurred in.

NEVADA LAND GRANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 190) to further provide for giving effect to the various grants of public lands to the State of Nevada, the amendment being to strike out all of the second section of the bill after the word "that" in the first line, in the following words:

The land office at Belmont, Nye county, State of Nevada, is hereby removed to Aurora, in Esmeralda county, and the district shall be known as the Aurora district. The counties of Nye, Lincoln, and Lander shall constitute a land district, the office of which is located at Austin.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

The county of Esmeralda, in the State of Nevada, and the counties of Mono and Inyo, in the State of California, are hereby created a land district; and the land office for such district shall be located at Aurora, in Esmeralda county.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senate will concent in that amendment. It is made on the recommendation of the Commissioner.

The amendment was concurred in.

RETURN OF A BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to request the return of the bill (H. R. No. 448) to change the name of the ship Golconda, the same having been inadvertently sent to the Senate as having passed the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the return of the bill in accordance with the request of the House. It was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 658) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 320) for the relief of George Lynch, a soldier of the war of 1812.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1158) for the relief of Commander John L. Davis;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 172) relative to Captain Thomas H. Stevens, United States Navy; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 279) for the restoration of Captain James F. Armstrong, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 331) to extend the time for completing the military road authorized by an act entitled "An act granting lands to the States of Michigan and Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a military road from Fort Wilkins, Copper Harbor, Keweenaw county, in the State of Michigan, to Fort Howard, Green Bay, in the State of Wisconsin;" and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 1158) for the relief of Commander John L. Davis;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 172) relative to Captain Thomas H. Stevens, United States Navy; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 279) for the restoration of Captain James F. Armstrong, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the question being on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was proceeding to show the reasons why the slight deficiency in the number of votes required by the law was not cast. As I said before, the total vote was seventy one thousand eight hundred and seventeen; the actual vote required to adopt the Constitution was seventy-six thousand five hundred; that is one half or a majority of the registered votes, so that there was a deficiency of only four thousand six hundred and eighty-three, or only about six per cent. of the actual vote cast; so that if the actual vote cast had been increased six per cent. of that vote, the conditions of the law would have been fully complied with. But the papers laid upon our tables show the reasons why it was not cast. Here is a letter from Major C. W. Pierce, who I presume from his official character in connection with these papers is one of the officers of the Army, although I am not sure of it. I find he is addressed as "Major C. W. Pierce." He says:

"The election has been controlled almost entirely by rebel influence. Challengers have been allowed to be stationed in the room with the judges, who have dictated law to the willing ears of old fossils and semi-rebels on some of the boards."

And then he makes this statement:

"In Gainesville two hundred and sixty-nine ballots were refused because the exact letters composing the names were not found on the lists, though the freedmen were willing to testify that they had registered their names, and the old registers were willing to affirm it. I will enclose letters from Captain Yordy and Judge Morse, received to-day."

And this book which is laid on our table is full of cases of that kind. In some counties where they had to go thirty or forty miles to reach the polls, and where no man could go to vote without being marked by his neighbors, as a matter of course they could be easily deterred. If all had gone to the polls, or if all could go to the polls, so that going to the polls was not itself evidence of voting for the constitution, probably so many voters could not have been deterred; but as every person who went to the polls was known to be in favor of the constitution, every man who went to the polls was marked, put down on the black lists, threatened with persecution, and in this way the great mass of the white people of Alabama were deterred from voting. We do not know probably in the northern States the effect of social ostracism, but according to the letters published in this book, and according to statements made by persons whom I know in that State, lists were kept so that any man who was seen going towards the polls was ostracised. They refused to buy of merchants who went to the polls. Mechanics and all persons who were known to participate in this election were ostracised, and negro voters were deterred by threats, and in some cases by actual force and intimidation, and in other cases by technical objections to their names. If they were registered as Pompey, the name of Pomp, the name to which they had been accustomed, would not be enough. All kinds of technicalities were interposed to prevent persons who were registered from voting. In a State like Alabama, in a kind of chrysalis state, a great number of persons were moving from county to county, from precinct to precinct, from place to place, all of whom were excluded by law from voting. I have no doubt that more than ten thousand persons among the registered voters changed their residences prior to the time of the election, and yet the mass of those voters are counted against the constitution.

Now, I say we ought not to exclude this State on a barren technicality when we know that the exclusion will prevent the local government of the State from falling into loyal instead of rebel hands; but we ought to welcome these people with willing hands to their place in the Union, restoring to our friends—and in using that word "friends" I refer not merely to political friends, but to the loyal element of the State of Alabama—their power over their local government. If you do not do this, how can they reorganize their government? Shall all the work, all the expense, and all the trouble they have gone to be thrown away? Will you order a new election? If so, you only invite new scenes of violence, new scenes of contention. You have no doubt that the constitution sent to you represents the will of nine tenths of all the loyal people of Alabama; and what do you care for the opinion of the rebel element? You know that this constitution represents the wishes of more than a majority, yea, two thirds of the registered voters, including all you allowed to participate in the formation of this loyal government. Why, then, involve them in further expense? Why involve them in delay? Why create the necessity of new laws and a new organization of Alabama? Sir, I have it from men whom I believe as readily as I would any Senator on this floor, that they dare not go back to the State of Alabama and resume their ordinary avocations until they can be protected by local law. I prophesy that if you do not admit Alabama under the local government formed by the loyal people there, you will banish from that State forever tens of thousands of the best men in Alabama, who dare not go back and resume their ordinary occupations while the local government is in rebel hands.

My attention is called to the reasons given by General Meade why this constitution was not adopted. Among the reasons stated by General Meade is this:

"First. The determined and rigorous action of its opponents, who resorted to every means within the letter of the law to dissuade voters from going to the polls, who by social ostracism and through business relations influenced many white voters, and by discharging laborers and refusing employment, intimidated colored voters."

Another reason given by him is:

"The violent storm which raged for the first two days of the election, and the difficulty subsequently of notifying the whole State of the time having been extended."

Another reason is:

"Defect in the previous instructions to registrars, who, on revising registration, were not required to strike off the names of those who since last revision had died or permanently left the State. This undoubtedly would have diminished the majority to increase the rest, in my judgment, sufficient to have materially affected the result."

There you have the statement of General Meade, that if those who died or left the State had been stricken from the registration you would have reduced the aggregate of registration so that the actual vote cast would have been a majority of the registered vote. How can you, under these circumstances, exclude this State? Sir, it may seem to us rather a cold business whether or not Alabama shall come in now or next winter; but with thousands of men it involves their lives, their property, and everything that is dear to them. I hope that now, when we are consummating this work of reconstruction, we shall make the thing complete, that we shall admit every State that in good faith has gone forward and done all it could to comply with your acts of reconstruction.

It should be remembered, Mr. President, that those who apply for admission now are not the enemies of reconstruction, but they are the friends of reconstruction. We close the door upon those who are willing to come here, who are willing to comply with our law and all the conditions we may impose upon them. We are now acting against our friends and not against our enemies, either politically or as enemies to the country. Every rebel in the State of Alabama desires you to reject this constitution. Every man who served in the rebel army there desires you to reject it. Every patriot soldier who has gone to the State of Alabama, or who now lives there, desires you to admit Alabama. Every loyal man in Alabama, without exception, desires this question closed on the basis of this constitution. Therefore, in rejecting Alabama you are acting in the interest of those who are opposed to reconstruction, and who desire to retain their hold upon the local government of Alabama.

Now, sir, upon what tenure is all this opposition placed? Upon a technical objection, upon a rule which you yourselves have abandoned, upon a provision of law which was not designed for any such purpose, which was framed and voted for by us with a view to ascertaining the sense of the loyal people of the State of Alabama. The rebels have seized upon it as a trick. They have used it as a means to overthrow reconstruction. Under these circumstances I ask you whether you will stand by it against Alabama, and waive it as to all the other States, simply because the election in Alabama was before you admitted that the rule was wrong, shall you therefore exclude them and allow other States who have voted since that time to be admitted? I trust not. It is a trap, and it ought not to be allowed by the Congress that framed these reconstruction laws to affect the conclusion of our work. I trust that without any unnecessary delay we may place Alabama upon the same list with the other States, may give her the benefit of admission, and give her the benefit of Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. STEWART. I have given some attention to the case of Alabama, and I wish to state to the Senate the result of the investigation that I have made of that particular question. After Alabama first voted, the other States surrounding her not having voted, I had considerable apprehensions about the ability of the people who had formed that government to sustain a State government, and I introduced a bill for a provisional government, a copy of which was introduced in the House of Representatives, and passed by the House, and is now before our Committee on the Judiciary. But since the other States have voted, and since they have been carried in favor of reconstruction by a majority of the votes cast, without generally getting a majority of the registered votes, I am thoroughly convinced that upon the same test that has been put to the other States, Alabama would have come in by a handsome majority. That is perfectly obvious. She has as strong a Union party, as strong a party for the new constitution as any of these States except perhaps one; so that so far as having a loyal State is concerned, capable of sustaining the government they have set up, I think Alabama is in as good condition as most of the other States.

Then the only remaining question is a question of good faith. It is said that we made a pledge to do one thing and we propose to do another. I do not think that argument will be regarded as of much force when we take into consideration the counties of Alabama in which there were no votes polled, and when we further take into consideration the fact that the parties opposed to the constitution did not conduct themselves in very good faith, and when we take into consideration the further fact that Alabama cast as large a vote for the adoption of the constitution as has been cast in any of these States, except South Carolina, in proportion to the registered vote.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator will remember that in Arkansas the vote was five sevenths of the whole registered vote. I produced the figures the other day.

Mr. STEWART. But a large number of votes there were cast against the constitution. I say in proportion to those registered the vote cast for the constitution in Alabama was as large as that in any State except South Carolina.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am speaking of the total number of voters.

Mr. STEWART. I repeat, in proportion to those registered, there were as many votes cast for the constitution in Alabama as in any other State, I think, except South Carolina. It is therefore fair to presume that if the other side had voted against it we should still have carried it; and there is no doubt of that fact. Then again, the vote of Alabama was cast under more unfavorable circumstances because of the great rains, and there was more violence displayed there than in any other State. I am therefore thoroughly satisfied that if we had had the same rule in Alabama at the time they voted as in the other States we should have carried it. No injustice, then, will be done by the admission of Alabama with this constitution. Upon any hypothesis of reasoning, taking the whole situation into consideration, no man can doubt that if all had voted, as they did in Georgia, North Carolina, and Arkansas, the result would have been the same, and the constitution would have been adopted by a large majority.

Now, it is very important that this State should be restored with the rest. It is important, I take it, that we should have this State and Florida here. They will make just enough to ratify the constitutional amendment. The people who are opposed to the admission of Alabama are more opposed to making a provisional government there, according to the bill which has passed the House of Representatives. They prefer to have the State come in. The Democrats of Alabama, if we shall apply to them that name, say they prefer the State to be admitted to having a bill passed placing it under a provisional government. It is very certain, I will say to our Democratic friends, that if we do not pass this bill, we shall be constrained to pass the bill that has been passed by the House giving them a provisional government. The Democrats of Alabama and the Union men of Alabama prefer Alabama to be in this bill rather than agree to the bill that has passed the House giving them a provisional government.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My honorable friend from Nevada will allow me to ask him what particular reason there is why the Democrats of Alabama should inform him of their desires and wishes in reference to this matter while they keep them from the Democratic members of this body? Will my honorable friend tell me what service he has of late years rendered to the cause of the country that the anxious, inquiring Democracy of Alabama should seek him out, and make him the depository of their wishes, or communicate to him their hopes and desires?

Mr. STEWART. I will inform the gentleman that it is because I read the newspapers; and my friend from Delaware, following the old Democratic plan, never reads a paper, and so he is not informed. [Laughter.] Besides that, Mr. Parsons, who speaks pretty authoritatively for the Democratic party of that State, has called on me two or three times, and several other gentlemen have called and said they preferred that the State should be admitted—they did not want either—to the bill putting them under a provisional government. The Democratic papers down there say so, if I may call them Democratic, and I suppose they are. It appears that both parties in Alabama would prefer this kind of legislation. That we are going to legislate to place the government of that State in loyal hands at this session, I do not suppose anybody doubts. I do not suppose the Democratic party expect that they will retain the State organization in the hands in which it now is after the conduct of those in office and in power at the late election. I do not think anybody supposes that that can be done.

I am in favor of the admission of this State. I want the Union restored as fast as possible. Let us get this State and Florida in, and we shall then have enough to stop all quibbling, to satisfy all honest men and everybody else with regard to the ratification of the constitutional amendment. I suppose our Democratic friends want that question settled one way or the other. We want it settled in the right way.

I have no serious apprehensions that the Republican organization in Alabama—the Union organization; I will not call them Republican—will not be able to maintain themselves if we admit them. The chances are all in their favor. But if we leave the State organizations in rebel hands, there will be but very few Union men there twelve months from now. I do not believe that that is contemplated by anybody. The loyal people of that country, those who are in favor of Union and restoration, are entitled to control, are entitled to be protected, are entitled to the sympathy of this Government, and it is the duty of Congress, having passed the reconstruction law, and it having been substantially complied with, to see to it that the rebel organization no longer controls that State. I do not think it is worth while now to stop and split hairs, but the best way is to let all these States in, and let them in speedily.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the law under which the vote was taken for the adoption of the constitution of Alabama provided that a majority of the votes registered should be necessary to its adoption. In other words, Congress said to the people of Alabama,

"If you do not vote you shall be counted against the constitution; you vote against it by staying at home." To that provision, when adopted, I was much opposed, considering it as contrary to all the just principle that should control an election. And I can readily see how some Senators may consider that it would not be good faith, without another election, to adopt as ratified the constitution that has failed to command the approval of a majority of the registered vote—

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In one minute I shall be through.

Mr. STEWART. I do not want to interrupt you when you are through. I want to say a word on the point you are discussing.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I can, on the other hand, perceive how persons may come to the conclusion that notwithstanding the law has not been complied with they may yet vote to admit Alabama. If there has been fraud practiced which we are satisfied has excluded a number of votes in favor of the constitution equal to the number wanted to give a majority of the registered vote, which is about seven thousand, I think, instead of five thousand, we can so adjudicate and admit the State. If there has been a reign of terror against those who would have voted for the ratification which has prevented fair expression of opinion, then we may still in good faith admit the State. I can also see that every man who undertakes to exercise statesmanship must always recognize the principle that the safety of the people is the highest law; and this principle overrides all technicalities. These things may be as suggested, and on an independent bill for the admission of Alabama I might vote in its favor. It is, however, eminently impolitic and unwise to attempt to include Alabama in this bill, because there are some who are not inclined, and who, perhaps, cannot vote for the admission of that State under existing circumstances. And we must not forget that this legislation must probably pass the ordeal of the President's veto; then we shall want all our strength, and I should be sorry to imperil the admission of the five States included in this bill by inserting Alabama therein. It would be much better to have a separate bill reported for that State, and that it should stand on its own strength and not be a burden on the introduction of the other States. If we find that such a bill cannot be passed we will then have recourse to the bill which has been reported by the Senator from Nevada, making the offices elected under this constitution provisional, and thus take the charge of the government of the State out of the hands of those who are not loyal.

As to the argument that it is necessary to admit Alabama in order that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution may be secured, I can only say that does not influence me, because, as I have said before, I am satisfied that the fourteenth amendment is now adopted; and, if not, Alabama could not ratify and make it a part of the Constitution. Twenty-three States have voted for it, including Ohio and New Jersey. It is claimed, without any propriety, that Ohio and New Jersey have of right withdrawn their ratification. That would leave twenty-one States; with Alabama there would be six new States, making only twenty-seven in favor of the amendment, and twenty-eight are necessary. If we intend to respect the position that a State can play fast and loose with the Constitution, and ratify an amendment one day and reject it the next, I do not know when it will be adopted. Oregon may in a few months send us her repeal of ratification. And so may other States. I am not influenced in my opinion on this subject by the situation of the fourteenth amendment. Our true policy is to pass this bill as reported; then a bill for the admission of Alabama may be introduced; and if we cannot pass that we can make the bill of the Senator from Nevada, before referred to, a law.

Mr. STEWART. This is what I wished to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to: in our original reconstruction bill we provided that no State should be admitted until the constitutional amendment was ratified. Now, we provide in this bill for the coming in of several of these States. In view of our having that provision in the reconstruction law, Ohio and New Jersey attempted to withdraw their assent to the amendment. I suppose they will say it would be bad faith to let them in after they had withdrawn their assent. We also provided that in the State of Alabama there should be a majority of the registered votes cast. The object of that was to secure such an expression of opinion as would guaranty to us that they could maintain a republican government. Now, it appears that the Democrats, or the rebels, or the Conservatives of Alabama undertook, not to withdraw their assent to the constitutional amendment, but they undertook, by force of their local organization, to withdraw votes from the ballot-box, to prevent men from going to the polls by the use of the revolver and the bowie-knife. They interfered with the election to the utmost of their ability. Then there were very severe storms in several counties, which prevented any election in them. And yet when we come to sum up we find that in the State there is a larger vote, in proportion to the whole number registered, for the constitution than in almost any other State; I do not know but that it is the largest of any State, in proportion to the number of votes registered.

Thus it has shown a capacity to sustain a republican government equal to the other States; and our good faith, I think, is not violated toward those men who sought by violence to prevent the adoption of the constitution—those men who formerly attempted to destroy the government and are still unwilling that it should be restored. If we ever do restore these governments we have got to do it in spite of those men. If there is any restoration at all, it has got to be done in spite of those men, for they have arrayed themselves against any restoration of this government unless it can be done in their way. They have told you to your face that they would not come into the Union unless they dictated the terms. You submitted to them a constitutional amendment, which was so generous that it astonished mankind, but they hurled it back at you. They have consented to nothing but to have their own way and dictate terms to the United States. That is the only compromise that they have proposed. They have proposed nothing else, will propose nothing else.

Sir, I am tired of submitting to them our policy or advising with them how we shall restore the Union when their object is to keep the Union dissolved, keep it broken up, and ours to restore it; and if we do it at all we must do it by cooperating with our friends. The loyal people of the United States have taken upon themselves the mission of preserving this Union by destroying the rebellion by the strong arm of this Government. They crushed the rebellion. They then took upon themselves the task of restoring this Union upon the basis of loyalty. But the men who drove the loyal voters from the polls in Alabama do not propose to have this Union restored on any terms but their own.

The Republican and Union men in Alabama having shown that they have a sufficient number to maintain a Union government there, I say restore them at once. It is not worth while to split hairs about it. They are in as good condition as the others. Why have half a dozen bills? Each bill must be discussed. Let us have Florida, Alabama, and all the rest in this bill; let it be vetoed; and let us have but one discussion upon the veto message. If we pass separate bills for each State, it will take all summer. They want restoration at once. They want to get established governments as soon as possible. This suspense is ruining them. This suspense, this uncertainty, this condition of chaos and want of law is breeding anarchy, discord, and is breaking and destroying the Union sentiment every day. They have fought gallantly for restoration, and all it is necessary for us now to do is to extend to them the hand of fellowship and friendship, and we shall strengthen their hearts and make them strong. Let them know that they have friends in this Capitol who will espouse their cause while they contend for the Union, and it will make them strong; but if we stay here and quibble upon technicalities while the rebels are in full charge, while local rebel governments, hostile to the Union, are displaying their venom and their hostility in the most cruel and oppressive manner, if we stand still and let our friends be destroyed until we have no Union party at all there, upon us will be the sin of having failed to do our whole duty. Sir, I am for restoration now upon a loyal basis that seems certain to stand. It is the only one we can ever have. I believe it is one which has as much vitality and is as purely republican, every man having the chance to protect himself by the ballot as any other. I am, therefore, in favor of putting in the bill all these States, and passing the bill at once.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I do not think, under the circumstances, it would be prudent to insert Alabama in this present bill, for various reasons, all of which I shall not now undertake to set forth. The intimations which are made in this Chamber that by rejecting Alabama, or delaying her readmission into the Union under her present constitution, we are committing an act of bad faith is entirely unfounded. I repel all such suggestions. We have proceeded in perfect good faith, both toward Alabama and the other rebel States. We have said to Alabama in plain, clear terms, in our act of last March a year ago:

"That if, according to said returns [that is, the returns of the election on the question of ratifying the new constitution] the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification, the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling; and if it shall, moreover, appear to Congress that the election was one at which all the registered and qualified electors in the State had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud, and if the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State, and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation."

Now, when gentlemen look at that statute which Congress passed declaring that this right of readmission might be suspended still further unless Congress should be satisfied that the new constitution had been approved by a majority of all the registered voters, and then look at the returns made to us from Alabama, they will discover that a majority of the qualified and registered voters have not approved of that constitution; not one half of the registered voters have voted on the question of the ratification of that constitution. General Meade, in his report, assures us that the deficiency amounts to eight thousand one hundred and fourteen votes.

The theory of our reconstruction acts has been that whenever it should appear that a majority of all the qualified voters of a rebel State were in favor of readmission into the Union and had complied with the terms mentioned in the reconstruction acts, the State should be readmitted. And until the passage of the act of last spring allowing a majority of voters actually depositing their votes upon the question of ratification to control the question, Congress steadily pursued the old theory of not reestablishing State governments there unless a majority of the electors desired it. That has been my ground from the beginning. I recollect very well that at an early day, when it was proposed in the Senate to readmit the States of Louisiana and Arkansas into the Union upon the basis that one tenth of their old voting population had voted for a new constitution, I opposed it, and opposed it upon the general principle that a government founded upon the will of a mere minority, and not upon the will of a majority, is a very insecure and unsatisfactory style of government. I think so still; but I say this without committing myself at all on the question of voting for or against the admission of Alabama under her present constitution. I desire a little more time to look into the question and to inform myself of the real state of things there.

Now, sir, this principle of establishing a State government upon the votes of a minority you may be quite sure will be one which will be objected to and resisted by some person or persons out of this Chamber. Suppose we pass this bill with Alabama in, and it goes to the President and he returns it with his objections, basing his veto upon the single ground that this government of Alabama is not upheld by the votes of a majority of the people entitled to vote. That would be a very plausible and strong objection; and I predict there may possibly be found in this Chamber members enough who would refuse to pass the bill over the veto to secure its failure; at least I fear it, and I think we ought not to run any such hazard. Let us take up the case of Alabama in a separate bill; let it rest upon its own merits, and let us have a full and free discussion of all the facts connected with the recent election. If, after such examination, it shall appear that everything is perfectly fair, and that this constitution is acceptable to a majority of the electors of that State, I shall probably vote for it; but, under present circumstances, I would prefer to take a little more time to consider the question.

Sir, we do not need Alabama for the purpose of ratifying the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Twenty-three of the loyal States have already formally, legally, and constitutionally ratified that amendment, which, in my view, is the greatest security that we have. I look upon it as important beyond expression. We need five States more in order to secure the three fourths for the ratification of that amendment. This bill readmits into Congress North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Florida, which make up the number of twenty-eight States, or three fourths of the whole number of States; and if these States, under this bill now before us, shall ratify that amendment it becomes to all intents and purposes, and beyond all doubt, cavil, or discussion, a part of the Constitution of the United States. The doubt which has so painfully rested upon the minds of men, both here and throughout the country, will then have been removed, and we shall be able to say positively, and beyond all uncertainty, that the fourteenth article is a part of the Constitution.

While I am on the subject of the ratification of the fourteenth article, Mr. President, I beg to be indulged in saying a word further. It is my private opinion, my private judgment, after a tolerably careful and thorough examination of the legal questions arising, that this amendment is already part and parcel of the Constitution, it having been ratified by more than three fourths of the States recognized as being in the Union and participating in our legislation. I hold that when the rebel States passed their ordinances of secession, withdrew from all participation in the legislation of Congress, formed a new government alien and foreign to the Government of the United States and hostile to it, and made actual war upon the Government of the United States, they forfeited and lost all their political rights under the Constitution of the United States. They could not after that, and during the pendency of the war, appeal to the Constitution for any purpose whatever. They had no right to claim anything under it. They had no right to set it up for any purpose whatever where their own political interests were concerned. In short, they had lost all their political rights under it by becoming hostile to it and occupying an attitude of belligerency to the United States. It is impossible between belligerents that one belligerent can claim political rights as against the other while waging war against that other. The idea is incompatible with a state of war.

All the political rights of the one belligerent party, when it is conquered and subdued by the other, pass into the hands and possession of the conqueror, and after that the conquered party possesses only such rights as the prevailing party may see fit of its own grace and favor to allow. If this be true doctrine, if the political rights of the rebel States were actually forfeited and terminated, or, in other words, if those rights had passed over to the conqueror, the United States, and into the hands of this Government, then surely they have had no right to participate in the ratification of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, and cannot have it until it shall have been allowed by Congress; and when three fourths of the remaining loyal States formally ratified that amendment, it became to all intents and purposes part of the Constitution of the United States, and is now binding upon us, and upon the rebel States.

This, however, Mr. President, is rather an abstract question. It is one which publicists and lawyers may very properly busy themselves in discussing; but such are my opinions. At the same time I am bound to say I should feel extremely reluctant to leave this question to be decided by a court of a rebel State. I should feel very insecure; I should fear a southern court, made up of southern judges, or imbued with southern secession opinions, might declare that such a ratification by the loyal States was not sufficient, and that, therefore, it had never become a part of the Constitution. For the purpose, then, of removing all doubt, all uncertainty from the public mind, as well as the mind of the courts, I think our best policy is to do all in our power to secure the full three fourths of the States of the United States upon this question of ratification. We may do it by passing this bill with Florida in, and leaving Alabama for future consideration; I hope we shall do so, because I fear that if we retain Alabama in the bill, we shall in the end regret it; we shall have trouble, and we may possibly fail to pass the bill at all at the present session of Congress.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I think it would have been very well when Congress adopted the idea of reorganizing the southern States if they had framed a form of a State constitution, enacted it into a law, and sent it down into each one of these States as a standard of government provisionally, and then waited until they were certain in the case of each of these States that they would vote right politically in the elections of 1868 before receiving Representatives from them into the Senate and House. That would have been a simple and intelligible plan of action. That plan would have avoided the enormous expenditure which has been incurred in reconstruction, and it would, in my judgment, have produced more of quiet and contentment in the southern States themselves; and in the end we should probably have reached about the same result which we will now reach by circuitous, by indirect, by doubtful, and, I may add, odious means.

Now, sir, I listened to the Senator from Ohio this morning, and received from him instruction upon this business of reconstruction which I consider valuable. It was additional to information which I possessed before. I understand from his argument that where an election return comes to us showing upon its face the adoption of a constitution, we are to take that; we are to hold that as good in case it accomplishes the object desired. Thus, in the case of Arkansas, where we can have no moral doubt that the constitution was in fact rejected by many thousand votes, in my opinion by at least ten thousand, but where, upon the face of a return, there was an apparent majority of thirteen hundred, we were to accept that. We did accept it; we refused to go behind it; we refused to strike off even the two thousand surplus votes which were taken under no law, under no pretense of law, I venture to say, because the act of March 11 was not at all complied with in any essential respect. We disregarded all objection to those votes. We accepted the face of the return, and the bill was passed by the Senate to admit the State to representation in Congress.

Now, Alabama comes up with a return the other way. The military authorities under whom this election was held have certified to us returns which show that the new constitution was rejected under the law, and rejected for want of the polling of some eight thousand votes. On this occasion the Senator from Ohio wants to go beyond the return, and he proposes upon vague, general, ex parte affidavits and statements recited here in the Senate to lay the foundation for a grave legislative act of admission. What is the reason for this? Because he wants the State in; because he desires that it shall be admitted to representation in the two Houses of Congress upon grounds entirely independent of the question of whether it was or was not accepted by the people of that State.

Mr. President, what are the facts in regard to Alabama? An election was ordered. When the time came it was said that storms were preventing many of those who desired to vote on the constitution from voting. It was known that those opposed to it would not vote at all, because that action or non-action was invited from them by the act of Congress. By military order the election was extended another day; and then, upon another appeal made, the election was still further extended, and it was held upon five successive days. The State was, from one end to the other, so far as the military authorities and those who acted in concert with them were concerned, scoured for votes, and all were obtained that possibly could be, not upon a single day, nor upon two days, but upon five days. And yet, after all, a minority only of registered persons voted in that State. I have seen published statements as strong as those to which the Senator from Ohio has referred bearing in exactly the opposite direction to that to which his statements incline—statements that there were large frauds committed in the State; that a very considerable number of the votes in favor of this constitution, included in the returns sent to us, were not, in fact, given by honest voters of the State. General Meade, as I understand, has said, in an official communication, that in his judgment it was not expedient to admit this State under the circumstances; and that was the conclusion in the House of Representatives when this subject was up some time since and was considered there. The House then refused to admit the State; and, in fact, they passed a bill providing for a provisional State government and sent it over to us, and it remains here in the Senate, subject to our future consideration.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio uses sharp language in speaking of those opposed to the constitution. He speaks of their bad conduct, their improper conduct regarding the election upon the constitution. Sir, there is no ground for his complaint. Congress passed a bill providing clearly that those in favor of the constitution should vote at the election, and that those opposed to the constitution need not vote. They might exercise their right to withhold their votes or to poll them according to their own free judgment. Those in favor of the constitution did go to the election and did vote; those opposed remained at home and they induced all they could to remain at home. It is very likely that in certain cases improper influence was exerted or exercised to prevent persons from going to the election and voting in favor of the constitution; and upon the other hand, illegitimate and improper influences no doubt were exerted to secure votes for the constitution. But we know that the elections were held by officials who were favorable to the adoption of the constitution.

So far as votes were taken, all the presumptions are against there having been any fraudulent votes polled at that election in hostility to the constitution. Whatever of illegitimate and improper voting was permitted at that election was unquestionably upon the side which favored the constitution, and not upon the side which opposed it.

Now, sir, whether this pending amendment be adopted or not, is from my point of view not a very material or very interesting question. I thought at one time I would vote in favor of it, because I can draw no distinction between this case and the case of Arkansas which was considered the other day, or upon principle between this case and the case of South Carolina. I consider that all these State constitutions and State organizations which are proposed to be set up, rest upon the legislation of Congress, and that all this business of registration and voting in the South is mere form without substance; and therefore, sir, as I said before, I believe that the simple, frank, and manly manner to have proceeded in this business of reconstruction, was for Congress to have enacted the form of a State constitution, at any rate for temporary purposes; to have imposed it; to have required that elections should be held under its conditions, and to have held these States with firm hand under such organization until the political majority in Congress were satisfied to admit Senators and Representatives from them into Congress.

I consider that the whole proceeding by which it has been attempted to give a popular sanction in the South to the governments set up there is a deception and a sham, and I believe that most of our difficulties and debates in the two Houses of Congress arise from the fact that reconstruction has been attempted upon the principle that Congress shall control it, while at the same time it has been sought to give it an odor of popularity by some assent, or assumed assent of the people in those States. Sir, if you had an honest election in any one State of the South, take South Carolina for instance; if you had your military power withdrawn from such State, your Freedmen's Bureau organization withdrawn from such State, and then if you even permitted all the male inhabitants therein over twenty-one years of age to vote, free from foreign interference, free from dictation, free from the pressure of congressional power, I do not believe you would get from such State a political organization such as you desire.

On reflection I believe I shall vote against this amendment because I suppose my vote in its favor would not be understood, and because it is perfectly clear that a majority of the people of Alabama, even of those who are included in the registration lists, have refused to vote for this new constitution and State government proposed to them by their constitutional convention.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the motion to include Alabama in this bill proceeds from an undoubted friend of reconstruction; and yet I am persuaded that the motion is not in the true interest of reconstruction as to the remaining States named here, nor even as to Alabama herself. I venture to make this suggestion to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, because in the main I agree with him; and, in committee, there is no impropriety, I think, in my saying that I voted to retain and include Alabama among the States to be admitted by this bill. The friends of reconstruction, however, in the Judiciary Committee, and the friends of reconstruction in the Senate, are divided as to Alabama, divided upon the question of the right of Alabama to restoration upon the constitution formed and the vote cast, and divided also upon the minor question of the best way to treat Alabama, the best form in which to put her, assuming that Alabama is to be dealt with now.

Mr. President, it is idle to deny that this State does present a special case. At the time when the vote was cast and the constitution was formed, the law provided that something more than one half of all the registered votes should be cast one way or the other; not as I understood some Senators to say should be cast in favor of the constitution, but that half of the registered voters should take part pro or con in approving or condemning the proposed constitution.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts says we made a mistake in enacting that law. I do not think we did, sir. It is not very important to discuss that; but I never thought we made any mistake about it, and I am not at all sure that in the future we shall not conclude that we made a mistake quite as much when we repudiate it as we did when we adopted it. Suffice it to say now that it was passed for reasons existing at the time and cogent at the time; and were I called upon with the same lights and under the same circumstances to vote again on the question, I should vote in favor of that provision of the law, as I did vote for it at the time. Wise or otherwise, the provision stood unrepealed upon the statute-book when the election in Alabama was held, and in effect that provision held out to every person in Alabama, well disposed or evil disposed, the idea that abstinence from the polls should be precisely tantamount to a vote. They acted upon it, whether in good faith or bad faith, they acted upon it; and although of the votes cast an overwhelming majority were in favor of the constitution, less than half the elective population of Alabama, as ascertained by the register, took part in that election.

Mr. President, there is but one way to answer this, and that is the way resorted to by the honorable Senator from Ohio when he alluded to the frauds that had occurred. In that way you not only break the force of this objection to Alabama, but if the facts bear you out you do make a full answer. If, availing themselves of this law, the enemies of reconstruction not only abstained, as they had a right to abstain, from participating in the election, no matter what their motive was, (and so far they might have appropriately gone,) but went further, and by menace, by violence, by fraud, by contrivance, hindered, deterred, prevented others who wished to participate from doing so, then they stand in their own wrong, and then, without undertaking to give the precise language of the law which would be applicable to the case, suffice it to say for practical purposes they ought not be allowed to claim, they cannot properly claim the benefit of a provision under cover of which they had trampled right and law under their feet.

The Senator from Ohio says the facts do bear out sufficiently this allegation. I will suppose they do, for the purpose of the present argument; that is my impression as it is his. That is the impression with which I voted in the Judiciary Committee to include Alabama. But it still leaves Alabama a special case; a case unlike all the others; a case to be considered by itself upon its own peculiar merits; and, therefore, it is an element of division, of distraction, and, I submit to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, of delay when interposed upon this bill. After the votes we have had in the Arkansas case, all the friends in this Chamber of reconstruction can unite, and doubtless will unite, and that speedily, upon the bill as it stands as to all these other States. With regard to Alabama, there are one or two bills before us which can be taken up at once; which can be considered disconnected with and unembarrassed by the case of any other State. Therefore, I can see no delay whatever to arise even as to Alabama, and I can see time to be gained as to all the rest by omitting her from this bill.

Mr. President, one other suggestion and I have done. The bills in regard to Alabama are much more flexible than this bill can be made in that regard. To state it in other words, they are much better adapted to procure an expression of the Senate upon the question precisely how Alabama had better be treated, because they present different alternatives which, with slight modifications, should enable any Senator to present and vote for the particular view which he might have; and I am not at all sure that a bill adopting as a provisional government the proposed organization would not answer, perhaps, in the estimation of the Senator from Massachusetts, and every other Senator, the whole purpose as to Alabama, and, at the same time, avoid litigating here in the Senate and adjudicating the difficult question (as it will turn out to be) of fact, whether in truth the enemies of reconstruction actually prevented, actually intimidated so many men who had a right to participate in the election, from so participating, as thereby to vitiate the election and change its result. Without dwelling upon that, everybody must see that it is a very awkward question to establish upon either side by evidence. It may very well be that the whole difficulty can be avoided, and yet the interests of Alabama preserved in all respects by taking some one of these other alternatives, not only considering Alabama as a case by herself, but adopting as a provisional government the organization which has there been formed, or in some other way so placing her as to save all her rights and leave every gentleman who votes for or against the bill to enjoy his own opinion as to what in truth did happen there in this season of floods and disasters and alleged violence. At all events, for the present purpose, I submit to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that we can make more progress with this bill if he will allow Alabama to remain for the present and to be taken up as a consideration by itself.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not intend, sir, to say very much upon this particular point. It seems to me it depends upon just one question. If Congress now assumes the right to say that a State government of a particular sort and a State constitution of a particular character is established, without any reference to the voice of the people, then the proposition can be well maintained. But if you do claim that these constitutions do not receive their force and validity from the will of Congress, but that they receive their force and validity from the will of the people as expressed, then it is palpable that Alabama is not properly to come in under your reconstruction policy, because when the vote in Alabama was cast it was under law. Did your law have any force? Was it entitled to respect by the people of Alabama? Is it entitled to respect by you? If so, the constitution of Alabama, according to law, was not adopted; but if your law had no force, if the people of Alabama were justified in disregarding it, and if now, after the vote has been cast, you have a right to disregard it and say that it is no law, then the simple question is, what is it the pleasure of Congress to do?

What was the law? Whether wisely framed or otherwise, is not for me now to inquire. The law was that the constitution of Alabama, the vote being had, when it was taken would not be adopted unless a majority of all the people of the State did vote. If less than a majority voted at the election, the constitution stood rejected. That was your law on the subject, positive, plain, and direct, standing, I suppose, upon the proposition that the fundamental law, which is to be permanent, of a State ought not to be adopted when less than half of the people of that State express an opinion upon it. That is what you said. It was the law that governed the vote at the time the vote was cast. If less than a majority shall vote, it is rejected; if more than a majority shall vote, and of those voting the majority shall be in favor of it, then it is adopted. It is plain—General Meade said so—that the constitution was rejected: It is plain that it was rejected according to law. Now, upon what principle do you propose to establish it? As the law stood it is not established. As the law stood it is rejected. Upon what principle, then, do you propose to establish it? Not that the people have approved it, because less than a majority of the people have voted upon it. Not that it stands approved under the law, because according to law it stands rejected. Upon what principle, then, do you propose to establish it? for if this instrument become established as the constitution of Alabama, it is by some will and power other than the wish of the people expressed under law. The wish of the people, as expressed under law, has rejected it.

Now, it is to be approved and indorsed and made a constitution of a State, and the supreme law of that State so far as State law is concerned, by what power? By the voice of Congress; and if you have the power now to do that, why this delay? Why did you not adopt a constitution for each one of these States and have uniformity of State constitutions? If Congress can adopt a constitution that stands rejected according to law, and make it a constitution; if Congress can do what the committee now propose to do, change these constitutions, strike provisions out and put other provisions in, why not adopt a constitution according to the sovereign will of Congress and establish it? I think we can make a better constitution here than they have made in most of these cases. I would rather take the chance of a State government formed by Congress even as it is now organized, than to take the risk of a State government to be organized under such chances as have been allowed in these southern States. But, sir, I am speaking of one simple question now: if you can breathe the breath of life into a constitution, why not have made the constitutions in the first place and have established them? Why go through the form and ceremony of submitting these constitutions to a portion of the people? Why say that all the colored people shall vote upon them and a part of the white people, if indeed the decision of the people under your law is not binding, and after they have rejected a constitution you can adopt it and make it a constitution?

But the Senator from Ohio says that the rivers were high, that there was fraud. Mr. President, there are some accusations of fraud that stand plainly, boldly, defiantly rebutted; and it is idle, in the presence of an intelligent people, to say that fraud has controlled these southern elections when you all know, every Senator knows, that the control of public opinion in the southern States has been under the Freedmen's Bureau and the military organization. You know where the power has been that has controlled those elections. Who appointed your registrars? They were not southern men, not conservative, but Radicals appointed for that purpose, controlling the ballot-box, controlling the right to vote, deciding whose vote should be admitted and whose rejected. All this power belonged not to the men that were opposed to these constitutions, but the elections have been had under the control (irresponsible to every power in the world) of men that were in favor of the adoption of the constitution. So, Mr. President, it is idle for any Senator to say that there were frauds in these elections and terror and power that prevented a fair vote.

I heard this thing of the storms. I heard that it was expressed with more power and eloquence by a Representative in the other branch. In the force and power of his imagination he said this election was held under the most embarrassing circumstances; that the colored people, the freedmen, the true loyal element of society, went to the ballot-box swimming deep, swollen rivers, floating terrible quantities of ice! Ice in Alabama! That is equal to the charge of fraud, equal to all this stuff that an election is to be declared against the vote, because the rivers are high! Who ever heard of such a thing?

If an election has been held under such circumstances that the people could not vote, then what is to be done? If you have power to do anything, it is not to declare the result this way or that way, but to order a new election and allow the people an opportunity to vote when the rivers have gone down. That is all there is in that. Swollen rivers do not establish a constitution, even if in the torrid zone those swollen rivers should be floating mountains of ice! No, sir; you cannot establish a constitution thus. If the forces of nature have been against the giving of a full vote you must allow another election. It does not elect anybody; it does not adopt a constitution. All you can do, I repeat, is to order a new election in that event.

So upon this charge of fraud. Some persons did not vote, it is said, because there was some interference. If there were a case of that sort established by evidence, all you could do would be, not to say that if these people had been there they would have voted thus or thus, because you cannot say that, but to order a new election and give them an opportunity to vote. That is all the case calls for.

Mr. President, I do not intend to continue the discussion upon this question. It is a plain one. A majority of Congress thought fit to establish the law of last winter, and in that law you said that if a majority of the people did not vote at the election the constitution should stand rejected. A majority of the people of Alabama did not vote, and according to your law it stands rejected, and now you propose to say that a constitution thus standing rejected, according to your own law, shall be established by congressional will and pleasure and power. Is that right? Do you intend to stand upon that proposition?

It is very different from the case of Arkansas; and in that I do not quite agree with my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW.] Of course, we all know the transaction in Arkansas, how thousands of votes were cast, or pretended to be cast, that were not there; how it is palpable, upon the papers themselves, that the election was not a fair one; and yet the returns are in favor of that election, prima facie the case is made. Here, however, the return, the prima facie case is against Alabama, according to your law, and in order to carry Alabama through you have got to say that you yourselves will disregard the law which you said the people of Alabama must regard. What was the effect of this? Your law said to the people of Alabama "a majority must vote, else the constitution is not adopted; the man who remains away from the polls casts a vote against the constitution as well as if he attends and casts a vote against it."

That was the effect of your law. That was the effect of his vote under your law. It was a vote against the constitution. If he stayed away it stood as a vote against the constitution, because your law so provided. Now, the law still standing at the time of the election you reverse it, and say that a vote which stood as against the constitution shall be counted for it. You reverse your law; you reverse what you said should be a law to the people of Alabama. You mislead them; you induce a man to stay away from the election and not to cast his vote against the constitution; and after having thus induced him by what purported to be a law, you say that his vote shall stand for that constitution because the rivers were high! Who expects to stand upon a proposition like that before intelligent people? I do not care that you change the law this session; let the people know in advance that staying away has no legal effect, and then they can do as they please; but passing a law peculiar in this feature that not to vote is to vote against the constitution, and then afterward to say that that vote shall be counted for the constitution, is of itself, in my judgment, in the nature almost of a fraud upon the people thus treated. How is it; did the law of last winter have any validity and force? Does it bind the people of Alabama and not you? Can Congress disregard its own law after an act has been done under that law? This is the law that there is in this question, in my humble judgment.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, as the vote stood in Alabama there was a majority of sixty-nine thousand in favor of adopting the constitution over the vote that was cast against it.

There are some notorious facts in connection with Alabama to which in our capacity here we have a right to refer and to place some stress upon. One of these facts is that there is a large body of white Union men in the State of Alabama equal to that of any southern State, unless it is the State of North Carolina; and when you look to the vote in North Carolina and Georgia and South Carolina, held under the law in its present form, and look to the majorities that were given for the constitutions in those States, we cannot doubt as intelligent men that if the election had been held in Alabama under that law there would have been a large majority in that State for the constitution over the vote given against it, although the course of policy might then have been different on the part of the enemies of the constitution, and they would have made an effort to defeat the constitution by voting against it instead of staying at home. We cannot doubt from the vote given under the circumstances, and from what we know in regard to Alabama as compared with other southern States, that there is a large and decided majority in Alabama in favor of reconstruction and in favor of the constitution recently formed there.

In view of these notorious facts, is it not competent for the same Congress that passed the first law to waive its provisions? That is the simple question. If there is such moral evidence as to satisfy our minds that there is a majority of Union men in that State and that the result would not have been different if the vote had been taken under the present law instead of the law in its previous form, I ask what objection there is to the same Congress that made the law waiving that condition.

Now, we are asked to refuse to receive the constitution of Alabama because there was not cast for it a majority of all the registered vote. We are asked to keep Alabama out and to keep her under a constitution which she now has, which was never ratified at all. The present constitution of Alabama, under which her State government exists, was never submitted to the people; it was not ratified by a majority of one hundred or five hundred or one thousand. It was simply adopted by a convention, the delegates to which convention were elected by about one third of the white vote as it stood in 1865, by about one sixth of the voters of the State of Alabama. This convention thus created by a small minority, even, of the white people of Alabama, met and formed a constitution, and put it into operation without submitting it for ratification at all. And, sir, in behalf of that constitution, and the continuance of the State government created by it, we are asked to reject a constitution that has been ratified by a majority of the registered votes lacking only some five or six thousand.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the position is not a very logical one. In my judgment we are to act in our legislation here for the good of the whole country, and not to consider ourselves estopped, as it were, by some provision that we might have put in a former law, which was unreasonable and absurd at the time. I fought that old provision with whatever ability I had. I thought it remarkably strange that we should provide that every man who was drunk, or who had since died, or who had run away, or who was in jail, or had been sent to the penitentiary, since the time the registration was made should be counted against the constitution. To use plain language, I could not see that there was any sense in it. It was giving every possible advantage to the enemies of reconstruction to say that every man who from any cause was kept from the polls should be counted against the constitution if his name had before that time been registered. The registry was some months before the election. By the time the election came round many of the registered voters had left the State; others had died; others were deterred from going to the polls; some had not the means to go; and yet by this most absurd and remarkable provision all these men were to be counted as voting against the constitution.

Mr. President, when you consider the difficulties under which this vote was cast in the winter time, it is surprising that so many men voted in Alabama. I believe they only had one poll in each county. Was not that the fact?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think one in each county.

Mr. MORTON. And some of them were very large counties. Some of these counties, I understand, contain five or six hundred square miles. The colored people, without horses, without means of traveling, were often required to travel twenty-five or thirty miles to get to the polls. In a country where the rivers are unbridged, where there are scarcely any roads, this was a serious obstacle; and I say, in view of all these facts, the vote was remarkably large. Take the old States; take the State of Indiana, for example, where you can scarcely find a precinct to which the voters have to travel more than six or seven miles, and generally less than that; where the places of voting are frequent in every county, as many as there are townships, and sometimes two or three in a township; and if you were submitting a constitution for ratification in the State of Indiana it would be hard, under the circumstances, however popular it might be, to require a majority of all the registered voters to vote in favor of that constitution to ensure its adoption.

Looking at the distance the voters had to travel, the season of the year, the utter poverty of the great majority of them, and upon the fact that the colored people were living on the plantations and on the property of their enemies, politically speaking, and that every means was resorted to for the purpose of preventing them from going to the polls, inducements held out—for that was the game that the opponents of reconstruction were playing—to stay away themselves and keep everybody else away, if possible, because every colored man who was thus kept at home, from any cause, was counted as against the constitution—in view of all these facts, the vote was remarkably large. It has been said here today, I forget by whom, that the vote cast in favor of the constitution was a larger percentage of all the registered voters than was cast in any other State before or since. Notwithstanding the provision in the law referred to by my colleague, I have no hesitation in voting for the immediate admission of Alabama. Let us have done with this business. What is to be gained by throwing Alabama back and requiring her to hold another election? The Union party is being demoralized there. It has just been formed under the most adverse circumstances. It has not the wealth, it has not the means for holding together the organization for carrying on another canvass that parties would have in older States where they have more wealth, and where they have been longer formed. No, sir; let us take this State by the hand and welcome her into the Union, and every one of the others where there is a majority in favor of the constitution.

Now, Mr. President, one word in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. While I am in favor of the immediate admission of Alabama, I am sorry to find that some of our friends place more weight upon this technicality a great deal than I do. I do not want to endanger the admission of the other five States by the views some of our friends hold in regard to Alabama; and as we need their votes to pass the bill over a veto, if it should be vetoed, it might perhaps be safer to put Alabama into a bill by itself and pass it separately, as we did the bill for the admission of the State of Arkansas. Therefore, under all the circumstances, I believe that I shall not vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts simply upon that ground, wanting it understood all the time that I am in favor of the immediate admission of the State of Alabama.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, in submitting this amendment I was guided by a desire to do justice to Alabama. The law originally framed requiring that a majority of all the registered voters should vote on the ratification of the constitution, gave all the advantages to the opponents of the constitution. In the most excited elections, nearly one fifth of all the voters fail to vote. Out of the one hundred and seventy thousand registered voters of Alabama it was reasonable to suppose that from thirty to forty thousand would stay away from the polls. These thirty or forty thousand voters staying away from the polls were counted against the adoption of the constitution. Now, how can a law be wise the object of which was to bring these States back into the Union again on the basis of loyalty and liberty, which provided that one fifth of all the registered voters should be counted against the constitution?

Then it violated another sacred principle. Every man who went to the polls in Alabama and voted at this election was known to be for the constitution, and he was marked and branded and punished for it, thus violating the secrecy of the ballot. Never in the history of the world was there such a provision in legislation for such a purpose, and I do not see how it is to be defended here or elsewhere.

But, sir, the same law made another provision to which I desire to call the attention of Senators. It was that the voters should have an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud; and it was provided that the State should be admitted if Congress should be satisfied that the constitution met "the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State." I maintain that the people of Alabama had no opportunity to vote without fear or restraint. The great masses of the people who voted to adopt this constitution were laboring men, black and white. They were the poor bondmen who had been oppressed, or they were the laboring white men who had been degraded by the system of slavery. These persons, living on the lands of others, living in little cabins owned by others, employed by them, were more or less under the dominating influence of these persons. A gentleman who had occupied the seat you, sir, occupy, who had presided over this body, having many men in his employment, told them, it is said, that he would dismiss them if they voted for the constitution. They voted, and he did dismiss them.

Mr. JOHNSON. Who was that?

Mr. WILSON. Fitzpatrick.

Mr. JOHNSON. Fitzpatrick of Alabama?

Mr. WILSON. Fitzpatrick of Alabama, who left the Senate Chamber and went into the rebellion. The loyal professional man was visited and threatened with the consequences if he dared to vote for this constitution. Old merchants who had been in Alabama for twenty years were visited by committees and told that no more goods should be sold by them, and committees were sent to their doors to watch, warn, and mark every person who should buy goods of them. Influences of this kind were used all over the State, and thousands of votes were lost to the constitution by this overbearing, oppressive, and aggressive policy. Not satisfied with that, men were met with the revolver, and their lives threatened.

There is a regular organized system of intimidation, the whole social power and influence of the rebel element was brought to bear with terrible force. Old business men and old planters, natives of the South, were made to feel the force of social proscription, yet the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] tells us that the Army and the Freedmen's Bureau controlled and dominated in that State. How could our little Army in Alabama affect the public sentiment? How much social influence had the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau? General Swayne was at the head of the Freedmen's Bureau in that State for many months.

Mr. CONNESS. He was a very moderate man, too.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir. General Swayne was one of the purest and best of men, yet he was put under the ban of social proscription.

Sir, I believe if the people of Alabama could have voted without fear, restraint, or fraud, that the constitution would have been ratified by a majority of tens of thousands. Yes, sir, there is this day and there was on the day of election from twenty-five to fifty thousand majority in Alabama for the constitution. She would have cast the largest majority for the constitution of any of the rebel States, and as it is, in spite of winter storms, violence, social proscription, and the law we hastened to repeal when we saw its workings, she gave the largest percentage of her registered votes in favor of the constitution of any of the States, South Carolina excepted. Forty-four per cent. of the registered voters of Alabama voted for the constitution. Alabama is, of the ten rebel States, the strongest, safest, and most surely loyal, and quite as deserving as any of them.

During the four years of war it was our first and highest duty to put down the rebellion. Since the close of the war it has seemed to me to be the paramount duty of the country to restore the rebel States on the basis of loyalty and security for the liberties of the people. We have endeavored to act on the policy of the unity of the Republic and the equal rights and privileges of the people. Some gentlemen have been ready to take back those States rebel end foremost. Yes, sir; some gentlemen have been in favor of taking back the States and of putting those States under the control of rebels, whose rebellious spirits are still unsubdued, and of putting the loyal masses, black and white, under their feet. The President was the head of this party that sought to restore the supremacy, at least in the rebel States, if not in the country, to what gentlemen sometimes call the "natural leaders of the South," the old rebel slave masters. The President's policy of reconstruction has perished and its champions have gone down beneath the stern condemnation of the loyal people. Congress adopted the wise, just, and beneficent policy of reconstruction that has already prepared seven of the ten rebel States for restoration. I do not say, sir, that the policy of reconstruction was perfect in theory or is perfect in practice. The terrible mistake was committed of leaving the rebel office-holders in those States in power. I have always believed that it was a mistake to deny suffrage to any man in the rebel States, and could I have controlled it I would have made it otherwise. We excluded a small body of men, men who had sworn to support the Constitution and had gone into the rebellion, from the right of suffrage. Of the eight hundred thousand white voters in the rebel States, not fifty thousand were denied the right of suffrage by our reconstruction acts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say to the Senator that I was told by a very prominent citizen of the State of Alabama, whose opinion on the subject I believe, that there were from twenty-five to thirty thousand in that State excluded by your law.

Mr. WILSON. There never could be a greater mistake on the face of the earth. We excluded simply the men who had held office and taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and there is not a State that had ten thousand of such persons. It would not have altered the result in a single State if we had provided otherwise. Some of the very best friends of reconstruction were men who could not vote.

The Senator from Indiana near me [Mr. MORTON] tells us that some of our friends are embarrassed by this amendment; that he intends to vote against it, and to vote for the admission of Alabama in a separate bill at the earliest possible moment. My object in moving this amendment is to have the Senate act in harmony with the House of Representatives in hastening the grand work of reconstruction. I propose therefore to vote, if I vote alone, to put Alabama into the pending bill.

I am not unmindful of the influences of the spirit of partisanship that often actuate us when we perhaps are not conscious of it. I desire above all things the speedy restoration of the rebel States to their practical relations, on the basis of loyalty to the country and equal rights to citizens without distinction of color or race. I assure the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW], and all Senators on that side of the Chamber, that I shall vote for the speedy admission of every State that complies with the terms and conditions we have imposed, without reference to how such State may vote in the coming presidential election.

Nine constitutions securing equality of rights and privilege have been framed. Six of those constitutions have been ratified by popular majorities of more than one hundred thousand, and the constitution of Alabama has received a majority of seventy thousand. I welcome each one and all of these seven States in the full belief that the men who have framed these constitutions and ratified them by more than one hundred and seventy thousand majority—the men who have elected Governors and Legislatures and Representatives to Congress fully and unreservedly committed to the perpetual unity of the country and the equal rights and privileges of American citizens, are wise enough and strong enough to guide the policies and control the councils of those States. The masses of the men who have framed these constitutions and ratified them may be ignorant and they may be poor, but they have done a grand work for loyalty, liberty, justice, and humanity. In coming years, as in the past year, these men, inspired by love of country and a sense of justice, may be able to cope successfully with the proud champions of disloyalty and caste. I unhesitatingly place the power in their hands confident that they are worthy to be trusted and tried.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President—

Mr. BUCKALEW. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to make an explanation of but a single word.

Mr. YATES. I desire to say only a few words myself.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Very well.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, when I have cast a vote that I think was dictated by sound policy and was a right vote, I do not like to hear it treated and denounced as self-evidently wrong by Senators upon this floor. I believe that that vote was dictated by sound policy, and I do not choose now, unless better reasons are given than those which have been presented, to admit that I was in error. That vote was given at a time when a different state of feeling prevailed from that which seems to prevail now. It was at a time when the Senator from Massachusetts, with most eloquent voice, was telling us that these men had rebelled against the Government, that they had organized war, that they had sought the life of the nation, and that they were not to be received into the Union, if it was for fifty years, until they gave indications of loyalty and fidelity to their Government.

Those Senators who voted in favor of requiring the largest number of voters to sanction the new constitutions were in favor of more loyalty than is now contended for by the Senator from Massachusetts when he says that a minority shall rule and govern. It may yet appear, sir, that that vote was right, and that those who cast that vote were more far-seeing than those who denounced it. Perhaps the time will come when the wisdom of it will be shown to those who now denounce it, when perhaps at the very first election these States shall send into the House of Representatives and into the Senate those rebel leaders who organized war, who sought and worked for their country's murder. When they come here, and, uniting with the Democratic party of the North, resume their former position and power in this country to upset and to destroy our plan and policy of reconstruction which has cost us so much time and labor, it may then appear, sir, that those who required a vote the indication of the highest loyalty and of repentance on the part of these southern rebels, acted the part of statesmen instead of giving a vote which is liable to be denounced as self-evidently wrong.

In taking this position I do not mean to say that I shall vote against the admission of Alabama. I think there is danger either way. To admit these men is certainly dangerous. We know, sir, that the Democratic party now is hoping for success from the coöperation of the southern leaders. We know not how soon every measure for which we have contended may, by the joint action of the Democratic party of the North and their southern allies, be overturned. We do not know how soon attempts may be made even to reestablish slavery under the State-rights doctrine that the States have the right to determine for themselves their own institutions. We know not how soon the southern rebels, with their northern assistants, may attempt to repudiate the national debt, unless coupled with it be the payment of the rebel debt also.

But, sir, I say there are evils either way. I presume, however, that I shall cast my vote in favor of the admission of these States. There is an objection, and it is the objection pointed out by the honorable Senator from Michigan, why this State should not be inserted in the bill before the Senate. It is that the President, upon the technical objection which he may find in this bill, the fact that a majority of the registered voters has not been cast in favor of the constitution of Alabama, may veto the whole bill; and it is not certain that some Senators may not conscientiously vote to sustain the veto, upon the ground that Alabama has not conformed to the requirement of the law providing for reconstruction. Therefore let it be a separate question. There is only one way in which we can honorably admit the State upon the present vote, and that is to show that there has been a fraud, to show that the election was not a fair one, so that the will of the people of the State has not been consulted. Sir, if, notwithstanding the military power and the Freedmen's Bureau, to which allusion has been made, the rebels can now defeat an election by force, by fraud, how will it be when the military restraint is removed? If we could not overcome this force and effort in this election, how can we expect to overcome it in an election hereafter when these restraints are removed?

I simply rose, sir, more to refer to the position assumed by the Senator from Michigan than anything else, and to indorse that, and to ask the Senate not to hazard the passage of the bill for the admission of the other States by connecting with it the admission of the State of Alabama.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, it is not upon any party ground or party considerations that I am opposed to the present bill; for, sir, were the bill to pass and become a law, and the people of the southern States—I refer to the intelligent white people of the southern States—should find themselves placed in a position where it would be necessary for them to exercise their intellectual and moral power, not only among their own race, but among the colored people of the South, I have no doubt what the result would be in the large majority of the southern States. That the intellect and moral power of the South will rule all races there when you come to the struggle is just as certain as the revolutions of the earth, as that water will find its level. The moral power and intellectual power which the white people possess in the South, my honorable friend from Massachusetts will find, will control the half-civilized negro element whenever they desire to do it. And there is a very noted case arising in the last election in the State of Georgia in the most numerous negro district in that State, where the majority of the negroes was about seven thousand. The white men of that district thought they would go into the canvass, and they did so and elected their candidate by twelve hundred majority. No, Mr. President, it is not upon any such miserable ground as a party consideration that I have ever opposed this policy of reconstruction in the southern States. The ground on which I have stood has been this, that the Constitution of the United States is openly, palpably violated when Congress undertakes to say who shall vote in the States of the South, and to change the constitutions of those States at pleasure.

The constitutions of those States have provided, from time immemorial, who shall be their voters; and when Congress assumes to change those constitutions, Congress assumes to violate the Constitution of the United States; Congress assumes to trample down under its feet the right of a State to judge for itself who shall be its qualified electors; and when Congress does that, it strikes a blow at the very existence of the States, which are the pillars upon which the Union rests. That, sir, is one of the main grounds.

Another is that when Congress assumes to disfranchise a large portion of the white people of the South who have never been convicted of any offense whatever; when it assumes to disfranchise a large portion of the citizens of the South who, on laying down the arms of rebellion, received pardon and amnesty from President Lincoln and President Johnson, pursuant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, Congress violates the sacred pledged faith which this nation has given to those citizens, and which it cannot take away without dishonor.

I say that when Congress undertakes to take away rights from the citizens of the South, after they have ceased their rebellion and have taken an oath to renew their allegiance to the Constitution of the United States, and have received pardon from the President of the United States, who has the power to grant it, Congress violates the pledged faith of this nation; and no congressional reconstruction based on that violation can stand the test of examination before the American people.

Sir, I say it is not on party grounds at all that I have stood up to resist your measures of reconstruction and their fruits. So far as party grounds are concerned, to which my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. YATES] referred in the course of his remarks, let me say that my honorable friend from Oregon is not alone, nor is my honorable friend from Ohio, nor other Senators in finding that the States which they represent will not respond to this doctrine that Congress has the power to trample under its feet the right of a State to fix for itself the qualifications of its voters, nor will they respond to the doctrine which disfranchises white men by its legislation and forces the control of the States of the South into the hands of the half-civilized negroes. That is the difficulty in the case. That is the difficulty in relation to the elections which you see in Michigan, Ohio, and Oregon, and they are only just the sprinkling before the great shower that is coming.

I say to Senators on this floor, they cannot trample down the Constitution of the United States, they cannot wrench the government of the States from the hands of civilized men to put it in the hands of half-civilized negroes, and expect the people of this country to sustain them. They will not sustain such conduct. The mark of condemnation is written all over it. The party that identifies itself with it will be trampled in pieces as soon as the election shall come.

Mr. President, it is not that I suppose that ignorance, want of education, and this race which has just had its shackles knocked from its limbs in the South, can control those States even if you force suffrage into their hands. Not at all. The white men there, by their moral and intellectual power, will control those States, and that very soon. But it is because of the outrage in trampling down the constitution, violating the rights of those people, violating the rights of those States, violating the sacred pledge given by the President when he gave pardon to those men, that I oppose it; that is the reason why the people oppose it; that is the reason why the people will pronounce their judgment in tones of condemnation that will be heard not only in Oregon and Nevada and Michigan and Ohio and New York, but all over this land North and South in tones that men will understand.

Now, Mr. President, in relation to this question of Alabama. Alabama has no voice on this floor. There is nobody to speak for her. She has been dumb here, and all sorts of representations are made by men that do not know much about it. I hold in my hand, Mr. President, a petition signed by a thousand of the intelligent citizens of Alabama.

Mr. CONNESS. Rebels.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Some of them were in the rebellion, but they are not rebels now.

Mr. CONNESS. Ah!

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let me say that the men who are rebels now are the men who are against the Constitution, who are trampling it under their feet; and I do not care whether they come from California or from Alabama; he is a rebel who is opposed to the Constitution and would trample it under his feet. When the men of the South, though they had been engaged in rebellion, laid down the arms of their rebellion and took an oath and renewed their allegiance to the Government of the United States, they ceased to be rebels, and you have no right to term them and denominate them rebels now, so long as they have laid down the arms of rebellion and have taken the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States until they manifest by their acts, by their votes, or by their conduct that they are opposed to the Constitution of the United States. Then they are rebels if they manifest that. The petition which I hold is signed by men who were engaged in the rebellion and by men who were opposed to the rebellion, both. Now, Mr. President, because they have no one to represent them, because they are not here with their representatives, I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I read a few extracts from the petition which they send here, which bear directly on this question:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The white people of Alabama send this their humble petition:

We beseech your honorable bodies to withdraw yourselves from the influence of the passions and contests of the hour and contemplate for a brief period our miserable condition and the yet more wretched state which is already prepared for us. Surely it is only such influences that have prevented you from bestowing on us a single ray of beneficent regard.

According to the last census taken by the Federal Government, the white people of Alabama outnumber the negro or colored population more than eighty-eight thousand persons. And we think we arrogate nothing which your honorable bodies will not concede to us, when we say that nearly all of the education, intelligence, and civilization of the State is to be found in our race. But poverty prevails throughout the land. We are beset by secret oath-bound political societies. Our character and conduct are systematically misrepresented and maligned to you, and in the newspapers of the North; the intelligent and impartial administration of just laws is obstructed; property has become almost valueless; industry and enterprise are paralyzed by the fears of the white men and the expectations of the black. That Alabama will soon be delivered over to the rule of the latter; and many of our best citizens are for these reasons leaving the homes they love for other and strange lands.

Before the late unhappy war, the white people of the South contributed their whole just proportion of the great and good men whose acts and characters constituted the chief renown of the Republic. Those of us who endeavored to withdraw the South from her partnership therein, did not do so in order to make war on the northern States or their institutions, but for the purpose (vain hope!) of establishing peacefully another not unfriendly independent confederacy, in which under almost identical constitutions we might be more free from discord. And, however criminal in your opinion, we may in this have been, yet neither our sins nor our sufferings have reduced us to uncivilized barbarians.

On the other hand, it is well known by all who have knowledge on the subject, that while the negroes of the South may be more intelligent and of better morals than those of the same race in any other part of the world where they exist in equal density, yet they are in the main ignorant, generally wholly unacquainted with the principles of free government, improvident, disinclined to work, credulous yet suspicious, dishonest, untruthful, incapable of self-restraint, and easily impelled by want or excited by false and specious counsels, into folly and crime. Exceptions, of course, there are: chiefly among those who have been reared as servants in our domestic circles and in our cities. But the general character of our colored population is such as we have described. Whose fault it is that they are so—whether ours, under whose control they have certainly become better than their brethren in their native Africa, or the fault of anybody—it is needless now to inquire. We have to deal with the incontestable fact, that in the main they are unlettered and capricious barbarians, turned suddenly loose from the condition of slaves, and eager to avail themselves of freedom to indulge and gratify their desires and passions.

Are these the people in whom should be vested the high governmental functions of establishing institutions and enacting and enforcing laws to prevent crime, protect property, preserve peace and order in society, and promote industry, enterprise, and civilization in Alabama, and the power and honor of the United States? Without property, without industry, without any regard for reputation, without control over their own caprices and strong passions, and without fear of punishment under laws by courts and through juries which are created by and composed of themselves or of those whom they elect. How can it be otherwise than that they will bring, to the great injury of themselves as well as of us and our children, blight, crime, ruin, and barbarism on this fair land?

Without reading all of this—for it is too long to occupy the time of the Senate with it—these men in conclusion implore the Congress of the United States to rule them rather by military force than to undertake to place them under the domination and control of the colored race. They say:

"Continue over us, if you will do so, your own rule by the sword. Send down among us honorable and upright men of your own people, of the race to which you and we belong; and ungracious, contrary to wise policy and the institutions of the country, and tyrannous as it will be, no hand will be raised among us to resist by force their authority. But do not, we implore you, abdicate your own rule over us by transferring us to the blighting, brutalizing, and unnatural dominion of an alien and inferior race, a race which has never shown sufficient administrative capacity for the good government of even the tribes into which it has always been broken up in its native seats, and which in all ages has itself furnished slaves for all the other races of the earth."

Mr. President, what these men state from Alabama is supported by the concurrent testimony of more than nine tenths of all the white men in all the States of the South. I do not say that there are not exceptions, of negroes that are brought up in families, brought up in cities, brought up in those employments where they have the knowledge and the habits of white men and of freemen. The mulattoes, who partake to a certain extent of the intelligence of the whites, may generally be exceptions to this general rule; but as applied to the great mass of those people, who have just been set free by emancipation in the South, this is the concurrent testimony not only of these gentlemen but of nine tenths of all the white population of the South, and I will add nine tenths of all the white population of the North that ever lived at the South or traveled among them and know really anything about their true condition. The fact is that the great majority of these people are utterly unfit to have suffrage placed in their hands as the basis of reconstruction in the States of the South.

Sir, I stand not upon the authority of these gentlemen alone; I give you other authority that the honorable Senator from California will not claim to be rebel authority. I give you the authority of Mr. Lincoln, the late President of the United States. Mr. Lincoln said:

"I am not, nor never have been, in favor of making voters or jurors of negroes, nor qualifying them to hold office, nor intermarrying them with white people; and I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe, will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality—and inasmuch as they cannot live white they do remain together—there must be a position of superior and inferior, and I, as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race."

Mr. WILSON. Tell us what date that was.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In his debate with Mr. Douglas in the State of Illinois.

Mr. CONNESS. In what year?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I forget the year.

Mr. CONNESS. Eighteen hundred and fifty-eight.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And there is also the testimony of Mr. Jefferson on this subject, given a long time ago. It is true he was the author of the Declaration of Independence, but he spoke of the difference which God the Almighty has stamped upon these two races, and which the law of Congress cannot repeal. So, also, the statement of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] when he said:

"I know that there is a distinction between the two races, because the Almighty himself has marked it upon their very faces, and, in my judgment, man cannot, by legislation or otherwise, produce a perfect equality between those races so that they will live happily together."

Mr. THAYER. What did he mean by that? Mr. DOOLITTLE. He meant what he said, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if there is any equality among white men.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, there is a difference between the Indian and the Caucasian, between the Mongolian and the Caucasian, between the negro and the Caucasian, which is just as marked and distinct as it can possibly be. There is not from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot, in mind or in body, anything which does not differ.

Mr. POMEROY. It is equally marked between the Senator and myself; nobody would mistake him for me, or me for him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, we are different from each other, I admit; but that difference is by no means the kind of difference which exists between him and an Indian, or between me and a negro, or a Mongolian and a negro. Why, Mr. President, when Congress undertakes by a stroke of the pen to abolish this distinction which the Almighty himself has made, it has been the folly of all the follies which man ever attempted since the world began. Mr. Jefferson, who proclaimed the Declaration of Independence, himself said—I will give the honorable Senator his words:

"Nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate than that these people are to be free. Nor is it less certain that the two races—equally free—cannot live in the same Government."

That is Jefferson. Is my friend from Nebraska satisfied? My honorable friend from Nebraska knows very well the distinction between a white man and an Indian. He knows that Congress cannot by legislation make an Indian a white man. He knows very well that habit, nature, prejudice, all there is in a white man and all there is in an Indian is different from each other. It is so as between the white man and the negro, and it is this futile attempt on the part of Congress to do what God the Almighty, has said shall not be done—

Mr. THAYER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator desires to ask a question, I will give way.

Mr. THAYER. The Senator asked me if I was satisfied. I desire to remark that he did not answer my question. I ask him now whether Jefferson embraced negroes when he said "all men."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. He did. I have no doubt of that; but he embraced the negro in his home in the tropics, and the negro in his own home in the tropics is where God the Almighty intended him to be; and when the white man by force wrenched him from his native home and planted him here in the presence of white men he was an exotic, an alien, an inferior race in the presence of the white man in the white man's home, which is in the temperate zone.

So, Mr. President, even if you go back to the days of the Roman empire, when Caesar Augustus made his will, he told the Roman empire never to undertake to conquer Ethiopia and Africa. Why? Because it was a climate where the white man could not live; it was the climate that God the Almighty had given to the colored man as his home, and which the colored man had a right to hold and to hold forever.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Well, Mr. President, I do not like always to be drawn off into a dialogue if I get to talking upon any of these interesting topics; but if the Senator simply desires to ask a question I have no objection to answering it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I simply wish the Senator to explain to the Senaate his own record on this subject. I remember that he made a speech a few years since, when the question of the exportation of the negroes was up, in which he said that in one or two centuries these black men would establish in the tropics a republic which would rival the Republic of the North American continent. I want to know how they are going to do it if they are as debased as he now says they are?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I believe that the negro in the hot latitudes of Central America or the tropics, when you take him all in all, to bear the sunshine, to bear the climate, is the only race that can live there. The experience of Englishmen in India has shown that white men who go there and live in that climate, the first generation may live, the second generation has but a feeble growth, and the third generation becomes so depreciated and enfeebled that they cease to propagate their species. It is given by the fiat of the Almighty that those tropical regions are to be given to the tropical man, and the regions of the temperate zones to the man who was made for them.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I should like to ask the Senator one other question. I ask if he does not know that the African in this country is superior to the African in his own country?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do know, Mr. President, that he is superior here, because he has been brought in contact with the white man, and although it has been even in a state of slavery the white man has educated him, and civilized him, and given him religion—Christianity. At the same time it is equally true that the mass of the negro race in the presence of the white man in this zone and climate is not the equal of the white man, and the attempt to make him equal is impossible to be carried into effect.

Mr. President, I suppose that Washington and Jefferson and Madison and Clay and Webster, and all the Presidents we have had from Washington down to the present day were as wise at least as we are in natural philosophy and knew as much about the races of man, and they all concurred in this opinion.

Now, Mr. President, to go a little into detail on this question, one of the generals of our Army in our last war stated to me a very singular circumstance that occurred in the State of Georgia when the election came off in that State for the holding of the convention in one of the populous negro counties. A gentleman residing there was desired to take a position in the convention. To do so it was necessary that he should get the negro votes. What did he do? He engaged a bright mulatto to pretend to run as a candidate against him and circulate votes at the court-house throughout the whole election day, and to denounce himself, as a matter of course. The mulatto did so, and when they came to count up the votes it was found that there was not one single vote in the ballot-box for the mulatto, but every vote was for the white man. I do not justify any such trick as this in political matters; I would no more descend to deception or falsehood in politics than I would in ordinary intercourse or business; but does it not go to demonstrate how utterly unfit this population are to exercise the right of franchise, if, in a whole county, there is not intelligence enough among them to enable them to ascertain that they were voting for a white man whom they did not intend to elect, and against a negro whom they did intend to elect?

How was it in South Carolina? We have the statement of Governor Perry as to one of the elections that came off there. He certainly is not a rebel. He has been a Union man always; he was before the struggle and during the struggle; and, therefore, I suppose we can rely upon his statement.

Mr. CONNESS. Who is Mr. Perry?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Governor Perry, of South Carolina.

Mr. CONNESS. The rebel appointed by Mr. Johnson?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir; he was not a rebel; he was a Union man, but he was appointed by Mr. Johnson.

Mr. CONNESS. Not a rebel?

Mr. SUMNER. He was in the rebel service during the war.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. SUMNER. I am sure of it; I have the documents.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think the Senator will find himself entirely mistaken when he examines. At all events gentlemen have said to me, and all who have ever spoken in relation to Mr. Perry have said that he was a Union man.

Mr. SUMNER. It is a great mistake.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have always understood him to be like Governor Parsons, of Alabama, who was a Union man. I do not think I can be mistaken on that subject. I think the Senator from Massachusetts will find himself entirely mistaken. I have no doubt that Mr. Perry's statement is reliable. Speaking upon this very subject, just after the election for the constitutional convention in South Carolina, he said:

"In regard to the political condition of the southern States I am in deep despair and have no hope except in a returning sense of justice on the part of the northern people. The idea of placing the government of these States in the hands of negroes is preposterously absurd. None of them have property, and not one in five hundred can read or write. In the recent election for members of a convention many of the negroes had forgotten their names, and scarcely one in a hundred could tell after the election for whom he voted. They were controlled blindly by the loyal leagues. The tickets were printed in Charleston, with a likeness of President Lincoln on them."

I happen to have one of the tickets here, and if the honorable Senator from Massachusetts wishes to look at it he will find a little curiosity about it. I see that the first name on the ticket for the convention was Alonzo J. Ransier, a colored man, of South Carolina. The next was Frederick A. Sawyer, from Massachusetts. The next Christopher C. Bowen, from Rhode Island. The next Albert G. Mackey, of South Carolina; and then Gilbert Pillsbury, who, I believe, is a Massachusetts man; then Richard H. Cain, a colored man; then comes the name of Francis L. Cardoza, from New York, I think, though I should judge from the name that he was of foreign extraction.

Mr. SUMNER. A colored man.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The next name is Robert C. Delarge, from South Carolina, a colored man; and the last name on the ticket, William McKinlay, of South Carolina, a colored man. This was the ticket. Governor Perry goes on to say:

"There never has been before such a wide field opened for the demagogues and unprincipled aspirants to office. The negroes the most credulous being in the world, and most easily imposed on by vile wretches who are disposed to pander to his ignorance and passion. Emissaries from the North, white and black, have come here and prejudiced him against the white race. He has been told that unless he voted the Radical ticket he would be placed back in slavery, and that if he voted that ticket he would have lands and mules given him. In some instances the negroes actually brought with them bridles to take their mules home with."

Mr. President, this is the kind of material which is forced upon these States as the basis of reconstruction by Congress; disfranchising the intelligent whites of the South, or many of them; disfranchising many who had actually received pardon at the hands of Mr. Lincoln and at the hands of Mr. Johnson, pursuant to the law that you yourself had enacted; disfranchising them, although not convicted of any crime; disfranchising them after they had received from the President an absolute pardon and restoration to all the rights of citizenship, which the Supreme Court has expressly declared is a full pardon; that Congress has no power to restrict, the power to pardon being in the President, an unqualified power over which Congress has no control whatever. Then the men who are enfranchised, these ignorant negroes, just set free from the plantations, not knowing their names, nor the names by which they were registered, nor the names of the men for whom they vote, who are so ignorant as to go to the election with bridles to take their mules home for voting the Radical ticket; these are the men upon whom you force reconstruction at the South in this civilized age, and in the nineteenth century.

Mr. President, I have objected to this mode of reconstruction. I have stood for the reconstruction which Mr. Lincoln proposed, a reconstruction based upon two ideas: first of all, that the State constitution fixing the right of suffrage cannot be changed by Congress, and second, that reconstruction should be based upon the civilized and not upon the semi-civilized people of the southern States. I have pleaded for that reconstruction. Perhaps I have pleaded in vain; perhaps it has been unnecessary that I should have pleaded for it as I have done. The majority is so strong that you are bound to carry these measures and to insist upon your reconstruction based upon the idea that Congress can fix and change the constitutions of these States, based upon the idea that you prefer the governments in those States in the control of the half civilized men of the South rather than under the control of the civilized white race to which we belong. You can do this for you have the power. I suppose you will do it, are resolved upon it, and that nothing I can say can prevent it; but if it be done, and if the people of the South find themselves placed in a position where they are compelled to descend into the arena and enter the canvass to see who can control this ignorant negro vote, they, in the interest of their own States, or you, through your emissaries and the Freedmen's Bureau and the military power which you have there, I believe in the end you will find that the white people of the South will be stronger than you are, and will control them in spite of all your efforts to the contrary, and that the pit which you seek to dig for them will be the very pit perhaps in which you are to be buried. But go on, gentlemen; the responsibility is upon you. You have the power. You will exercise it.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. Before the Senator proceeds I should like to have one minute to correct—

Mr. STEWART. I will only occupy a minute.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to correct an error of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. STEWART. I just want to say a word or two to the Senator from Wisconsin. He says that they will trample down these reconstruction laws.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not say that.

Mr. STEWART. He says our friends shall be trampled down.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not say that.

Mr. STEWART. That they will trample down our efforts to reconstruct the southern States on the congressional basis.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not say that. I said that the party which sought to do what I described would be trampled in pieces, and that shortly.

Mr. STEWART. The party that sought to do that would be trampled in pieces. That has been the effort of the same men that are attempting to do that now. I rose to tell the gentleman that before they trample down the people who saved this Union, before they trample down the loyal element, before they place over loyalty the rebels who are still unrepentant, before they reconstruct this country as dictated by rebels, they have got to make further struggles than they can or have been able to make. He refers to Nevada, to Massachusetts, to Wisconsin—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not refer to Massachusetts.

Mr. STEWART. I refer to his State, Wisconsin, and I refer to the loyal millions who were engaged in this war; and if the work of subjugation and trampling down is to be begun again, I think that the same party that ended it before will end it the second time.

There is no more doubt about the constitutionality of these reconstruction measures than there is about any other law upon the statute-book. Everybody knows that; but we are told they shall be trampled underfoot. Who obeys the Constitution? The usurper who would set up government in defiance of the law? The rebel who defied the power of this Government? Who obeys the Constitution? It is the Union party who saved it and that will enforce it. It is the party the Senator speaks of trampling down.

He talks to us of the barbarians of the South. Who made them barbarians? Who kept them barbarians? If a majority of the people have become barbarians by reason of the exclusive rule of the whites, it is time that that exclusive rule should terminate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I say the negroes have been improved since they came from Africa.

Mr. DRAKE. They are semi-barbarians now, I suppose?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes; semi-barbarians now.

Mr. STEWART. I say if they still are barbarians, and if the minority that formerly ruled there propose to keep them so, that is a reason why a majority of these States should rule. Talk not to me about their ignorance, about their not understanding what they are about! The difficulty is that they know too much; and that is why the thousand rebels from Alabama sent up their whining petition here. It is because they cannot control and deceive these negroes. Think you that these rebels would be disturbed about this if they could deceive the negroes? The rebels and the Democrats generally will allow anybody to vote that votes on their side, negroes, monkeys, tadpoles, anybody that will vote on their side.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will ask the honorable Senator if he did not propose to allow all the rebels to vote if they were only on his side, if they were only in favor of reconstruction?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly, when they vote on our side and show that they repent.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then you do not care for their bloody hands?

Mr. STEWART. No; it is their bloody hearts that are still rebellious that we object to. We object to their continued assassinations. We object to their defying the Government. We object that they will not accept the situation. We object that they propose to trample us in the dust. We object that they propose to dictate terms to the conqueror. We object that they propose to make loyalty odious and treason honorable. We object that they will not submit to the verdict of the war. That is what the American people object to; and whatever you may say, the war will not stop until they submit and accept the situation.

Talk about negro suffrage! That is not the trouble. They will accept of no plan that we present. The constitutional amendment had no negro suffrage in it; but they would not accept voluntarily any plan that the loyal men could suggest; they spurned them all alike. What they demand and the extent of their demand is simply this, and nothing else: "Let us dictate the terms; you bow in the dust to us; you ask pardon for having whipped us." That is what they ask of us, and that is what we are unwilling to do.

Before this trampling in the dust, of which the Senator speaks, is done, I want him to remember that there are millions of men in this country who believe in Government, believe in the Constitution, believe in the sanctity of law, believe that rebels should submit to the Constitution, believe that the verdict of this war meant something—meant that the Government should stand, meant that all men should be free, and that justice should be supreme. They were in earnest during the war; they are in earnest still. Although they may be baffled by treachery, although they may seem to fail for a time, I tell you they have enlisted for "during the war," and they intend to have ultimate success. They do not mean to submit to the rebel mode of warfare now any more than they propose to let Lee plant our batteries. When we quit that policy in war, when we ceased to submit our plan of action to the rebels, when we placed General Grant at the head to plan the battle of loyalty without consulting the rebels, we won. Now we propose to plant our own batteries, stay in our own camp, and drive the enemy from his.

I have nothing more to say to the Senator; but I hope he will let me plead with him not to trample all the people of Wisconsin in the dust. Save some of us; spare the women and children at least.

Mr. CONKLING obtained the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the Senator will allow me to say a word by way of answer to the point of the Senator from Nevada. I shall take but a moment. The Senator speaks of these gentlemen as being disloyal to the Union; and therefore, with the permission of the Senator from New York, I will read what they say themselves on that subject:

"It is said—and by frequent repetition you are made to believe it true—that the negroes and self-styled loyalists cannot have justice and are unsafe among us, and that we are still in a state of rebellion. The charges are false. Ever since the war ended our courts and upright judges in them have administered justice as impartially as anywhere else in the land, and toward the negroes, (who aided the South as cheerfully while within the confederate lines as they afterward aided the northern armies when and where they had power,) we have been, both from inclination and interest, humane and kind. The slanderers who say otherwise are of those who are seeking to enslave us with your aid. They arrogate to themselves the majesty of the Government of the United States, and call our opposition to them in their nefarious schemes to impose upon us here a new and unheard of despotism—disloyalty to the United States."

That is what they say for themselves.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the Senator from New York proceeds, I desire to correct an error into which the Senator from Wisconsin has fallen with reference to one of his authorities. He leans confidently upon Mr. Perry as a loyal man.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My information is that he is.

Mr. SUMNER. He says now that he does. I interrupted him to say he was mistaken. I have at home a document signed by him officially in the course of the war showing him at the time to be an officeholder under the rebellion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What office?

Mr. SUMNER. I think he was commissioner for impressments in the rebel service; and he is the man whose authority is invoked by the Senator!

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] informs me that he was a member of the Legislature, but I understand he was opposed to secession, though a member of the Legislature, and with some others in the Legislature he strove to bring the war to an end.

Mr. SUMNER. I am trying to correct the Senator. I have said he was an officeholder during the rebellion, a commissioner for impressments. Now, there is something more. I have here an extract from the Charleston Mercury of May 30, 1861, containing a speech of B. F. Perry, at Greenville, South Carolina, May 20, 1861, from which I take the following words:

"I give my son, two horses, a negro boy, and fifty dollars to Brooke's cavalry, and will give my own services to the confederate cause whenever they may be required."

The date is May 20, 1861. Is not that man a rebel?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is possible I may be mistaken.

Mr. SUMNER. In the man?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No; in relation to the position he held; but I will examine the question further, and then I will settle it with the honorable Senator on another occasion. My information was that he was a Union man opposed to secession.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have sought the floor for the purpose of saying a word in reply to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] Earnest and positive as he always is, he is positive in nothing more than in matters relating to the subject of reconstruction. It has long been his habit to be so; and he evinces a zeal which is certainly commendable unless it is turned invidiously upon some of his fellows. I have heard him several times speak in this Chamber in very strong terms of denunciation of the law as it stood until a recent repealing act, and which law interposes now an objection to the State of Alabama. I have never heard him until to-day, and I listened with surprise when I heard him to-day, denounce that law as one so gross, so palpable, and, to use a word of his, self-evidently obnoxious to propriety that he felt justified in exclaiming, "Who can defend a provision like that?" outraging, as he said it did, two or three principles which he stated. Mr. President, I can defend it. I had taken leave to say, in the hearing of the Senator before he made that statement, that I did defend it; that again to-day, or to-morrow, with the same lights before me, I would vote as I voted then, for it; and I can assign my reasons for that, which would combat the allegation that it violates these principles of which the Senator speaks.

But, Mr. President, what will be the surprise of the Senate to be reminded that the Senator himself voted for this law. I do not think there can be any mistake about that. He voted for the bill of which this is a provision. The Senator says, "of course." He voted for the bill then in spite of this provision; did he?

Mr. WILSON. I fought that provision and made at least half a dozen speeches against it.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, if I was disposed to be dramatic I would say, "I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word." Mr. President, he not only voted for the bill with this provision in it, but he voted specifically for the provision itself upon the test vote on the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. CONKLING. We shall see whether I am mistaken. The Senator from Vermont, not now in his seat [Mr. EDMUNDS] offered this provision:

"The constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors, qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question."

That was the proposition. The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL] who hears me, made a struggle against it, as the record shows. So did the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS], who, therefore, did not exhibit, like my friend from Massachusetts, the zeal of a neophyte to-day when he again denounced it. But how stands the record upon the vote?

"Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us vote on this."

When a proposition to postpone was made. Mr. TRUMBULL, and others. We can get through to-night as well as at any other time.

"The President pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont."

"Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 18; as follows."

And among the yeas, among the affirmative votes thus cast for this proposition, standing naked and isolated by itself, is the conspicuous name of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. Now, Mr. President, he had good reasons—

Mr. WILSON. I can explain the whole of it if you do not.

Mr. CONKLING. I certainly will explain the whole, if I have not done so. I do not think there is any more to explain until you turn over to the report of the committee of conference which contains this also, and for which the honorable Senator voted. It is possible the Senator refers to this by his term "all of it." Preceding this in the debate was a proposition that not only a majority of all the registered votes should be cast, but cast in favor of the proposition. That was the first proposition. That the honorable Senator opposed with great zeal and with very copious reasons; and I remember, aside from the record, very well what he said. As a compromise afterward, a common ground upon which a majority, at least, could meet, it was proposed to provide, not that a majority should vote upon the affirmative side of the proposition, but that at least one half of the elective population, as ascertained by registration, should have a hand in setting up governments; and for that proposition, standing alone and by itself, and not attached to any other portion of the bill, I repeat that my honorable friend did vote.

Mr. President, he had good reasons for doing it. He had good reasons in answer to this summons, this challenge which he vaunts, "how can anybody defend a provision like this?" These, I undertake to say, were two of his reasons, without stopping to give others: we were setting up a military government; as his colleague expressed it, a government based upon the bayonet, I think was his very phrase. It was an anomaly; it was a pioneer experiment, and a very extraordinary one in a republican government. Men shrank from it; men trembled at its consideration. One of the first safeguards which occurred to practical minds considering this subject was the importance of so arranging that it should not be charged truly, or even plausibly, that the bayonet not only had governed these States as provinces, but that the bayonet had brought into existence permanent governments based upon the assent of only a fraction of the people, based upon proceedings in which participation was had only by a minority of the people, and therefore it was first thought that there should be a majority in favor of the governments which were to be set up; but the Senator from Massachusetts and others argued, and argued so successfully as to convince the Senate against that. But then it was said, let us at least have one quarter of the elective population of the States in favor of it, and let us at least establish a provision which shall require one half of those, after deducting all the disfranchised, whose names are borne upon the roll. Without amplifying this, it will be seen by Senators, and they will recall the fact, that it had great weight in the consideration.

But there was another reason, and a reason which no doubt, looking to the future of these States, bore as strongly with my friend as the reason which I have assigned. This was an act enabling these communities to vote not only, but enabling these communities to be registered also: and I beg the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to this one suggestion, which is the only one with which I shall trouble the Senate in answer to his challenge about advocating such a measure. I say this was a bill designed not only to enable voting to take place, but to enable registration, to establish registration lists which should allow to come to the ballot-box all those to whom we intended to extend the ballot. Now, sir, does not everybody see that if the provision had been originally that one half of the votes cast should control at the election the strongest possible inducement would have been offered to the enemies of reconstruction, to rebels of all shades and denominations, to prevent the negroes being registered? Does not everybody see that the smaller the register was kept and the more it was confined to rebels the more certain it would be that the majority of votes cast would also cast the die in the end? Everybody must see this, and seeing it, everybody will see, also, that the most effectual thing to be done in this regard was to offer to the loyal population the opportunity and inducement to be registered, and at the same time to offer to the rebels the strongest possible inducement to permit the loyal people to register and to aid them in doing so, because if the registration was swollen, if it came up to the full truth of the matter, it would give of course to the rebels who sought to defeat the constitution the more hope that less than one half of this vote thus registered might find its way into the ballot-box.

Now, Mr. President, without detaining the Senate any further, I submit to the honorable Senator that here were two good reasons which justified my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. YATES] in the remarks that he made, that the wisdom of this measure is not to be weighed by considerations as they stand now, but by considerations as they stood then. We are to look at it in the light of surrounding circumstances as they then were; and putting ourselves back where we stood then, I think we shall all be able to see that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and those upon whom he reflected so severely, whether by intention or not, had very firm foundations under their feet when they stood upon this provision.

Mr. CONNESS. It is now too late to continue this discussion this evening, and therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator will allow me to say a single word before that is done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion for an executive session.

Mr. WILSON. I will give way until to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. I will give way long enough to allow the Senator to take the floor for the morning.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President—

Mr. CONNESS. Now, sir, I renew the motion for an executive session, the Senator from Massachusetts having the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that will not be done. I desire to have an executive session, if the Senate will give it to me. It will not occupy a very long time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is it to consider a treaty?

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I withdraw my motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn being withdrawn, the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from California, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 5, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with.

REPORT OF GENERAL JAMES F. RUSLING.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the report of Brevet Brigadier General James F. Rusling, inspector in quartermaster's department, to the Quartermaster General for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed fifteen thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Patents; ten thousand for the use of the House, and five thousand for the Commissioner.

REPORT OF GEORGE W. BREGA.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the same committee, also reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed two thousand five hundred copies of the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the report of George W. Brega, relating to the trade with British North American Provinces; two thousand for the use of the House, and five hundred for the Treasury Department.

Mr. HARDING. I hope the House will not adopt this resolution to print a mere partisan report, a one-sided report on a question which involves the welfare of the country. It is an argument for a new reciprocity treaty under the pretense of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury. I have read the document. The House can inform itself on the subject without being lectured by a partisan of reciprocity.

Mr. BLAINE. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois, and I hope it will not be printed.

Mr. LAFLIN. The House cannot expect the committee to read all the documents referred to them. This is the report of a special commissioner appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate this subject.

Mr. BLAINE. What will be the cost?

Mr. LAFLIN. About seventy-five dollars per thousand.

Mr. BLAINE. About three hundred dollars.

Mr. LAFLIN. It is already printed and in type, and these extra copies will cost only $167. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, nays 20; no quorum voting.

Mr. LAFLIN. I withdraw the report for the present.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the same committee, also reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed five thousand extra copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution, three thousand for the House and two thousand for the institution; the same to be stereotyped at the expense heretofore provided for.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this the whole number?

Mr. LAFLIN. It is.

The resolution was adopted.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed twenty-five hundred extra copies of the report of the superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, one thousand for the superintendent, and fifteen hundred for the House.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the votes by which the several resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLAINE. I submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to House bill No. 668, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the first, second, third, fourth, and sixth amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from so much of its fifth amendment as proposes to insert in lieu of the words stricken out, and agree to said amendment as so modified.

JAMES G. BLAINE,

CHARLES E. PHELPS,

JAMES A. GARFIELD,

Managers on the part of the House.

L. M. MORRILL,

HENRY WILSON,

T. O. HOWE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BROOKS. This is like all conference reports, not understood by anybody except those who make them. I should like to have an explanation of it.

Mr. BLAINE. We covered into the Treasury all outstanding appropriations belonging to the Surgeon General's department. The Senate amended that, excepting the appropriations made March 2, 1867, $70,000 for artificial limbs for soldiers, and $10,000 for Army Medical Museum. The House agree to that.

The second amendment is to insert after the word "hereby" the word "directed to be;" so that it will read "hereby directed to be covered into the Treasury."

The third amendment is to insert after the word "Treasury" the words "at the close of the fiscal year;" so that the money shall be covered on the last day of that month instead of the day when the bill is approved.

The fourth amendment of the Senate is to strike out the appropriation, "for expenses of the signal service, $5,000." The committee on the part of the House yielded to that, and agreed to strike it out.

The fifth amendment of the Senate was to insert the following:

That from the small appropriation for each of the several items contained in this act there be deducted the unexpended balance for such items which may remain in the Treasury on the 30th of June, 1868.

That covered into the Treasury these items by limitation. It was thought that there might be more items; so the Senate receded from that amendment.

The sixth amendment of the Senate was to add the following section:

That of the appropriation of $60,000 for publishing the medical and surgical history of the rebellion and the medical statistics and of the Provost Marshal General's office made in an act approved July 28, 1866, $30,000 shall be devoted to the appropriation and publication of five thousand copies of the medical statistics of the Provost Marshal General's Bureau, and that the work shall be compiled by Assistant Medical Purveyor J. H. Baxter, under the immediate direction of the Secretary of War, and without the interference of any other officer.

This is to carry out a provision in the appropriation bill of July 28, 1867, and is really to adjust a matter of dispute between two officers in the medical bureau. It does not make any fresh appropriation and it finishes the work.

With this explanation I call for a vote on the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECOVERY OF CONFEDERATE PROPERTY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the motion to reconsider the motion made on the 23d of April last to print a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in reply to a resolution of the House of the 26th of November last relative to certain efforts of that Department for the recovery of confederate property in Europe. I call up the motion merely for the purpose of making another motion to print only so much of the report as is in manuscript. There is a large mass of printed matter which it is unnecessary to print. It will only create an unnecessary expense. Therefore if the motion to reconsider prevails I shall then make the motion to print only that which is in manuscript.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the House then ordered that only the part in manuscript be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MORNING HOUR.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order in the morning hour is the call of the committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee on the Judiciary.

THOMAS H. STEVENS.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back a joint resolution (H. R. No. 172) relative to Captain Thomas H. Stevens, of the United States Navy, recommending its passage.

The resolution authorizes the President of the United States to nominate for advancement, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to advance Captain Thomas H. Stevens not exceeding twenty-one numbers on the list of captains in the Navy, for gallant, faithful, and efficient service during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. FERRY. The Committee on Naval Affairs having given this case a thorough examination, have unanimously instructed me to report this resolution. Instead of occupying the time of the House by reading the report already printed in the case, I will state that under the act of July 25, 1866, the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to make promotions in the several grades of the Navy, and to select from officers "who have rendered the most efficient and faithful service during the recent war, and who possess the highest professional qualifications and attainments."

I desire to call the attention of the House to the following extract from a letter from Rear Admiral Wilkes, in testimony not only of the gallant services, but especially of the qualifications requisite for the promotion:

I have had many and favorable opportunities, having been associated with him—Commander Stevens—and he served under my command in the James river and in the West Indies, most of the time under my immediate observation. His patriotism is beyond doubt; his ability as an officer is second to none in the Navy; he has at all times given me on duty entire satisfaction in the performance of his duties, and the zeal with which he executed them. I think him a high-toned officer and a gentleman, and know him to be an ornament to the service; his duties engrossed his whole attention, ever ready and prompt in their execution, winning my entire satisfaction and confidence in his willingness, activity, and ability in the execution of orders. His command was always held ready for duty, and through his example, energy, and good management he fulfilled many orders, overcoming great difficulties he had to encounter. He is brave and chivalric; no officer could have shown more attachment to the Union cause during the late war, and none exerted themselves more to maintain and restore the Union and uphold the honor of our flag.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
CHARLES WILKES,
Rear Admiral.

Hon. GIBBON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

Also to the following, from the same admiral:

"In arduous cruising in the West India squadron, under my command, he upheld the honor of our flag with spirit on several occasions, and was intrusted with the execution of orders on detached service. In my opinion, no officer could have shown more attachment to his country's cause, or more efficiency in putting down the rebellion.

"For his services, bravery, and energy in carrying out orders, I think our country owes him promotion, and truly consider him entitled to it. His long and arduous chase of the Florida on the Bahama banks should alone have advanced him to a higher grade."

I have deemed it my duty to read so much in behalf of the professional qualifications and attainments of Captain Stevens. I now desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this same Captain Stevens commanded the steamer Michigan upon the northwestern lakes when the war broke out, and in testimony of his qualifications as an officer, I will state the fact that standing second only in a class of thirty-seven when he graduated, he was well fitted and chosen to be placed in command of this steamer upon the lakes, the only steamer commanding the northwestern lakes. When the war broke out, at the firing of the first gun, he tendered his services to the country, and begged the privilege of recruiting men for that service. Orders were immediately issued to him for that purpose, and he recruited three hundred men upon the lakes and proceeded with his Spartan band to the coast, and there did effective service as his subsequent war record will preëminently show.

I desire to read very briefly, in corroboration of what I state, this from Commander Jovett:

"As the executive officer of the steamer Michigan, he performed his duties promptly, efficiently, and faithfully, setting a noble example of officer-like conduct and patriotism. Men were uncertain in those days. He stood boldly forth in deprecating disloyalty. I served with him in the squadron off Mobile. He sustained the high reputation he had previously made off Charleston, South Carolina, for courage and dash. He was spoken of as the gallant Tom Stevens."

In further corroboration, I read the following from Commodore Rodgers:

"I have within the last month been sent upon three expeditions, and have always had the good fortune to have Stevens with me, and to embark on board his vessel. I have had the opportunity to observe the admirable manner in which he commands the Ottawa, and the skill with which she is handled. I have also been much struck by the attachment and confidence with which he has inspired his officers and men."

And from Admiral Dahlgren:

"I strenuously urged the claims of Commander Stevens to promotion, in connection with others, for meritorious conduct in presence of the enemy."

Sir, the reason why I have taken up the time of the House in reading these testimonials in behalf of Captain Stevens is that, for some reason unknown to the committee, this gallant captain has been overslaughed by some official manipulation; he has been laid one side, while others who have done less service and been less gallant have been raised to higher positions, not only in their grades, but have been transferred from one grade to another.

I will state in this connection that although this officer stood above Captain Howell in his class when he graduated, Captain Howell has been promoted over him, and some thirteen other officers have been raised in their own grade or transferred from one rank to another, some of whom never smelt powder, while Stevens served throughout the war, writing a record that will live imperishably in the annals of his country. In justice, however, to Captain Howell, I may say that he and other associate officers, not only do not oppose, but magnanimously declare that Captain Stevens should be promoted. He has not only been a gallant officer, but has shown his gallantry in thirty successive engagements, winning for himself, by his dash and fighting qualities, the soubriquet of "Fighting Tom Stevens." He has commanded no less than four monitors and three ships and steamers-of-war; has captured or participated in the capture of twelve forts and six rebel vessels of war.

I call the attention of members of the House to the report of the committee, which presents succinctly in chronological order the number of engagements in which he took conspicuous part. If there was nothing else in his brilliant record to distinguish him his heroic act at the attack on Fort Moultrie should commend him to the gratitude of his countrymen. It was in great measure a counterpart of the act that gave fame to Commodore Perry, who, leaving the dismantled Lawrence to seek the deck of the Niagara, and raising her flag of "Never give up the ship," thus infusing new courage and animation in the hearts of his men, by that very act, as the historian relates, turning the engagement in our favor and winning his imperishable laurels on Lake Erie. So, also, did this Captain Stevens in the attack on Fort Moultrie pass in an open boat from his own monitor to the Ironsides under the incessant fire of fort and batteries. Catching the signal of his commander, Rear Admiral Rowan, to change position, and conscious that the admiral was not aware of the favorable raking fire he was pouring into the batteries of the enemy, he leaped into his boat, and crossing over to the Ironsides in the midst and under that furious fire of fort and batteries, communicated to his commander his favorable position, where he was damaging the enemy, and received from his commander the response, "Go back and fight at your discretion; the signals were not meant for you." Thus he exposed himself in an open boat to the fire of fort and batteries, as Commodore Perry did to the broadsides of three ships and showers of musketry. By that act he placed himself side by side with the intrepid Perry. History gives us very few instances of such heroic bravery. Only one other conspicuous instance occurs to me, and that was during the second Dutch war, when the English Admiral Sprague left his vessel twice, but was drowned by too well directed shots from the Dutch fleet, cutting his boat and ships to pieces.

To-day you may see the memorial of grateful citizens to the distinguished Perry as he stands chiseled in marble in view of Lake Erie, the silent witness of the waters that sweep to posterity his immortal fame. And now for this gallant Stevens, equally brave and in his station equally heroic, the simple, I might say almost pitiable, recognition is asked of an advance of twenty-one numbers in his present grade.

Let me add in behalf of Captain Stevens, that he is so modest that he has declined the tender made him by the committee, grateful for his eminent services, that the resolution provide instead for his promotion from one rank to another, saying to this offer that he only wished to be placed after the war relatively where he was before the war. With the war record he has won for himself already a part of our country's history; he stands forth a man whose modesty is only equaled by his gallantry.

I believe I have sufficiently, though very imperfectly, placed the merits of Captain Stevens before the House, and if no other gentleman wishes to combat my presentation of his services, or if it is thought not necessary to say any more in his behalf, and I think it is not, I will call the previous question.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman withdraw that call for a moment?

Mr. FERRY. For a question, yes, sir.

Mr. BROMWELL. I wish to inquire if this joint resolution provides for the care of any other person than Captain Stevens?

Mr. FERRY. It does not.

Mr. BROMWELL. There are several other officers who are in the same situation. I have obtained considerable information about some of these promotions. There is no doubt in the world that men who have commanded ships for twenty years with the most signal ability and success have been put aside, while men who have not shown themselves under the fire of the enemy have been promoted over their heads. I understand there are about fifteen or twenty of these commanders who have been treated in that manner. Among them is Commander Young, whose history I have learned. He stands in almost the very same relations to the Navy that Captain Stevens does. Commander Young for six months commanded a monitor under water, the most dangerous and disagreeable service possible. He, like Captain Stevens, has given the most entire satisfaction under every circumstance to his commanders and to the country.

So far as this bill is concerned, the only regret I have about it is that it does not provide for a rehearing in all these cases, so that these officers can take the rank to which they are entitled. They are now put behind fifteen or twenty others who should be their juniors, and never can reach the grade of admiral by seniority during their natural lives.

Mr. FERRY. In reply to the gentleman I will say that if he will present a case as meritorious as the one I am now advocating, I will go with him with all my heart, and be in favor of reporting a bill in his favor. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMANDER JOHN L. DAVIS.

Mr. HAIGHT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1158) for the relief of Commander John L. Davis; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length. It authorizes the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to pay to Commander John L. Davis the sum of $271 91 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN JAMES F. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. HAIGHT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 287) for the restoration of Captain James F. Armstrong, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It authorizes the President of the United States to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, Captain James F. Armstrong to the active list of the Navy, with the rank to which he may be entitled thereon.

Mr. HAIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the memorial of Captain Armstrong was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and a thorough investigation was made of the case. All the papers relating to it were on file in the Navy Department, and a sub-committee of the Committee on Naval Affairs went to the Department and examined the papers there on file, which are all fully set out in the report. As the report is not very long, and as it gives a succinct statement of the facts, I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Captain James F. Armstrong, of the United States Navy, to be restored to the active list from the retired list, have had the same under consideration and report:

That the memorialist entered the Navy of the United States on the 7th of March, 1832; has been in the service for thirty-five years and eleven months, and is now fifty years old; that nineteen years and seven months of his service has been passed at sea, eight years on shore duty, and eight years and three months unemployed.

He was regularly promoted in due course to the rank of commander, and as the approval and recommendation of the advisory board of 1862 would indicate, without any reflection upon his moral or professional character and fitness. There is nothing special in the early period of his professional life to attract attention beyond the fact that he performed his duties creditably to himself and the service, and in such a manner as to secure the approbation of his superior officers.

As early as the year 1855, while holding the rank of lieutenant, he was ordered to the command of the sloop-of-war Jamestown, of the African squadron. Upon the return home in ill-health of her former commander, Ellison, he retained that position for several months, and until relieved by the appointment and arrival of his successor, Commander Ward, in 1859, was again attached to the African squadron in command of the steamer Sumter, and while there was assigned to special service. The testimony of Commodores Crabb and Dornin, on file in the Navy Department, establishes the fidelity and efficiency with which his duties were performed while on the African station.

On the 7th of January, 1860, he was assigned to the command of the steam frigate San Jacinto during her voyage to Cadiz for repairs by Commodore Inman, flag officer commanding United States African squadron. On his return to the squadron, late in the summer of that year, Commodore Inman publicly commended him for his "intelligent and judicious performance of the trying special duty confided to him."

On his return to the United States in command of the Sumter, in the fall of 1861, having applied to the Navy Department for orders, was assigned to duty on the coast of North Carolina, in command of the steamer State of Georgia, attached to the North Atlantic blockading squadron. He remained in that responsible position for nearly two years, frequently engaging the shore batteries and participating in the capture of several prizes, as well as in the action which resulted in the capture of Fort Macon in April, 1862.

On the 19th of January, 1864, he took command of the San Jacinto, and while connected with that ship incurred for the first time the censure of his superior officer. On the 20th of March, 1864, he was suspended from his command by Admiral Bailey, and shortly afterward was ordered to report to the Secretary of the Navy, to whom the record of proceedings of a court of inquiry, held to investigate his conduct during the two months preceding its session, was at the same time forwarded.

The court of inquiry was convened at Key West on the 23th of March, 1864, by Admiral Bailey, to examine into specifications or charges preferred against Commander James F. Armstrong for intemperance from January 20, 1864, to March 20, 1864, a period of two months, and while in command of the San Jacinto.

The court of inquiry simply reported the evidence taken before them, without recommending any action. A number of witnesses were examined, and in the opinion of the committee the evidence establishes the facts:

First. That upon at least two convivial occasions at dinner parties, while in port at Key West, Commander James F. Armstrong was guilty of undue indulgence.

Second. That his general conduct in respect to vigilance and attention to duty, as testified to by almost every witness, was unexceptionable.

The board of examination for the promotion of officers in the Navy under the act of April 21, 1864, assembled at Washington, July 1, 1864, Commander James F. Armstrong, by order of the Secretary of the Navy, appeared before the board on the 5th of August, 1864. The board was composed of Commodores Engle, McKeon, Glendy, and Harwood.

The following are among the witnesses examined by the board touching the promotion of Commander Armstrong: Commodore Dornin, Commander Yard, Surgeon Foltz, Captain Scott, Rear Admiral Goldsborough, Commodore Crabb, Rear Admiral Paulding, Captain Goldsborough, and Commander Quackenbush.

The finding of the board is on record at the Department, and is as follows:

Finding of the board of officers assembled at Washington to examine officers for promotion in the case of Commander James F. Armstrong.

In coming to a decision in the case of this officer, the board deem it due to him to state that previously to the occasions that gave rise to the court of inquiry above referred to, the conduct of Commander James F. Armstrong has been uniformly meritorious, as is shown by all the testimony, oral and documentary, produced before the board touching his official career. It is consequently with great regret that, in view of recent instances of excess in the use of intoxicating liquors, established on the part of Commander Armstrong by proof before the court of inquiry mentioned above, and on that account only, that the board feel themselves obliged not to recommend Commander James F. Armstrong for further promotion on the active list.

T. ENGLE, President of Board.

The evidence taken before the foregoing board shows that the investigation extended over the whole period that Commander Armstrong was in the Navy, and that the board did not pass upon the facts, but refused to recommend him for promotion.

From a careful analysis of the testimony adduced before the board, the committee are of the opinion that the difficulty was owing to accidental or untoward causes, and had not grown out of, or was the result of a settled practice or habit, and they are satisfied that Commander Armstrong never was addicted to a habit of undue indulgence.

Captain Armstrong was ordered by the Secretary of the Navy to the command of the navy-yard at Pensacola, in October, 1864, a position of great importance at that time, and has continued to discharge the duties there since October, 1864.

The committee from the evidence before them are satisfied that since March, 1864, Captain James F. Armstrong has not used any intoxicating liquor whatever. Under the circumstances the committee consider that the prayer of the memorialist ought to be granted; and they report a bill accordingly.

Mr. HAIGHT. I hold in my hand a letter from the Navy Department relating to the case of Captain Armstrong, and I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS,
WASHINGTON, D. C. February 10, 1868.

SIR: In response to your inquiry of the 8th instant, regarding the memorial of Captain James F. Armstrong to be restored to the active list, I have to say that Captain Armstrong during the three years he has been in command of the navy-yard at Pensacola, Florida—which yard has been under the supervision of this bureau—has conducted his duties with entire satisfaction to the bureau.

I consider him an intelligent and competent officer, and, as far as I know, of irreproachable character during his service in that command.

I learn from other officers that Captain Armstrong bears the character I give him generally with them during the period of his command. His antecedents, as to his retirement, I have no knowledge of.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH SMITH, Chief of Bureau.
Hon. CHARLES HAIGHT, M. C., Washington.

Mr. HAIGHT. I have also a number of letters from those familiar with Captain Armstrong's conduct and course since he has been in command of the navy-yard at Pensacola; and I will also state that while this memorial has been under consideration in the committee, a number of naval officers have been consulted in regard to the propriety of the measure now proposed, and they have unanimously expressed the opinion that the resolution ought to pass.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN COVINGTON, KENTUCKY.

Mr. JONES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1159) to erect United States court rooms, post office, and internal revenue offices in the city of Covington, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

GEORGE LYNCH.

Mr. MULLINS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812, reported back, without amendment, a bill (S. No. 320) entitled "An act for the relief of George Lynch, a soldier of the war of 1812."

The bill, which was read, proposes to allow to George Lynch, a soldier of the war of 1812, a pension at the rate of twenty dollars per month, in lieu of the pension of eight dollars per month now received by him, to commence from the passage of this act and to continue during his natural life.

Mr. MULLINS. The claimant in this case asks at the hands of the Government an increase of the pension which he has been receiving. He served faithfully during the war of 1812, and while in service, being exposed to severe cold, he was frost-bitten, and in consequence his feet were partially amputated. Being incapacitated for gaining his own support by his labor, he is now at the Soldier's Home, remote from his friends, receiving a pension of eight dollars per month. Having served the country faithfully in his manhood, he now, in his hour of age and distress, asks relief from the country for which he sacrificed his strength. Your committee believe the country ought to reward him according to his prayer.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MULLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN WELSH.

Mr. PRICE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported adversely upon the petition for an increase of the pension of John Welch; which was laid on the table.

CLARK COUNTY, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. FLANDERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1160) to enable the county of Clark, in the Territory of Washington, to provide a fund for extinguishing the indebtedness of said county; which was read a first and second time, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Territories.

PENSIONS.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions being called for reports of a private nature,

Mr. PERHAM said: As much of the private business of our committee will depend upon the action of the House on a general bill which we are ready to report, I ask unanimous consent to report that bill at this time.

There being no objection,

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions.

The bill provides, in the first section, that the laws granting pensions to the hereinafter mentioned dependent relatives of deceased soldiers leaving neither widow or child entitled to pension under existing laws, shall be so construed as to give precedence to such relatives in the following order, namely: first, mothers; secondly, fathers; thirdly, orphan brothers and sisters, who shall be pensioned jointly if there be more than one. It is provided that if in any case the soldier shall have left both father and mother who were dependent upon him, then on the death of the mother the father shall become entitled to a pension, commencing from and after the death of the mother. No pension heretofore awarded is to be affected by anything herein contained.

The second section proposes to enact that the act entitled "An act to grant pensions," approved July 14, 1862, and the acts supplementary thereto or amendatory thereof, shall not be construed to authorize the allowance of a pension, or to confer a right thereto by reason of a disability incurred or disease contracted after the 1st day of January, 1863, or death resulting therefrom, but the laws in force prior to the said act of July 14, 1862, shall, except as to the rate of pension, alone govern in the adjudication of all claims which have been or shall hereafter be made to a pension by reason of a disease contracted, a disability incurred, or a casualty occurring on or after the said 1st day of January, 1868, in the military or naval service of the United States, or death resulting therefrom.

The third section provides that so much of the acts approved April 6, 1838, and August 23, 1842, as requires that pensions remaining unclaimed for fourteen months after the same have become due shall be adjusted at the office of the Third Auditor be repealed; and the failure of any pensioner to claim his or her pension for a period of two years after the same shall have become due shall be deemed presumptive evidence that such pension has legally terminated by reason of the pensioner's death, remarriage, recovery from disability, or otherwise, and the pensioner's name shall be stricken from the rolls, subject to the right of restoration to the same on a new application, with evidence satisfactorily accounting for the failure to claim such pension.

It is provided in the fourth section that if any officer, soldier, seaman, or enlisted man has died since the 4th day of March, 1861, or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow entitled to a pension, and a child or children under sixteen years of age by a former wife, each of said children shall be entitled to receive two dollars per month, to commence from the death of their father and continue until they severally attain the age of sixteen years, to be paid to the guardian of such child or children for their use and benefit. But in all cases where such widow is charged with the care, custody, and maintenance of such child or children, the said sum of two dollars per month for each of said children shall be paid to her for and during the time she is or may have been so charged with the care, custody, and maintenance of such child or children, subject to the same conditions, provisions, and limitations as if they were her own children by her deceased husband.

The fifth section proposes to enact that all pensions which have been granted in consequence of death occurring or disease contracted, or wounds received, since the 4th day of March, 1861, or may hereafter be granted, shall commence from the discharge or from the death of the person on whose account the pension has been, or may hereafter be, granted, provided that the application for such pension has been, or shall hereafter be, filed with the Commissioner of Pensions within five years after the right thereto shall have accrued.

The sixth section provides that immediately upon the passage of this act, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, without awaiting application, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to notify by letter all pensioners entitled to the benefits of the provisions of the foregoing section, of the amount to which they may be entitled, and to pay, or cause to be paid to them respectively, all such arrears of pensions as may be due under the provisions of the foregoing section. And no claim agent or other person is to be entitled to receive any compensation for services in making application for the arrears of pension under this and the preceding section.

It is provided in the seventh section that section eleven of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June 6, 1866, be amended so as to read as follows: "That if any officer, soldier, or seaman shall have died of wounds received or of disease contracted in the line of duty in the military or naval service of the United States, leaving a widow and a child or children under the age of sixteen years, and it shall be duly certified under seal, by any court having probate jurisdiction, that satisfactory evidence has been produced before such court that the widow aforesaid has abandoned the care of such child or children, or is an unsuitable person, by reason of immoral conduct, to have the custody of the same, or on presentation of satisfactory evidence to the Commissioner of Pensions, then no pension shall be allowed to such widow until said minor child or children shall have become sixteen years of age, any previous enactment to the contrary notwithstanding; and the minor child or children aforesaid shall be pensioned in the same manner as if no widow had survived the said officer, soldier, or seaman, and such pension may be paid to the regularly authorized guardian of such minor or minors."

The eighth section provides that section six of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June 6, 1866, be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows: "That if any person entitled to a pension has died since March 4, 1861, or shall hereafter die while an application for such pension is pending, and after the proof has been completed, leaving no widow and no minor child under sixteen years of age, his or her heirs or legal representatives shall be entitled to receive the accrued pension to which the applicant would have been entitled had the certificate been issued before his or her death."

It is provided in section nine that the remarriage of any widow or dependent mother otherwise entitled to a pension prior to the application therefor, or to the issue of a pension certificate to her, shall not debar her right to a pension for the period elapsing from the death of her husband or son, on account of whose services and death she may claim a pension, to her remarriage. But nothing in this section is to be construed to repeal or modify the fourth section of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts granting pensions," approved March 3, 1865.

The tenth section enacts that the provisions of the ninth section of an act approved July 4, 1864, entitled "An act supplementary to an act to grant pensions," be hereby continued in force for five years from the 4th day of July, 1867.

The eleventh section proposes to repeal all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the foregoing provisions of this act.

Mr. PERHAM. On behalf of the committee, I move to amend by striking out in the fourth line of the first section the word "soldiers," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "persons," so that the phrase will read "dependent relatives of deceased persons."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERHAM. I also move to amend by inserting after section ten, the following as a new section:

That section one of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June 6, 1866, shall be so construed as to secure to every person entitled by law before the passage of said act to a less pension than twenty-five dollars per month, who while on military or naval service and in the line of duty, having one eye, shall have lost the same, a pension of twenty-five dollars per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERHAM. I presume there will be no objection to any of the provisions of this bill if they are fully understood; and perhaps the shortest method of disposing of the question will be for me briefly to explain those provisions.

Mr. PETERS. I desire to suggest an amendment which I think ought to be made. The bill now provides in the first section:

That if, in any case, the soldier shall have left both father and mother who were dependent upon him, then on the death of the mother the father shall become entitled to a pension, commencing from and after the death of the mother.

I suggest the propriety of extending this provision to dependent brothers and sisters. I understand that this was included in the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions, but it has been omitted in the bill. Will the gentleman allow such an amendment to be offered?

Mr. PERHAM. Mr. Speaker, as to that I will say that the committee have considered that proposition two or three times, and we think that we have extended that provision about as far as we think the House would like to extend it. But I do not know there would be any especial objection to allowing the gentleman to offer his amendment.

Mr. PETERS. There are cases where the preceding parties are dead and the soldier leaves dependent minor brothers and sisters. I know of such a case, where the preceding parties died immediately after the soldier, and did not live long enough to obtain a pension, leaving dependent minor brothers and sisters of the soldier.

Mr. PERHAM. I will yield to allow the amendment to be offered.

Mr. PETERS. I will draw the amendment and offer it hereafter. It is to provide, after the death of the father and mother, for the dependent minor brothers and sisters under sixteen years of age.

Mr. UPSON. The same amendment which the gentleman moved to the first section, line four, should be made in line ten.

Mr. PERHAM. It was overlooked. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERHAM. Mr. Speaker, the first section of this bill simply defines the order in which pensions are to be granted.

The second section limits the pension to disease contracted in time of war. It will be understood that prior to the war all our laws granting pensions applied to wounds received and disease contracted during a time of war and not a time of peace. This places the law, so far as that is concerned, back to where it was, confining the right to a pension to such cases as occurred during a time of war.

The third section refers to unclaimed pensions. Gentlemen well know that, as the law now is, if a pension is not claimed within fourteen months of the time when it is due, it goes to the Third Auditor's office, and the party who has not done so and who is entitled to it must go there and through a long process to secure what is due to him. This gives it to the present Pension Bureau, and it provides when he shall make the proper proof he shall receive it through the regular pension agents just as they now receive their pension money.

The fourth section relates to the children of a deceased soldier by a former wife, and enables the widow to draw for them as well as for her own children. By the present law the widow is entitled to draw the pension of two dollars a month for each minor child, but not for the children which the deceased soldier may have had by a former wife. This extends it to those children.

The next section relates to arrears of pension. Almost every member knows that the invalid must make application within one year after the time of his discharge, in order to secure his pension from the date of his discharge. The provision of the law also is that those who apply as dependent mothers or minor children must make their application within three years, in order to have their pension date from the decease of the officer or soldier from whom they derive their right to a pension. This extends it for five years. It has been found that for many reasons persons entitled to pensions have delayed making their application for pension beyond the time provided in the present law, and their pensions date only from the date of the application.

Mr. UPSON. Does this section refer to pensions already granted? If so, can the gentleman state what will be the probable cost?

Mr. PERHAM. This section, as I have said already, provides for arrears of pensions. The next section provides in all these cases it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to examine the applications; and it further provides that in those granted the money shall be paid through the regular pension agencies.

In regard to the expense, the amount that it will take to pay these arrears of pensions, the committee have been unable to get definite information. It is believed at the pension department that the sum would not be very large, although the exact information cannot well be given at the present time; I would say, in regard to this matter, that there are now pending before the Pension Committee from sixty to eighty cases of this kind; persons who from various causes failed to make their applications within the time provided by law. Many of these are from Tennessee and the border States, where there was such confusion at the time that the parties were unable to make application as they should have done within the time prescribed.

There are many other instances in which persons were missing during the war and their friends were hoping against hope that they would finally return until the time expired within which the applications should have been made. In many cases the application was properly made by the applicant himself, but through some error in the mail or some fault on the part of the agent who did the business, the papers were not received at the proper time. Nearly all these cases we find upon examination were of such a character that we cannot properly reject them. We believe, therefore, whatever may be the expense—and we think it cannot be large—we cannot properly refuse pensions of that character.

The next section provides that in certain cases in which the mothers of the children of deceased soldiers may abandon their care, or from any cause may become unfit to have the custody of the children, application may be made to the probate court or the court having probate jurisdiction in the place where they reside, and a certificate that such a mother has become unfit to have the charge of the children be made to the Commissioner of Pensions, the pension may be issued to the guardian.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand the effect of the provision to be to take away the pension from the widow in this case?

Mr. PERHAM. Yes, sir; it goes through the guardian to the child.

Mr. MILLER. It gives the allowance to the child. It does not affect the pension of the widow.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me it does take away the pension from the widow which the law gives her, as well as the two dollars a month to the child. I ask the gentleman to allow the section to be read again.

Mr. PERHAM. The morning hour has nearly expired, and I desire to have the previous question seconded.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was on the amendment of Mr. PETERS, as follows:

In the first section after the word "mother" add the following:

And upon the death of the mother and father the dependent brothers and sisters under sixteen years of age shall become entitled to a pension, commencing from and after the death of the party who, preceding them, would have been entitled to the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that that would not limit the pension to sixteen years of age.

Mr. PERHAM. "Sixteen years of age" applies of course to the children only.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me to be defective.

Mr. PETERS. I see no trouble about it. It applies to the children.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is very clear that the limitation ought to be until they attain the age of sixteen years respectively. And the word "jointly" ought also to be inserted, because otherwise each one of the children would be entitled to the pension.

Mr. PETERS. That is regulated by another provision. I will, however, modify my amendment to meet the gentleman's objection.

The amendment, as modified, was read, as follows:

And upon the death of the mother and father the dependent brothers and sisters under sixteen years of age shall jointly become entitled to a pension until they attain the age of sixteen years respectively, commencing from and after the death of the party who, preceding them, would be entitled to the same.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HARDING. Does this bill provide for the payment to those soldiers who were killed by collision of cars?

Mr. PERHAM. It does not.

The bill was passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that that body had agreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1117) to supply partial deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1868.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 188) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of inhabitants of cities and towns on the public lands," approved March 2, 1867.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 190) to further provide for giving effect to various grants of public land in the State of Nevada.

The message further announced that the Senate had directed the return to the House, in compliance with its request, of the act (H. R. No. 44) to change the name of the ship Golconda.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 381) to extend the time for completing the military road authorized by an act entitled "An act granting lands to the States of Michigan and Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a military road from Fort Wilkins, Copper Harbor, Keewenaw county, in the State of Michigan, to Fort Howard, Green Bay, in the State of Wisconsin;" when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Colonel WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Private Secretary, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 786) declaring St. George, Boothbay, Bucksport, Vinalhaven, and North Haven, in the State of Maine, and San Antonio, in the State of Texas, ports of entry; and A joint resolution (H. R. No. 279) in relation to the breakwater at Portland, Maine.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill (S. No. 180) relating to contracts payable in coin, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

It further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to House bill No. 1039, to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress, agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed as the managers of said conference on its part Mr. TRUMBULL, Mr. DRAKE, and Mr. WILSON.

LANDS IN MEMONONEE RIVER.

Mr. SCHENCK obtained the floor. Mr. DRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield to me to introduce a bill for reference?

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. As my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means objects, I cannot yield.

Mr. DRIGGS. Why, the gentleman stated to me positively a few moments since that he would yield.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will not yield.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman thinks I am treating him in any way unfairly he shall have the opportunity, but I give notice to the twelve or fifteen other gentlemen who are asking me to yield that I will yield no further.

Mr. DRIGGS then, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1161) to authorize front proprietors on the Memomonee river in Michigan and Wisconsin, as riparian owners, to have surveyed and to enter the fast lands in said river; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider the various votes by which bills have been referred this morning; and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the internal tax bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The pending section was section six, which had been amended to read as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have power to appoint and remove all collectors, assessors, assistant assessors, supervisors of internal revenue, gaugers, storekeepers, and other officers and clerks employed in the internal revenue service, except as otherwise provided for in this act.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last night the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] had offered an amendment, but as it was not reduced to writing, and he is not in his seat, it cannot be entertained.

Mr. WOOD. I move to amend the section by inserting after the words "internal revenue," in the second line, the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Representative in Congress from the district in which the duty is performed."

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in good faith. I think that it would be wrong in principle and injurious in practice for Congress to confer upon this officer the sole and individual authority which this bill would confer upon him. He should be responsible to some power. If Congress thinks it should not be to the Secretary of the Treasury, nor to the President of the United States, nor to the Senate of the United States, why, then, I think that the members of this House are quite well qualified to exert a check over the exercise of this vast patronage that we propose to confer upon him. Therefore it is that I would like to see the Commissioner required to consult the member of the House of Representatives, without reference to his political position, representing the district in Congress in which the particular officer is to discharge his duties, so that he shall not be able to change the collector at his pleasure in your district or in my district without our consent, and so that he shall not use this power of changing these officers either for or against any political party or any candidate for election to Congress against the wishes and interests of the Representative in Congress, who, it is to be presumed, knows the wants of the people and knows the people of the district better than any officer whom the Commissioner of Internal Revenue might appoint. Therefore, I repeat that this amendment is offered in good faith, for the purpose of holding a check and control over the Commissioner, that the Representative in Congress shall be consulted, and that no removal or appointment shall be made unless his consent shall first be obtained.

Mr. WARD. I rise to oppose the amendment. I do so for the purpose of submitting a few observations of a general character upon this section. It will be seen that this section confers upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, when he shall have been constituted the head of a department of this Government, the sole and absolute power to appoint every revenue officer in this country. I submit that it is contrary to the genius and spirit of all our institutions and form of government—a Government of checks and balances; and when it is plainly intended, as evidenced by the Constitution itself, that a part of the legislative department of this Government shall be consulted in all appointments to office of an important character, I insist that it is contrary to the design of the framers of the Constitution in fixing the appointing power to confer such absolute and imperial power upon any one man as it is proposed to confer by this section.

Mr. SCHENCK. I feel compelled to rise to a point of order, in order to confine the debate within proper limits. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] is now arguing the general merits of this section. The proposition of the colleague of the gentleman is to provide that the Representative of the district shall be consulted or advised in regard to appointments. I hope the debate will be confined to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules upon the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that it is competent to state, as reasons why the pending amendment should not be adopted, that the appointments should be made in some other way. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] will proceed.

Mr. WARD. I was about to state that, notwithstanding the objection I have to this general power being conferred upon any one person, if I could be assured that, in these days of degeneracy and public fraud and corruption, the present honest and, as I believe, incorruptible Commissioner could be retained in his position for any length of time, in my anxiety to secure some reforms in the Revenue Bureau I might be induced to go with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] for this bill, because I favor the general features of it.

But I ask the gentleman what assurance have we that, the moment Congress has adjourned, some other man whom we cannot trust, who will be the creature of the President, will not be appointed in place of the present Commissioner? What assurance have we that, when we have made this Commissioner the head of a distinct department of the Government, the President will not say that under the Constitution it is his right to nominate heads of departments, that we have legislated this Commissioner out of office by creating a new department of the Government, and that under the Constitution the President must nominate the head of this new department? And if the President shall make such nomination during the recess of the Senate, and shall commission such appointee under the Constitution, the commission to expire at the end of the next session of the Senate, what is to prevent that officer ad interim and de facto from turning out every assessor and collector, and every other revenue officer who is obnoxious to him on any account?

I tell the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] and this House that I sympathize cordially with the objects of this bill; that is, to throw some guards around the revenue so as to prevent the frauds now being perpetrated. But I protest against the passage of a bill that will put in the hands of the President and of the whisky ring that surrounds him the power to nullify your laws by filling these offices with his creatures.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the amendment by adding the words "and the Senators from that State." The proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] is that these appointments shall be made only upon the nomination or with the concurrence of the Representative of the district, as I heard it read.

Mr. WOOD. By and with the advice and consent of the Representative from the district.

Mr. SCHENCK. Substituting the advice and consent of the Representative from the district for the advice and consent of the Senate.

Well, sir, the proof of the pudding is in the eating. I find that in one of the districts of the State of New York, the ninth, I think it is, there are at present two officers, an assessor and a collector, both of whom have been reported, as I find from an investigation of the records, as persons who ought long since to have been removed. And I find that the facts, which appear to be established, in regard to the assessor are great inattention to his duty and a gross want of any effort on his part to suppress illicit distillation which is now flooding the New York market with fraud whisky.

In reference to the collector of that same district, I find that he is shown to be absolutely ignorant of the law and of his duty, and to manifest an entire incapacity to learn them; that he is allowing his office to be entirely controlled by corrupt subordinates who are in bad repute throughout the city.

I think these statements are substantially and very fully verified by documentary proofs on file in the Commissioner's office; and it is upon this account that the removal of these officers has been asked. Now, why are they kept in? I do not know whether the Representative of that district has anything to do with keeping them in; I apprehend not. But what then? If by his advice and consent good officers could be appointed, one would suppose that only with his advice and consent would those who are in be retained. However that may be, my illustration is designed to show that we cannot much rely upon the introduction of this new feature that the advice and consent of the Representative shall be obtained, for if Representatives were such potent and competent advisers as seems to be supposed, the probability is that the system would be working better even at this day. But instead of that, in this very ninth district of New York, from which comes the proposition that the Representative shall in all cases be consulted, the assessor and collector are both of such a character that they ought long ago to have been removed; and the Administration has been in fault in not removing them, for appeals have been made to it to do so.

I find that in the case of both the assessor and the collector the recommendation of the Commissioner is "under consideration," as was reported by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 14th day of February last. It thus appears that a demand made by the Commissioner months ago for the removal of these two men is yet being considered or thought upon. We are bound to believe that with such officers the Representative of the district has been making every effort to get them removed. If he has been, it only shows that to rely upon the Representative is not a good system; for all efforts which may have been made to that end have been unavailing.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to dispute the statements of the gentleman from Ohio; I have no doubt the facts are precisely as he has stated them to the House. But I submit that those statements are in no sense a reply to the grounds upon which I sustain this amendment. The gentleman states that certain officers in, I believe, the third district of New York, have been faithless to their duty; that the Commissioner has recommended their removal, and that they have not been removed. But he has not told us that the Representative from that district sustains those officers now holding their positions improperly. Now, in my judgment, if the Representative in Congress from that district, or any other district, had the responsibility resting upon him, the people of his district looking to him to correct any abuse upon the part of the collector or assessor, no Representative, under such a responsibility, would endeavor to maintain in office an improper official. Therefore it is that I want each of us to be responsible to the people of our districts for the character of the men who shall be appointed by this Commissioner; so that, under our responsibility to the people, we may be consulted as to proper appointments, and should an official be detected in fraud that our efforts for his removal may be effectual.

The remarks of the gentleman from Ohio do not reach the case as I have presented it. Until he can show an instance in which a Representative in Congress has assumed the responsibility of defending a dishonest official, he fails to meet the argument which I have advanced.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. Wood was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend this section by striking out in the third line the word "collector." This amendment will enable me to say what I desire to say.

Believing, as I do, that the action of the Committee of the Whole last night amounts in effect to an extinguishment of the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue—entertaining no doubt upon that point—I wish to state what will be the condition of things if this bill in this form should become a law. The moment this act goes into operation, that moment the whole six thousand of these officers, whose duties were enumerated last night, cease to exist. The Commissioner of the Internal Revenue ceases to exist. On the adoption of this section every officer of the internal revenue department ceases to exist.

This is no addition to the duties of the existing officer. It is the creation in the first section of a new department—the department of internal revenue is hereby established. At the end of this bill the law creating the present bureau is repealed, and with it goes down everything that is created by it. What is the condition of things? In the midst of a presidential canvass, in the heat and fever of that canvass, the whole internal revenue department of this Government is stricken down and every officer in it extinguished in a moment. We have to rely upon our success with the President and the Senate in creating a new department and in appointing the head of this department; and next, he has to create, by reappointment, every one of the six thousand officers who now discharge the several functions provided for in the internal revenue department. Every bond has to be re-executed and approved, and this least of all times, in the history of a four years' administration, can be done safely at its close.

I submit to the House that we ought to stop and pause and consider what are the matters with which we have to deal to accomplish the ends of the gentlemen from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] We are not to shut our eyes to the means in our power to have proper officers. I say to-day it is a serious question, with the appointing power as it is, to succeed in restoring the administration of the department of internal revenue to anything like efficiency and fidelity. Even now, with all the complications surrounding it in that department, deplorable as is its administration, difficult as it is and ruinous as it is in the country in its present condition, what will it be without any officer at its head, and the whole six thousand, at one fell swoop, ceasing to exist, and the department itself without officers to discharge any of its duties, and waiting upon the other end of the avenue for the supply of those who shall discharge the functions of these offices?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object to his withdrawing it.

The CHAIRMAN. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, when the Committee of Ways and Means undertook to revise the financial system of the country they were engaged in solemn questions of finance, and not considering a political problem. I have no hesitation in saying if I thought I belonged to a party whose interest or whose success was at variance with the general interests of the country I would not sustain it. I do not regard the interests of my party, I have never so regarded it, as separate and independent from the best interests of the country. On the other hand, whatever legislation, whatever public good we perform beneficial to the country, such confidence have I in the principles and integrity of my party that I am satisfied it will be benefited thereby. And I am sorry to hear gentlemen discuss questions so broad and sweeping in their influence from narrow, limited views of party good or party success.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman allude to the remarks I made? I had not the slightest reference to any good to my party.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am glad that I misapprehended the tone of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. DAWES. What I did say was that this internal revenue service will fall in consequence of the complications in which the administration of the Government happens to be involved at this moment. It will fall lifeless.

Mr. MAYNARD. If that is all the gentleman meant to say, I confess I overshot the mark. I imagined the gentleman was striking at something considerably beyond what he seems to have done.

It is easy to keep the present officials and the present machinery going until their places are supplied. It is so plain, so clear, so obvious that no gentleman can have any doubt or hesitation about it, that the present officers shall continue in office until supplanted by others. We do not propose an interregnum, but that the process of collection of the revenue shall go on until the new system goes into operation.

I referred yesterday to the organization of the Department of Agriculture. I might also refer to the organization of the Department of the Interior, which was made to embrace the operations of the Land Office, the Patent Office, and the Pension Office. Those offices did not stop for an instant, but went on precisely as before.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman will allow me one moment I will call his attention to a provision in the last section of the bill:

And provided further, That no office created by the said acts and continued by this act shall be vacated by reason of any provisions herein contained, but the officers heretofore appointed shall continue to hold the said offices without reappointment until their successors, or other officers to perform their duties, respectively, shall be appointed as provided in this act.

Mr. MAYNARD. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to that provision, which I suppose meets the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] as I understand it.

What I said with reference to the merely partisan or political effect, if not applicable to the spirit of the gentleman's remarks, does certainly apply to much that we have already heard. The patronage proposed to be conferred by this section upon the head of the department of internal revenue, gentlemen will please to remember, is not as extensive as that which is now bestowed on the Postmaster General, Secretary of the Treasury, and other heads of Departments.

By unanimous consent the amendment of Mr. DAWES was withdrawn.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to amend the pending section by inserting after the word "shall" in the second line the word "not," so that it will read, "the Commissioner shall not have power to appoint and remove all collectors," &c. I make this motion in order to be able to discuss this section in the broadest terms. My objection to the section is this: that the committee—and I am sorry I was not present so as to be able to record my vote against it—have determined to change the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and give the appointment to the President of the United States. Now, I am a little differently inclined in my mind from the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] I believe whatever will advance my party will advance the interests of the country, and I believe whatever will injure my party will injure the interests of the country. So that whenever you say to me that such a thing is going to aid the Republican party, I say that is the interest of the country, and vice versa. I have none of that mawkishness about it which some gentlemen seem to have whenever party is named. For if I believe anything that would hurt my party would hurt the country I will change the party.

Mr. WOOD. Do not come over on our side again. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I insist it is not a question of men, but a question of principle. You have agreed, as I understand it, to pass the first section. That being so, you have legislated, in my judgment, out of office the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I think that is the legal construction. There was a Bureau of Internal Revenue; you have repealed that bureau. There is to be a department of internal revenue; and you have established that department. The man at the head of that bureau cannot be by legislation thrust bodily into the department.

This question was discussed at great length in the debate of 1789. There it was held, without contradiction, that the head of a Department was not one of those inferior officers who could be established under an act of Congress, not appointable by the President, because all the heads of Departments were held to be the superior officers, on whom, under the Constitution, the President might call for written opinions, and it is wholly outside of the question whether they belong to what is now technically known as the Cabinet or not. That being so, you put a change of every officer in the power of the President of the United States; and whoever thinks that a good thing to be done in the face of a presidential election, where such great principles are involved as are involved in this one, him I have offended.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts can have no other object than to destroy the bill, unless he proposes to substitute something else. It is simply that none of these officers shall be appointed.

Mr. BLAINE. By the Commissioner.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then there is nobody who can appoint them.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, yes.

Mr. SCHENCK. The bill substitutes a new system for the present one, and it provides how these officers shall be appointed, and if we amend the bill so that it will stand with nothing in it except that the Commissioner shall not appoint these officers, taking away the appointment by anybody else, it occurs to me that the machinery is all destroyed.

Now, let me test the sincerity of these gentlemen. Where is the power of appointing these officers now? Gentlemen are very much afraid that they will fall into the hands of the Administration. Sir, I alluded to this last night, but now I will give you the figures; I will give you a list of the revenue officers who were on duty on the 26th day of May up to last week. There were two hundred and thirty-nine collectors and two hundred and thirty-one assessors, one collector being an acting appointment only, and nine assessors, but there should be two hundred and forty of each, making four hundred and eighty officers appointed by the President with the confirmation of the Senate, and having that check upon the appointments. But how many other officers are there under this old system to which gentlemen are so much wedded?

On the 26th of May there were two thousand six hundred and seventy-one of them, some of them with higher functions than any collector or assessor, all appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and being of this political character of which some gentlemen profess to be so afraid. What are they driving at? They want to remit us to the old system. Under that old system nearly five thousand officers—and the number exceeded five thousand on the 10th of April; we have got rid of five or six hundred by the passage of the manufacturers' bill—are appointed, without any check whatever, by the present head of the Treasury Department.

Mr. BLAINE. Why does not that secure the unity which the gentleman says is so desirable?

Mr. SCHENCK. For the simple reason that as the head of the Department he makes his appointments through the Commissioner, and throws the responsibility upon him—although the law gives it to the Secretary—and the President is referred to, whose influence seems to be such that even when the Secretary wants to get out an officer of whom he has himself the appointment he cannot do it, and only four hundred and eighty of these officers have to go before the Senate for confirmation.

Now, sir, if these gentlemen really wish to change the system proposed in this bill let them say so, and not merely destroy, but substitute something, propose something, or if they wish merely to express that they want to remit us to the present system and hold us to it, why let them say that. But when they do say that, I want the House and the country distinctly to understand what it is that they propose to do. They want us to keep up a system under which five thousand officers are appointed without the restraint of confirmation by the Senate in order to get rid of a little difficulty about four hundred and eighty that need confirmation.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts withdraw his amendment? I will renew it.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PETERS. I renew the amendment. I feel too much interested in this matter to allow it to pass without a single word. I gave no attention to this matter until yesterday, when it was under discussion before the Committee of the Whole. But I did look at it last night somewhat carefully, as I was deeply impressed by the debate of yesterday. I have no doubt, as a lawyer, that if the first and sixth sections of this bill shall be passed we will have legislated Commissioner Rollins out of office; and no man on earth will have the power to fill that place by making an appointment except the President of the United States. Now, I am opposed to that result. I am opposed to the first section of this bill. And, although the first opportunity has passed to destroy the first section, if we emasculate or destroy this sixth section, we will virtually meet and destroy the first section. Because if you pass the first section, and fail to pass the sixth section, then you will have the name of a department without having any substance at all, for there will be no power or authority connected with it. Now, I do not pretend to be a statesman, but merely a politician, a party man. And so far as possible I want to keep Mr. Rollins in his office; other gentlemen may be more patriotic than I am; I do not question that at all. But I concur with the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] in that respect.

The language of the Constitution is this:

"But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Thus the Constitution, by its express language, makes the head of a Department something above an "inferior officer." We can give the head of a Department the power to fill inferior offices. But who is to fill the office of head of Department itself? Why, sir, it seems to me that there would be just as much legal propriety in making the postmaster of the city of Washington the Postmaster General of the United States, as to undertake to expand the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with his present powers into the head of a department with those extended powers.

Now, even if we had the power to pass this bill and make it a law to the extent urged by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I do not see the expediency of doing so. I understand that the proposition is to reduce the tax on whisky to a very large extent. Will not that remove the temptation of which complaint is now made? I am surprised at the statement made on this floor by members, that the assessors and collectors in this country are mostly thieves. Why, sir, in the State of Maine all these officers are good and honorable men, although part of them are Johnson men. I know there are exceptions in New York, Philadelphia, and the other large cities. But if you take away the temptation to defraud by reducing the tax on whisky from two dollars to fifty or seventy-five cents per gallon, the principle motive for defrauding will be taken away.

I think we can stand the present system of collection much better than we can stand any other system got up in this hasty manner at this late day of the session. When, as the gentleman says may be the case, the tax on whisky is reduced to seventy-five or fifty cents per gallon, the necessity and motive for these first and sixth sections no longer exist. It does not matter whether these officers are appointed by Mr. Rollins or by the President or by someone else. If the temptation is removed I believe you can get good officers to collect your revenues. But I think, with the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. Poland,] that men must be as pure as the angels before you can collect a tax of two dollars a gallon on whisky.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Rollins, would be deceived, as would anybody else, in respect to some officers. Let the awful temptation to defraud be removed by reducing the tax from two dollars to fifty cents per gallon on distilled spirits, and no longer adhere to a rate of taxation that furnishes two dollars to the thieves for every dollar that is obtained by the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Chairman, I cannot understand the argument which is made against this provision of the bill; nor could I understand the argument made yesterday against the first section. So far as I am concerned, it is not my object to make this proposed department a political machine, nor do I believe the committee had any such object in view. What I desire is the same that other gentlemen here have expressed themselves as desiring, to adopt such a measure as will make some person responsible to the country for the collection of its revenues. Now, the argument that the proposition embraced in this bill would put the appointing power into the hands of the President amounts to nothing. The President to-day has the authority to appoint every collector and assessor within the United States. How, then, can this bill give him more power in this respect than he already possesses?

If, therefore, gentlemen desire to have a system under which our revenues shall be collected, let them, as is well suggested by the chairman of the committee, propose some method of confining this matter within proper limits. Instead of attempting to destroy the vitality of this section of the bill, why do they not propose to provide that these persons shall be appointed by the advice and consent of the Senate, if they do not want one man to have all this power? But, sir, that is not the object. It is mere political clap-trap to talk about this bill throwing power into the hands of the President, when it is there already by existing laws.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETERS. Does the gentleman bear in mind that the President cannot remove an assessor or a collector without the consent of the Senate?

Mr. LOGAN. I do. But he can suspend such officers. We know that the President did remove Mr. Stanton, and Mr. Stanton is out of office. The President can remove your assessors and collectors just as he removed the head of the War Department, and you have no power to prevent it.

Mr. PETERS. We can impeach him.

Mr. LOGAN. You cannot impeach and convict him. You have tried impeachment and you have failed, on the very principle that gentlemen are now advocating here before the House.

Now, sir, I take it to be important that we should place the responsibility somewhere. Then let us not destroy the vital features of this bill, but if necessary amend it so that while the power and responsibility may rest in some proper quarter there may be sufficient checks and restrictions. But, so far as regards the political operation of this measure, even supposing it should result in placing power in the hands of the President, that power is there now. If the power should be put into the hands of Mr. Rollins it would certainly be in better hands. So, in whatever way we may take this measure, the operation must be better than that of the present system. How is it that we now have thousands of officers called "inspectors," roaming all over the country, subject to no check, blackmailing everybody, and robbing the country of its revenues? Under the existing law the Secretary of the Treasury has the right to appoint these officers, the Senate having no voice in regard to their appointment or removal. We are attempting by this bill to get rid of these officers; yet we find our own friends attacking a proposition that will rid the country of these men who are now biting every vein through which the revenues of the country should flow into the Treasury. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PETERS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BECK. I move to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause of this section, and inserting the following:

That all collectors, assessors, assistant assessors, supervisors of internal revenue, inspectors, gaugers, storekeepers, and other officers and clerks, provided for in this act, shall be appointed and removed in the mode and on the terms specified in the bill reported to this House by the Committee on Retrenchment, on the 14th day of May last, entitled a bill to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof, which bill is made a part of this section.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment merely for the purpose of calling attention to the bill reported the other day by the distinguished gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. Jenckes,] providing for appointments in the civil service, in a mode less objectionable, perhaps, than any other. I would like the House to consider whether such a measure as that will not obviate all the difficulties of which gentlemen on all sides have spoken. I will not take time to read the bill or to discuss its provisions, but merely to call the attention of the House to them. That bill will be up in a day or two, reported by the chairman of the Committee on Retrenchment, and will in all probability pass. It will furnish solutions for the difficulties surrounding this section. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I object, as I wish to obtain a little information from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I wish the chairman to point out that provision of the bill which continues in office any of the present officers if the bill should pass.

Mr. SCHENCK. I refer to the words "continued by this act."

Mr. DAWES. My eye was upon that. That provides when it is created by this act it shall continue by this act. What is the provision of this act which continues any of these officers? That is what I wish to know. I did not know but there was some provision. The creation of a new office with the same name of an officer with different duties, he now holding a different tenure in the Treasury Department, would hardly be continuing that officer. What

I wish to know is, whether there is any provision to continue any of these men in these offices? I supposed by the phraseology of this section to which the chairman of the committee called our attention a moment ago, that there was some provision continuing these bureau officers until you organized the new department you create. If it relies only on implication that this bureau officer, because he has the same name, will be continued in the office—

Mr. SCHENCK. If there be any insufficiency in the language the gentleman had better be prepared with an amendment when we come to that section. It is not quite in order now to discuss it.

Mr. DAWES. I was discussing it in view of the proposition made to strike out this sixth section. I find no section contravening what I have stated.

Mr. SCHENCK. We have assessors and collectors under the present law, and we provide for the same class of officers under this bill.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to know whether the gentleman relies solely upon the fact that this bill calls upon this officer with a new name, with another tenure of office, to discharge other duties; whether that is all he relies upon for the continuance of that officer in office? If that is so, then I still insist on it the moment this becomes a law down goes every officer.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move, in line three of this section, to strike out the words "assessors and collectors."

Mr. Chairman, just before the adjournment last evening I offered an amendment which had the same object in view as this, but it was misunderstood at the time. It had for its object to leave the appointment and removal, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of all collectors and assessors to the President. If this new system, devised by the Committee of Ways and Means, shall go into effect, and we leave the appointment of all officers inferior to collectors and assessors in the hands of the head of this new department, I ask the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee whether that is not a fair compromise? There are those who do not believe that Congress has the power to create a new department and to appoint a head for that department. None of us doubt the power to create a department, but many doubt the power of Congress to indicate, either by its individual or official name, the person who is to be at the head of it. I should like the chairman to state the difference between naming the messenger of this bureau for this new department and naming the Commissioner. There is no difference. If you can name the present Commissioner you can just as well name the messenger of the bureau for head of this new department. If you have the power to name the one you have the power to name the other. But, sir, I believe we have no such power. Assuming this department is to be inaugurated, it is not my desire, nor does the amendment I propose come into conflict with it. Let us establish the department, as provided by the first section, but do not confer upon the head of it unconstitutional authority. Reserve to the President the power to appoint collectors and assessors, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and reserve to the head of the department the appointment of the inferior officers. Then there will be in that regard no conflict.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I shall ask a vote upon striking out "assessors and collectors."

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Chairman, nothing seems to me plainer than that a head of a Department is not and cannot be made an inferior officer. In other words, he cannot be made an officer who can be created or endowed with office without an appointment by the President with the assent of the Senate. That, to my mind, is absolutely and conclusively shown by the clause of the Constitution which has been cited here to-day, which is as follows:

"But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they may think proper in the President alone, or in the courts of law, or in the head of a Department."

Now, the connection in which that clause of the Constitution occurs is one in which inferior officers are spoken of in apposition to or conjunction with these heads of Departments as distinguishable from inferior officers. Therefore, you cannot make the heads of Departments inferior officers. That, I doubt not, will be assented to by everybody. I do not think there is any difference on that point. They are not inferior officers, but must be created by appointment by the President with the consent of the Senate. That is the first suggestion I desire to make.

Now, what follows from this that relates to the matter under consideration? Why, sir, this: that you cannot expand—to adopt the language that has been used in this debate—a man who may by legislation be an inferior officer into one of those officers that must be created by the President, with the consent of the Senate. Why? Because the Constitution cannot be evaded or avoided by such indirection. The Constitution meant, for example—considering now the case of the head of a Department, that is, a man who is required by another clause of the Constitution to submit in writing his opinion touching public affairs to the President—the Constitution meant that when the Senate acted upon that man's case he should be nominated to the Senate for the very office and the very duties which it was proposed he should discharge. Would it not be queer that Mr. Rollins, presented to the Senate for the purpose of being made Commissioner of Internal Revenue, should, by mere legislation, be expanded up, without the leave of the Senate, into an officer as to whose fitness the Senate never judged? Clearly that cannot be. Every lawyer, every member of the House, will at once assent that we cannot make Mr. Rollins into the head of a Department. That is, because the head of a Department is a constitutional officer, as to whose fitness to be such head the Senate must be consulted.

[Here the hammer fell; but by unanimous consent the gentleman was allowed to proceed.]

Now, if I am right thus far, what follows? I have concluded in my own mind that we cannot change Mr. Rollins into the head of a department; that the office becomes vacant and the appointee of the President must go in. What then follows? Why, sir, that by this sixth section you have in the first place got into office a man of whose character we can judge from the fact that he must be appointed by the President. What then? Why, sir, that by the sixth section you repeal and strike down whatever virtue the late action of the Senate may have left from the tenure-of-office law, and you expressly authorize that man to do what you may legally authorize him to do—remove every officer under this head of the department without the assent of the Senate. You repeal the tenure-of-office law; and you do more. You fly in the teeth, it seems to me, not perhaps of the letter of the Constitution, but of its spirit, by doing what? By authorizing the head of the department to create every collector and assessor in America. They may be by legislation made inferior officers. I do not deny that, but I think it would be unwise to make them such. I think the first legislation we had upon this subject, in which it was required that the Senate should assent to their creation, was wise, and I pray the House to hesitate; I pray you, my brother members, to hesitate before you give the creation of officers of the importance and power and responsibility and numbers in which exist and are there assessors and collectors all through our country, to any one man. Let the Senate retain, as it has now, its supervision over these important officers. I therefore hope that this feature of the bill will not finally receive the approval of the House.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to know what is the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] to strike out the words "collectors, assessors," in line three.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I believe debate is exhausted on that amendment unless the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I withdraw it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the word "assessors."

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the House has already perpetrated an unconstitutional act by attempting to appoint a head of this department; if such be the fact, I suppose that this bill creates a head of department.

Mr. Chairman, I find myself unable to go on, and I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. What is now the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The only motion pending is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] to strike out the section, and upon that debate is exhausted. Amendments are still in order to perfect the section.

Mr. BUTLER. I move, then, to strike out the words, "collectors, assessors." I desire to answer one or two suggestions made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He says, first, that they do not make a new department, because they continue an office—the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Now, what does he mean by the word "office?" The building, the place? No. Does he mean the position? Yes. Then he makes that position that is now a bureau into a department.

Then, sir, I was sorry to hear my friend inadvertently say that "if we were sincere in our opposition" we should do so and so. I know he is sincere, and I trust he will believe we are. The difficulty we find is this, that if we make this section a law, then these four hundred and eighty officers are in the hands of the President, which are not now in his hands. The gentleman says he can appoint them now, but he cannot get them out of office except—by what means? The law says that he can suspend them, as he claims, indefinitely and at his pleasure. That he claims a constitutional right to do, and that nineteen men in the Senate said that he had a constitutional right to do. But I do not believe, sir, that he dare exercise it in regard to this large class of officers. I think there is not money enough in the whisky ring to buy an acquittal in an impeachment for that wholesale exercise of power.

Mr. MULLINS. Oh, you are mightily mistaken.

Mr. BUTLER. But, sir, there is another difficulty about all this, and that is, that the ability to use that power, without using it, creates in the President or in his appointee under this bill a patronage and strength which no party ever yet withstood, and I am afraid no party ever can withstand. In repealing the tenure-of-office act you put into the hands of his appointee the life and death of every revenue officer in every district of the United States, and from that hour that revenue officer becomes, not the servant of the people, but the bond servant of the President of the United States. I trust we shall not do that thing. It seems to me to be an unwise, a strange conclusion. I cannot vote for any act where I can see that we are evading a provision of the Constitution, or apparently attempting to evade it.

I hope this section will be stricken out. The objection is made that if that is done we will not leave the power anywhere to make these appointments, we will leave the officers just where they are now, in the hands of the Senate, with whatever negative power they may have left to themselves. If they have none left, then we are no worse off than we will be under this bill. If they have any left, then we will have so much in our favor by keeping the matter where it is now.

Mr. SCHENCK. If gentlemen wish to aid in perfecting this bill, and do not desire to destroy it, if they are satisfied to reserve certain features of the present existing system instead of adopting the system which has been proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means to secure the faithful collection of the revenue, then, I ask, why do they not propose some amendment to accomplish that purpose?

I have already fully explained that when the Committee of Ways and Means had their attention called to this matter they felt that there must be some security given beyond what we have now for obtaining good officers to collect the revenue. One idea was that perhaps it would be well to require the confirmation by the Senate of all the subordinate officers as well as the assessors and collectors. But when we considered how that plan had failed, as a general thing, to give us good assessors and collectors, we did not feel like extending such cumbrous machinery, especially as the Senate were in the habit of retaining appointments for months and months without acting upon them.

Another system was to adopt the principle of the bill proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] the civil-service bill. But we did not see how we could incorporate that with all its machinery in one special department. But no one more than I would hail with satisfaction the passage of that bill as a general system. If it were passed it would relieve us from all the difficulties in which we now seem to be involved here. But if that was not adopted, what then remained? Why, as I explained in the commencement of the discussion of this bill, a system of appointment which should concentrate the power and responsibility in one head, who should be held accountable to the country. If gentlemen desire that the present condition of things shall be continued, so far as assessors and collectors are concerned, and that they shall be confirmed by the Senate, but are willing that other appointments shall be made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, then let them say so, and say it a little more distinctly than the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUD] says it by his amendment. Let them provide not only who shall appoint the assistant assessors, deputy collectors, and other officers, but also who shall appoint the assessors and collectors.

The Committee of Ways and Means have proposed a system substituting another plan for the present plan under existing law. But the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, unless it is made to go further than he now proposes, would leave these officers without any provision whatever.

I have before adverted to the inconsistency of these gentlemen. They say there are four hundred and eighty assessors and collectors; and a great outcry is made by gentlemen against this new and horrible departure from the old and settled condition of things, by which we propose to lodge in the head of a department the power to appoint these various officers. Why say assessors and collectors only? Why not go further and not only stick to the old system but extend it?

There are revenue agents, revenue inspectors, special agents, three hundred and thirty-two of them, with larger powers than any collector or assessor possesses. Yet they are all now appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, without the intervention of the Senate. Then there are the assistant assessors and collectors, inspectors of spirits, inspectors of tobacco, inspectors of coal oil, &c., forty-three hundred and thirty-two in number, making in all forty-six hundred and seventy-one officers appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, without the voice of the Senate. The Secretary of the Treasury holds his office from the President, and whether Mr. Rollins be continued, or some other person appointed at the head of the department of internal revenue, if you create such a department, he can do no more than hold his office from the President. Where, then, is the distinction about which gentlemen talk so much? Admit what they say; admit, which I do not, that by the first section of this bill you would legislate the present Commissioner out of office; take them upon their own ground. What then? You have in either case a head of a department holding his office by appointment from the President of the United States. The only difference between the old system and the new is that the old system required the confirmation by the Senate of two classes of officers amounting in all to four hundred and eighty, while it left more than five thousand to be appointed by the head of the Department alone.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KNOTT obtained the floor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Knott] will yield to me a moment, I would like to make a brief reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Schenck,] who has alluded to me and my proposition.

Mr. KNOTT. As I have but five minutes, the gentleman must excuse me.

I move to amend by adding at the end of the section the following:

Provided, That no assessor or collector shall be removed from office by the Commissioner except for incompetency, misfeasance, or non-feasance in office, or conviction of bribery, perjury, forgery, or felony at common law: And provided further, That whenever any assessor or collector shall be removed from office by the Commissioner under the provision of this act, the Commissioner shall immediately file with the Secretary of the Treasury a statement in writing of the cause of such removal, and if any assessor or collector shall be removed from office on any other grounds than those mentioned in the first proviso to this section, or if the grounds of such removal shall be in fact untrue, the Commissioner shall be removed from office therefor.

Mr. Chairman, I know very little about the character, private or official, of those who are engaged in the assessment and collection of our internal revenue. I am acquainted with only two of these officers, the assessor and collector of my own district; and I am glad to say that, so far as I know, they are not only honorable gentlemen, but competent and faithful officers. But, sir, the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has, on several occasions, exhibited to us most startling instances of peculation and fraud perpetrated in this branch of the public service; and, as a remedy for the enormous evils existing under the present system, he proposes that the responsibility for the character of the various officials shall be fixed upon some single person. To fix that responsibility he proposes by this bill to erect a new department, to be under the charge of a person who, as I understand the Constitution, must be a new officer. How or to whom this officer is to be held to greater responsibility than rests upon the present appointing power I have not yet seen. But one thing is clear: this bill proposes to confer upon this new officer, within his particular sphere, powers almost autocratic. By the breath of his nostrils he is to clothe with the habiliments of official power an army of subordinates, drawing from the public Treasury $6,000,000, and handling the public funds to the amount of $200,000,000. More than that, their official existence is to depend entirely upon his fiat. If a solitary one of them hesitates to "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee" at his simple nod; if a solitary one refuses to promote the personal aggrandizement of his chief, or to acquiesce in his political opinions, that chief has only to draw around him his imperial toga, wave his official truncheon, and exclaim, "Off with his head!" To whom is he responsible? No one.

What I propose is that if this tremendous power is to be placed in the hands of one man we shall, by the provisions of the law, make him feel, when he consigns one of his cringing subordinates to the political guillotine, that his own neck is liable to the constriction of the bowstring, if this subordinate is competent, is faithful, is free from any just charge against his official character or conduct. Justice to these subordinate officers requires that they should not be left without protection, subject to the solitary will of a single man.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Knott,] and to answer one proposition which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. Schenck] has repeated several times. He says that we who oppose the present scheme as exhibited in the first and the sixth sections of this bill ought to show something better, ought to present a plan for throwing proper guards around the collection of the revenue. Now, I submit that is hardly to be expected from a body as large as the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is enough if the Committee of the Whole are not willing to agree to the propositions of the Committee of Ways and Means that they say so by vote, and then ask the Committee of Ways and Means to perfect the bill in accordance with the vote of the Committee of the Whole. That, it seems to me, is a proper answer to my colleague.

I know too well the difficulties attendant upon a work of this kind to think that anybody may undertake in this House to perfect the details of a system while we sit in the Committee of the Whole House. It seems to me the best service we can render is to bring the House to a vote on this question of striking out the sixth section. If we strike it out the gentleman will admit that it strikes out the plan of making this a separate department. I made the motion last night for a test vote, and I have no doubt that it would have carried but for the fact that the House was thin. The first section was retained in the bill by a majority of only three votes. I believe that, the question having arisen again, we can show that the majority of the House is in favor of striking out the plan of the Committee of Ways and Means for the creation of a new and separate department of internal revenue. Therefore I hope we will be allowed to come to a vote, and with the consent of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee I will now move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate and coming to a vote on the motion to strike out. Of course I will not move it if the chairman does not consent. It seems to me that vote being taken will test the question. If the gentleman is sustained by the House it will be then our duty to sustain and perfect his plan. If the House does not sustain him, then we ought not to waste any more time in debate on this plan. I will say that is the whole purpose I have in view to get a vote on striking out this sixth section, so we may reconsider the vote taken last night as to whether we will consent to the adoption of a plan which makes a new department with the legal and constitutional difficulties now shown to be in the way, and clothes the head of that department with the tremendous power this section gives him. I will not make the motion if the chairman of Ways and Means does not consent.

The question was taken on Mr. Knott's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to assure the chairman of the committee, and the members of the committee who agree with me in my view of the case, that I will go heartily with them for its perfection at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The gentleman must offer an amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will do so. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee complains that I do not offer a system which would harmonize all difficulties.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must offer his amendment first.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to strike out these words:

That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have power to appoint and remove all collectors, assessors, assistant assessors, supervisors of internal revenue.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the President shall have the power to appoint and remove, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and not otherwise, all collectors and assessors; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have the sole power to appoint and remove all—

Then come the words which I leave in the section:

inspectors, gaugers, storekeepers, and other officers and clerks provided for in this act, who shall severally give bond for the faithful performance of their duties, as may be required by law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this will harmonize the conflicting views of those who do not concede the constitutional power of Congress to vest in the head of the new Department created by this bill the absolute power of appointment and removal of the entire revenue officers of the Government. My amendment reserves the appointment and removal of those officers I have indicated where they now are—in the hands of the President, under the restrictive clauses of the tenure-of-office act. For the purpose of concentrating power in a responsible head, which the chairman has so ably discussed, it confers power upon the Commissioner to appoint all the other inferior officers.

If this new department is to be created, it seems to me that this will obviate the difficulties which are now in the way, except one, and that is the right of Congress to transfer the Commissioner, now a bureau officer, to be head of the new department. I do not concede that power; but, it being conceded, my amendment leaves the appointment and removal of collectors and assessors, and the other officers I have named, just as they now are—in the hands of the President—and to give the power of appointment and removal of the other officers of the internal revenue to the Commissioner. I want a vote on the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to having the proposition voted on. I admit that it is practicable.

If the majority of the committee agree with him they will adopt it. I desire, however, to bring the committee at as early a moment as possible to a vote upon this section and the various amendments now pending, or that may hereafter be offered.

But before I make that motion I wish to ask the attention of the committee to one particular thing which shows the nature of this struggle which is going on. My colleague, who addressed the House a moment ago, [Mr. Garfield,] has defined his position and the position, of course, of those who agree with him; but it is a position in which I cannot stand with him. He is for striking out the whole section, in order, as he says, to retain this present system. I and the committee acting with me, after four or five months' patient research and examination into the condition of the whole question, have come to the conclusion that the present system is a failure, and have desired to substitute for it another. What the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ingersoll] proposes to insert is a sort of compromise by which we retain as much of the present system as embraces officers who now are required to have the confirmation of the Senate. Let them still be nominated by the President and be confirmed by the Senate, but give the appointment of the other officers whose appointment is at present in the Secretary of the Treasury to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. If we can get no more than that, I believe even that will be a great improvement upon the present system. If we could get more, and have a complete, undivided responsibility, I feel as sure as I do of anything in the world—and I have given the subject much careful study—that we would do still better.

My colleague on the committee [Mr. Logan] desires to offer an amendment, which he wishes to explain. I will move that the committee rise, with a view of terminating debate, notifying the committee that I shall move to terminate debate in five minutes after the House shall again go into the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDING. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. BLAINE, as Speaker pro tempore, having taken the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that when the House again resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole the debate on the sixth section of the bill and the pending amendments thereto be terminated in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the internal tax bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to amend the section by striking out the words "collectors, assessors;" so that it will read:

That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have power to appoint and remove all assistant assessors, supervisors of internal revenue, inspectors, gaugers, storekeepers, and other officers, &c.

Mr. HARDING. Will the gentleman answer me a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARDING. Whether that section is made for the purpose of retaining the present arrangement in reference to the collector at Peoria, Illinois?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Perhaps you had better address yourself to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is not in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer this amendment for the purpose of answering one or two remarks that have been made in reference to this particular section. I agree that the head of a Department is an officer appointed by the President of the United States. Nor will this provision take that appointment out of the hands of the President. That I understand to be a constitutional right. I so said yesterday, that this did not take the appointment from the President, nor can it.

Well, sir, believing that that objection that we are legislating a man into office when we have no power is obviated, what, then, is the objection? Is it that we are legislating a man out of office? That ought not to be an objection, inasmuch as the President has the power to-day to send the name of somebody else to the Senate for confirmation. And in a political point of view—for I always speak plainly—if it is in a political point of view that gentlemen are talking, then I say for one I would rather to-day the Opposition had the head of this department than for us to have it. And why? Because then the whole responsibility would be upon them, as it is now, except that they deny it and attempt to make us shoulder a part of it inasmuch as the Commissioner is of our political belief. I have as high a regard for Commissioner Rollins as has any man in this House, but, sir, in that position he is a mere man of straw and has no power whatever except to break the fall of the Democracy in reference to the swindles and frauds perpetrated by the men who are assessors and collectors of internal revenue in this country. Hence, so far as I am concerned, I do not care who they put there. They cannot put any man there who will collect less revenue, I am sure, because the President has the power to clog all the authority that Mr. Rollins has, and between him and the Secretary of the Treasury they have done it so that the revenue is not collected. How, in God's name, could you make it any worse by appointing anybody else? Hence, I conceive that there is no argument in that position, and I am not so great a friend to any man in the United States that I would insist on his retaining an office to the detriment of the country when it is impossible for him to collect the revenues of the country; nor ought Mr. Rollins to fail in patriotism when he finds that he cannot do it, and to remain there so that he may break the force of the fall of these other gentlemen.

I have been impelled to say these things because of the opposition that is made to this bill; and the true reason for the opposition I do not believe has leaked out. It is, in my judgment, a determination that no legislation shall pass in reference to the revenues of this country. Now, I say the country demands legislation in reference to our revenue. What good does Mr. Rollins do us, when I know and every man here knows that this man, who is now in confinement for contempt of this House, appointed or had appointed the most important officer in the revenue service in one of the principal districts in the United States—an officer having power over five States of this Union to make seizures and to release property? That I know to be so; and they have a key by which they telegraph between one another, and keep up their communications, so as to swindle this country. That I also know. Now, what good does Mr. Rollins do us if this man and others like him can go and make appointments through the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, so as to rob the country of its revenues? I ask you what benefit Mr. Rollins is to the country or to us in a party point of view?

Then, sir, I say if the President wants to appoint somebody else to this office let him do it if the Senate will confirm the man he may appoint. I presume the Senate will not confirm any man to this office unless they think him honest. Let the Senate and the President fight it out if he wants to appoint somebody else. If he desires to retain Mr. Rollins, God knows I would be glad to have him do it if you will give Mr. Rollins the power.

Then further, I ask gentlemen, so far as their constitutional arguments are concerned, are not the inspectors of the revenue department appointed without the advice and consent of the Senate? If so, I ask why may not the collectors and assessors also be appointed without the advice and consent of the Senate? They are not officers of such a character that the Senate must necessarily consent to their appointment. They are no more so really than the inspectors, except that under the old law they are made confirmable by the Senate. That is the whole distinction there is. It is by statute only that they are required to be confirmed by the Senate, and when you repeal that statute they are so no more than any other officers of the revenue.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate has terminated upon the pending section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. LOGAN. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. INGERSOLL, to so modify the section that it would read as follows:

That the President shall have power to appoint and remove, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and not otherwise, all assessors and collectors; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have the sole power to appoint and remove all assistant assessors, supervisors of internal revenue, inspectors, gaugers, storekeepers, and other officers and clerks provided for in this act, who shall severally give bond for the faithful performance of their duties, as may be required by law.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—aye twenty-five, noes not counted. So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. GARFIELD, to strike out the section as amended.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes seventy-six.

Before the noes were counted, Mr. SCHENCK called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCHENCK and Mr. WOOD were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 64, noes 45.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

The next section was read, as follows:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That there shall be in each United States judicial district one officer, to be called a supervisor of internal revenue, whose duty it shall be to reside in such district and keep his office at some convenient place therein to be designated by the Commissioner, and who shall receive, in compensation for his services, such salary as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may deem just and reasonable, not exceeding $3,000 per annum, and shall be paid his necessary traveling expenses when absent from his office on official business. It shall be the duty of every supervisor of internal revenue, under the direction of the Commissioner, to see that all laws and regulations relating to the collection of internal taxes are faithfully executed and complied with; to aid in the prevention, detection, and punishment of any frauds upon the revenue, and to examine into the efficiency and conduct of all officers of internal revenue within his district; and for such purposes he shall have power to examine all persons, books, papers, accounts, and promises, and to administer oaths and to summon any person to produce books and papers, or to appear and testify under oath before him, and to compel a compliance with such summons in the same manner as assessors may do. It shall be the duty of every supervisor of internal revenue to report in writing to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue any neglect of duty, incompetency, delinquency, or malfeasance in office of any internal revenue officer within his district, of which he may obtain knowledge, with a statement of all the facts in each case, and any evidence sustaining the same; and he shall have power to transfer any inspector, gauger, or storekeeper from one distillery or other place of duty to another, or from one collection district to another, within his district; and may, by notice in writing, suspend from duty any such inspector, gauger, or storekeeper, and in case of suspension shall immediately notify the collector of the proper district and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and within three days thereafter make report of his action, and his reasons therefor, in writing, to said Commissioner, who shall thereupon take such further action in the case as he may deem proper.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move to amend this section by striking out the words "and he shall have power to transfer any inspector, gauger, or storekeeper from one distillery or other place of duty to another, or from one collection district to another, within his district; and may, by notice in writing, suspend from duty any such inspector;" and insert in lieu thereof the words, "and he may, by notice in writing, suspend from duty any;" so that portion of the section will read:

And he may, by notice in writing, suspend from duty any gauger or storekeeper, and, in case of suspension, shall immediately notify the collector of the proper district and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and, within three days thereafter, make report of his action and his reasons therefor, in writing, to said Commissioner, who shall thereupon take such further action in the case as he may deem proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am also instructed to move to add to the section the following:

Provided, That where, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the number of collection districts in any judicial district does not require the services of separate supervisors he may unite two or more judicial districts under one supervisor.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am also instructed to insert the word "such" before the word "suspension," in the clause "and in case of suspension shall immediately notify the collector of the proper district," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. An amendment has just been adopted, on motion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, providing that two or more judicial districts may be united under one supervisor. I suppose by "judicial district" the gentleman means a United States judicial district?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER. There are but two judicial districts for Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think that would be sufficient for Pennsylvania?

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will observe that we have just adopted an amendment which authorizes the uniting of two or more districts where there seems to be a necessity for it.

Mr. MILLER. But suppose that the number of districts should not be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. This debate is out of order, as no amendment is pending.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will answer the gentleman's question whenever it may be in order to do so.

Mr. WOOD. For the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I move to amend by striking out in the thirty-seventh and thirty-eighth lines of the pending section the words "who shall thereupon take such further action in the case as he may deem proper."

I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether this further action may be construed as including the power of absolute removal from office.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose that, as a matter of course, there can be no action except such action as is provided for by law, and as the Commissioner, by the decision which the Committee of the Whole has just made, is reduced to a mere nonentity in the collection of the revenue, I suppose that he can neither remove, appoint, nor exercise any other substantial power; but whatever the law allows him to do in the premises of course he can do.

Mr. WOOD. But, Mr. Chairman, in the absence of any provision in the law denying to him the power of removal, I submit that this clause may give the Commissioner that power. I ask the chairman whether that is not a reasonable construction?

Mr. SCHENCK. I should not make any such construction; that is all I can say.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon my motion to strike out the words I have designated. It appears to me that if we should leave the bill without any restriction upon the power of the Commissioner, although he may not have the power to appoint these officers, yet in the condition of things stated in this section he is authorized to take any action which in his judgment he may deem proper. Such language, I submit, implies the power to remove absolutely, upon the mere presentation of a case by the appraiser, the appraiser being made the sole and exclusive judge of the propriety of the suspension. I think that, notwithstanding the action which has been taken by the Committee of the Whole, if this section be adopted in its present form we shall leave the Commissioner with a power to remove ad infinitum.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, this whole matter will be best understood by considering who and what these supervisors are. Under the present system there are three classes of officers—revenue agents, revenue inspectors, and special agents—who may go into any district anywhere and assume all the functions of the local officers, elbowing them out of the way. This is one of the great vices of the present system. By the plan embraced in this bill we propose to sweep out of existence all these roving agents, and to provide instead that in each judicial district of the United States there may be appointed one responsible man, who shall have a fixed place of residence and an office within the district, and who shall have this supervisory authority in regard to the conduct of matters within the district. But even he is not to make seizures or to exercise the functions of the proper local officers. All that he can do is to supervise their conduct, to look into their transactions generally, and to report upon them. This system is one which was recommended two or three years ago, and at one time it came very near being enacted into a law. Experience has proved that if it had then become a law the Government might have saved a great deal of money. What the gentleman from New York objects to as a part of this section is, that when the supervisor has investigated the conduct of any of the local officers he shall report to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for his further action.

I suppose it hardly needs argument to convince gentlemen that whatever action the Commissioner of Internal Revenue takes, as ordering a suit to commence, reporting for removal, or recommending for removal to the President, or the Secretary of the Treasury, whatever action he takes he can really do nothing. If it be determined the Commissioner can do nothing but put his hand in his pocket and whistle when it is reported some rascality has been discovered on the part of revenue officers, then the law will be left as it is, leaving him only the power to report to the Secretary of the Treasury, or anybody else, and of course nothing will be done.

But, sir, there are no such difficulties in the way as the gentleman supposes. When it is referred to the Commissioner for action it means official action; and what that shall be is determined by the provisions of the law. We became convinced from the facts in possession of the Committee of Ways and Means, that great gains would result from having responsible officers, properly paid, located with fixed places of business, and with accountability arising from their being known as men of some qualification for business, than to have these roving special revenue agents. I hope the section will not be disturbed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on Mr. WOOD's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the section by striking out all after the word "district" in the seventeenth line down to and including the word "do" at the end of the sentence; which is as follows:

And for such purposes he shall have power to examine all persons, books, papers, accounts, and premises, and to administer oaths, and to summon any person to produce books and papers, or to appear and testify under oath before him and compel a compliance with such summons in the same manner as assessors may do.

I move this amendment because the provision I propose should be stricken out is, in my judgment, in direct contravention of the fourth article of the amendment to the Constitution. That article provides that—

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches, and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or things to be seized."

Now, sir, this provision which I propose to strike out, is in direct violation of every guarantee in this article of the Bill of Rights. Under pretext of the authority it proposes to confer, one of these internal revenue spies may not only seize and search your person, but he may examine every private book, paper, and account you may have; and not only this, he may invade at pleasure the most sacred precincts of the household, and examine every portion of it to his heart's content. Sir, with such provisions as this in the laws of the country, what citizen is safe in the enjoyment of his most sacred and valued rights? It is idle to say that he may be remitted to his remedy in the courts, for what can compensate for such ruthless violations of the security which the Constitution in this article guarantees to the citizen? And besides, sir, all who know anything about it know that a majority of those who will condescend to act the rôle of the revenue spy, are totally irresponsible in a pecuniary point of view. But, sir, it seems to me the proposition I make is too plain to require an elaborate argument. Its propriety must surely commend itself to the judgment of every gentleman present, and I am therefore content to submit it without further remark.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to oppose the amendment. I wish to say merely that it is substantially the provision of the present law. Assessors now have the power to revise books and papers; and we only provide that supervisors shall have the same power.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PETERS. I appreciate the objection of the gentleman from New York, but I do not agree to his remedy. In line thirty-eight, after the word "case," I move to insert "which may be authorized by law."

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in any United States judicial district, such number of internal revenue storekeepers as may be necessary, the compensation of each of whom shall be five dollars per day, one or more of whom shall be assigned by said Commissioner to every bonded warehouse established by law; and no such storekeeper shall be engaged in any other business while in the service of the United States. Every storekeeper shall take an oath faithfully to perform the duties of his office, and shall give a bond, to be approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for the faithful discharge of his duties, in such form and for such amount as the Commissioner may prescribe. Every storekeeper shall have charge of the warehouse to which he may be assigned, under the direction of the collector controlling the same, which warehouse shall be in the joint custody of such storekeeper and the proprietor thereof, and kept securely locked, and shall at no time be unlocked and opened, or remain open, unless in the presence of such storekeeper or other person who may be designated to act for him as hereinafter provided; and no article shall be received in or delivered from such warehouse except on an order or permit addressed to the storekeeper and signed by the collector having control of the warehouse. Every storekeeper shall keep a warehouse book in which he shall enter an account of all articles deposited in the warehouse to which he is assigned, indicating in each case the date of the deposit, by whom manufactured or produced, the number and description of the packages and contents, the quantities therein, the marks and serial numbers thereon, and by whom gauged, inspected, or weighed, and if distilled spirits, the number of gauge or wine gallons and of proof gallons; and before delivering any article from the warehouse, he shall enter in said book the date of the permit or order of the collector for the delivery of such articles, the number and description of the packages, the marks and serial numbers thereon, the date of delivery, to whom delivered, and for what purpose, which purpose shall be specified in the permit or order for delivery, and in case of delivery of any distilled spirits the number of gauge, or wine gallons, and of proof gallons, shall also be stated; and such further particulars shall be entered in the warehouse books as may be prescribed or found necessary for the identification of the packages, to insure the correct delivery thereof and proper accountability therefor. A daily return shall be furnished by every storekeeper to the collector of the district of all articles received in and delivered from the warehouse during the day preceding that on which the return is made, a copy of which shall be mailed by him at the same time to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and each storekeeper shall, on the first Monday of every month, make a report in triplicate of the number of packages of all articles, with the several descriptions thereof respectively, as above provided, which remained in the warehouse at the date of his last report, and of all articles received therein and delivered therefrom during the preceding month, and of all articles remaining therein at the end of said month; one of which reports shall be by him retained and filed in the warehouse, one delivered to the collector having control of the warehouse, to be recorded and filed in his office, and one transmitted by the storekeeper to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be recorded and filed in his office. Any internal revenue storekeeper may be transferred by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from one warehouse to another within the same judicial district. In case of the absence of any internal revenue storekeeper by sickness or from any other cause, the collector having control of the warehouse may designate a person to have temporary charge of such warehouse who shall, during such absence, perform the duties and receive the pay of the storekeeper for the time he may be so employed; and for any violation of the law he shall be subject to the same punishment as storekeepers. Any storekeeper or other person in the employment of the United States having charge of a bonded warehouse, who shall remove or allow to be removed any cask or other package therefrom without an order or permit of the collector, or which has not been marked or stamped in the manner required by law, or shall remove or allow to be removed any part of the contents of any cask or package deposited therein, or who shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent entry in any account kept by him, or who shall omit to make any entry required by law in said book or account, or shall omit to make any certificate or report required by law, or who shall make any false certificate or report, or who shall fail to report in writing to the assessor of the district any violation of this act which may come to his knowledge, or who shall be guilty of neglect in the performance of his duty as such storekeeper, or who shall collude with any other person to defraud the United States, shall be immediately dismissed from office or employment, and, on conviction, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $2,000, and imprisoned not less than three months nor more than two years.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the committee to offer the following amendment:

In line twenty-five, after the word "book," insert the words "which shall at all times be open to the examination of any revenue officer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am also instructed to offer the following amendment.

In line fifty-eight, strike out the words "retained and filed in the warehouse," and insert in lieu thereof, "delivered to the assessor of the district to be recorded and filed in his office."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. Also the following amendment:

In line sixty, strike out the words "by the storekeeper."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. Also the following:

In line sixty-three, after the word revenue, insert the words "or by the supervisor of the judicial district."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. Also the following:

Strike out from line eighty to the words "United States," inclusive, as follows:

Or who shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent entry in any account kept by him, or who shall omit to make any entry required by law in said book or account, or who shall omit to make any certificate or report required by law, or who shall make any false certificate or report, or who shall fail to report in writing to the assessor of the district any violation of this act which may come to his knowledge, or who shall be guilty of neglect in the performance of his duty as such storekeeper, or who shall collude with any other person to defraud the United States.

The reason we move this amendment is that the same clause is repeated in another section of the bill, among the penal sections.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to strike out the whole section, and I will give my reasons for doing it. From the disposition of the House it would seem to me that the probability is the whisky tax will be reduced. Now, having stricken out the vitality of the bill; having left the appointment of officers just where it was when this bill was reported, in the hands of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, I consider it necessary to strike out this section. Why? It provides for a system of bonded warehouses that can only be protected when you get the power in the hands of the Commissioner, and make him responsible for the officers that are under him. Inasmuch, therefore, as the House is determined to have the law as it was before this bill was reported, I think that there shall be no bonded warehouses, if you expect to get any tax. If the House intends to reduce the whisky tax, and intends to have the same swarm of officers that we have now, then let the tax be collected at the worm of the still. You do not want any warehouses. Having stricken out the sixth section, if you keep your bonded warehouses, and have the same swarm of roving men you have now defrauding the Treasury, you will never get a cent of revenue, I do not care what the tax is. If you want these same officers to collect your revenue, I desire to cripple them as much as possible. Hence, I move to strike out the whole section in reference to bonded warehouses, expecting the committee to vote for what I do not want, that is, a reduction of the tax on whisky.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope my colleague on the committee will not insist upon that motion, because if it should prevail it will not in the least degree effect what he proposes to do, and it would affect other matters. It will be remembered that there are storekeepers appointed to have charge not of distilled spirits alone, but of anything and everything; that is, oil, tobacco, &c., that may be in bonded warehouses.

If, when we come to distilled spirits, the gentleman shall succeed with the rest of the House in making the tax so low as that it may reasonably be required to be paid altogether at the distillery, and that without crushing out the interest in the interior of the country, it will so far reduce the duties to be performed by any of these storekeepers and take away the necessity of appointing them.

If on the other hand that should not be done, we will have a system by which distilled spirits as well as other articles are to be taken care of in warehouses, and nobody to look after those warehouses, with proper responsibility. But in either case these appointments are appointments of officers to be made so far only as they may be found to be necessary and whose duties are not confined to distilled spirits but relate to any articles that may be placed in warehouses.

Now, one word to explain what I mean in reference to their duties in connection with distilled spirits. Under the present system there is a large class of warehouses called warehouse B, to which whisky is removed from the distillery warehouse, and where it remains an indefinite length of time. At this time there are in fact about five hundred thousand barrels accumulated in that way. The system that we propose in lieu of that is that the tax shall either be paid at the distillery on removing the spirits to the warehouse authorized there, and into which it is to be got, under such restrictions as will prevent the possibility of getting the whisky out of the distillery without payment of the tax, or, if removed, it shall only be removed for exportation and in bond, and that but once and by a particular route, and when it goes to the export warehouse it is not to be permitted to leave that warehouse except to go abroad, or to have the tax paid before it leaves the warehouse. This being our system, if the tax is paid altogether at the still, there will still be a necessity of keeping up a limited number of storekeepers at the warehouses for other purposes.

If the tax be not paid in every case at the still, then in that case there must still be a provision made for storekeepers to whatever extent they may be required, for it is not merely at the export warehouse that they are needed. The distillery warehouse itself must be under the charge of a storekeeper, and one of the most important duties of the storekeeper is to be present in the distillery, not like the inspector now, belonging to the distiller, but an officer of the Government, to watch everything and keep a record of everything that is done; to superintend the removal into the distillery warehouse; to be present when the tax-paid stamps which are provided for in this bill are attached to the packages containing the liquor, and to exercise, in short, various other important functions for the protection of the interests of the Government. All that the gentleman will strike out if he succeeds in striking out this section.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOGAN. I will move to strike out all except the last word, for the purpose of answering the remarks of my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means. I should have no disposition to differ with any member of the committee if the views of the committee as originally understood could be carried out. But I have been all the time opposed to bonded warehouses, and I am not warring against the committee when I state what my own views are. I say to this House, as I see you intend to reduce the whisky tax, you have got five hundred thousand barrels of whisky in these bonded warehouses to-day, the owners of which are holding them until you reduce the whisky tax and for no other purpose, and they have been doing it ever since this Congress assembled, waiting until this House shall do just what the whisky ring indicated last winter they should do. Now, I have been in favor of abolishing the bonded warehouses from the beginning, because that is the great source of frauds in this country, so far as whisky and tobacco are concerned.

I say make it so that you shall collect the tax when the whisky runs out of the still-worm. If you want your bonded warehouse and your storekeeper let it be at the distillery, there to take charge of the whisky; but let the tax be paid there; and if you reduce the whisky tax to twenty or twenty-five cents, as some gentlemen propose, the distiller can afford to pay the tax at the distillery, and we need not have these bonded warehouses where these wholesale frauds have been committed—these export warehouses, having four or five gentlemen appointed to keep them, where not a dollar of tax will be paid, and from which if they can smuggle it they will do it.

Thousands of barrels of whisky have been smuggled from these bonded warehouses since we passed the law requiring the tax to be paid before it could be taken from the bonded warehouses. How has that been done? By the sanction of the head of your revenue department, by issuing an order that the whisky may be removed into another building because the old one leaks a little, or is in need of some repairs. That is the way it has been done, right under your very noses here. You have just now voted that the Secretary of the Treasury, and those who now have the appointment of these officers, shall continue to appoint them. I say, that since you have done what you have done, I will oppose everything in this bill that gives the least latitude whatever to this whisky ring.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COVODE. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] and I will give my reasons for that opposition. The gentleman speaks of the large amount of whisky that is now in bonded warehouses, awaiting the reduction of the tax on whisky. Now, I will state that the gentleman is mistaken in reference to some portions of the country.

I received but a few minutes since a letter from the collector of my district, in which he states that there are one million nine hundred thousand gallons of whisky now in bonded warehouses in my district, and the reason why the whisky is still there is that since the passage of the joint resolution to prevent the taking of whisky from bonded warehouses they have not been able to sell their whisky while it is in bond, and therefore have not been able to get it into market.

Heretofore they have been able to sell their whisky in eastern markets at about seventy cents per gallon. At this time whisky can be bought in eastern markets at $1 50 per gallon, and consequently they could not afford to pay the tax of two dollars per gallon before they take their whisky out of bond, and then ship it East and compete with whisky that is being sold at $1 50 per gallon. When they sold their whisky in bond to eastern dealers the eastern dealers cheated the Government out of the tax. It is not kept in bond because they have been waiting for the reduction of the tax, for they have not until lately had any reason to expect that any such reduction would be made. No doubt they will now wait for that reduction.

Mr. LOGAN. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out the words "Commissioner of Internal Revenue," and insert "Secretary of the Treasury." I am rather surprised at the course taken in regard to this section by my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman says he is surprised at my course here. Why? Did he ever know me to vote for bonded warehouses, either in the committee or out of it?

Mr. ALLISON. The gentleman says because the sixth section has been stricken out therefore he will oppose these other sections. Now, I would call his attention to the fact that the words "distilled spirits" do not appear in the section he proposes to strike out. And if every gallon of distilled spirits should be required to pay the tax of two dollars per gallon at the distillery this section would still be necessary. We export more than one half of the tobacco raised in this country, and we must have bonded warehouses for the purpose of reaching this tobacco. This section applies with as much force, and was intended to apply, to the exportation of tobacco as to anything else.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman says that this section does not contain the words "distilled spirits." In that he is mistaken. I find in it these words, "and if distilled spirits, the number of gauge, or wine gallons, and of proof gallons."

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; distilled spirits may be mentioned in the section. Then let the gentleman move to strike out those words, if he is opposed to bonded warehouses for distilled spirits. For one I am not willing to leave distilled spirits without some provision in relation to export warehouses affecting them. I believe we have prepared a system of warehouses that will answer the purpose. And I beg gentlemen, especially at this stage of the bill, not to strike out this section so as to mar the harmony of the provisions later in the bill.

Therefore this section is essential even if the tax on distilled spirits is to be collected in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Illinois. It is necessary with reference not only to tobacco, but also mineral oils and some other articles, and, indeed, any other articles which are liable to a tax and which it may be desirable to export before the tax is paid. This is a general provision, not applying specially to distilled spirits. When we shall have settled the amount of tax which we shall impose upon distilled spirits, we may then consider the question whether or not the tax should be collected at the distillery. Until we settle that point, of course this section covers distillery warehouses as well as others; but I beg my friend not to insist on striking out this section, which is vital to the harmony of the general provisions of this bill. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. JUDD. I renew the motion of my colleague to strike out the entire section. I make this motion principally for the purpose of asking an explanation of this section as connected with a law that we passed in the early part of this session. Every gentleman will reflect the furor which then prevailed in relation to the frauds that were committed almost openly throughout the entire land under this bonded-warehouse system; and so violent was the virtuous indignation of almost every member upon this floor that the bill on that subject went through almost by its title, and so suddenly as to destroy some very important interests which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] seemed to think needed protection so far as exportation was concerned.

Now, it will not do for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to say let this section stand because it includes some other articles besides distilled spirits. I say, let us make it right as we go along. If the bonded warehouse system which has been in operation for the last eighteen months gives an opportunity for such frauds as in the early part of this session were considered as calling for immediate remedy by legislation, I desire the chairman of the committee to explain to me why this section does not open the door to similar frauds.

Under the old law there were two classes of warehouses—class A and class B. Under the present bill, the first class are storekeepers at the place where the whisky is made, and the other class are export warehouses. This, in my view, is merely giving new names to precisely the same things that we have had under the old law. I repeat that the ingenuity of Congress, even with all the aid of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], is not sufficient to devise legislation which shall prevent the immense frauds in the article of distilled spirits, if it is allowed to move one step beyond the place where it is manufactured without paying the tax, and I had hoped that the Committee of Ways and Means in this bill would report such provisions as would get rid of this objectionable system.

Now, gentlemen need not tell me that without this warehouse system business cannot be transacted because of the large amount of capital required. If the business is profitable the capital will flow to it. How is it with the immense product of the Northwest? Is the business in that carried on with the capital of the men there? No; they have a product that will command capital anywhere; and the money flows where the article of commerce is to be purchased. The provisions of this section do, in my judgment, contemplate substantially the two classes of warehouses of which we have had experience, furnishing the same opportunities for fraud that were afforded under the law which we with such hot haste repealed in the early part of this session.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WOOD. I rise to oppose the amendment. I think the two gentlemen from Illinois have really, at last, struck the nail upon the head. All the frauds which have been committed upon the Government in the non-payment of tax on whisky may be traced to the facility afforded by the Government in the establishment of bonded warehouses. There is the mode by which the Government is defrauded. The recent trial which took place in the city of Brooklyn, where a collector was convicted of collusion with those who had defrauded the Government, shows that it is the bonded-warehouse system which is at the bottom of most of the frauds upon the revenue. Fictitious bonds may be given, and they are accepted by the collectors, and upon those bonds the whisky is allowed to be taken out of bond. The bonded warehouses are not fraudulent in themselves; but they afford facilities for fraud by collusion on the part of the storekeeper with the distiller. They get the whisky into the bonded warehouses for the very purpose of avoiding the payment of the Government tax. There is no difficulty to get the whisky into the bonded warehouses. When the distillers get it there, then there is opportunity afforded for collusion with the inspectors and other officers. The officers get four or five dollars a day, and the distiller says to him, "Instead of four or five dollars a day I will give you four or five hundred dollars." That is the way the Government is defrauded of the tax on whisky in these bonded warehouses.

What is the process in New York? The distiller never pays a tax upon the whisky at the distillery. Where does he pay it? He puts the whisky in the bonded warehouses and waits for a convenient opportunity to avoid paying the tax. He gets his tool or agent by influence at Washington, or with the assessor or the collector in his district, appointed as inspector, and when he gets that done he does not pay his tool more than a few hundred dollars, and in this way avoids the payment of thousands of dollars of tax on the whisky he takes out of bond and puts upon the market.

I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that this tax should be collected at the time the whisky is manufactured. You should never let the whisky go from the hands of the manufacturer until the tax is secured. There is no security until the tax is absolutely paid. No whisky should be allowed to go out of the distillery until the tax has been paid, for when it is allowed to go into these bonded warehouses it affords facilities for fraud upon the revenue.

Mr. HUNTER. How is the tax to be collected at the small distilleries in cellars and garrets?

Mr. WOOD. There is no difficulty in collecting it there, but there is great difficulty in collecting it elsewhere. These distilleries are all known. It is impossible to run a distillery without its being found out. The Government officers know where they are. The distiller is bound to get a permit before he can distill any whisky.

Mr. HUNTER. Were not all the distilleries, except the illicit distilleries, closed in New York?

Mr. WOOD. They allow them to close and to open again. One set of agents is sent to close them and another set to reopen them. Those agents are in the pay of the distillers, and as soon as they withdraw the distilleries go to work again and defraud the Government of its tax. There is no difficulty about collecting the tax at the distilleries; and in my judgment it is proper to change the present system in this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to insert after the words "the Commissioner of Internal Revenue," the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." I do this for the purpose of enabling me to explain why these storekeepers are to be appointed. This is a general provision for storekeepers who are put under restriction and bound to a strict performance of duty in the warehouses of the Government, and it makes no difference whether that be one in which may be distilled spirits, tobacco, oil, or any other subject of tax. There is not the spectre here the gentleman supposes.

I admit when we get further along in this bill that this House or Congress may provide the tax on distilled spirits shall be paid at the still, and the tax on tobacco at the manufactory. It will be nugatory to make the amendment here. Then no appointments need to be nor would be made under it. The sixth section then would not be mischievous, but harmless.

But here is the fact. The gentleman says it is an attempt to keep up the old system of warehouses. No such thing. We have now distillery warehouses and we propose still to have them—what we call warehouse A. We propose also to have export warehouses. If we dispense with export warehouses, so far as distilled spirits are concerned, by providing that spirits shall be taxed at the still, there will still be storehouses to which this provision will apply. Then if we have the officers they ought to be placed under stringent provisions in regard to the performance of their duty and punished if they do not do it.

Now, on the subject of distillery warehouses that bill, which was passed in such hot haste, as the gentleman says, did not abolish warehouses A and B, but it shut down upon them, so that until there could be some wholesome legislation on the subject which should regulate everything in relation to distilled spirits they were forbidden to take spirits out of bond until the tax was paid. Distillery warehouses, then, must be kept up unless you reduce the tax so low that you can more easily collect it at the still.

Now, if you collect it at the still what is the effect of it? Does the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Illinois propose that we shall have a man stand at the worm of the still with a gallon measure and as soon as he has got it full of spirits collect a tax of a dollar or fifty or twenty-five cents and then score one? There must be some place, then, in which to accumulate the whisky, within or without the distillery, under certain restrictions, which shall prevent it being removed without paying a tax. If the gentleman will inform himself, as he is capable of doing, he will, I think, be satisfied that some such place must be provided at the distillery, under the close guardianship of some officer under full restriction—we call him storekeeper—who will take care that the whisky is there and is not permitted to be removed an inch until it has paid the tax. You must either do this or stand, as I said, at the still worm with your gallon cup and catch the whisky, and, when you have got it filled, turn the cock and stop until you have got that gallon scored and got your pay for it, and then turn it on and get another gallon, which I hold to be rather impracticable.

Mr. MULLINS. Tedious, that is. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman says it would be tedious.

Mr. MULLINS. Too tedious.

Mr. SCHENCK. So I think it would. I am perfectly convinced that my friend from Illinois and others would not be making these criticisms and objections, would not be finding spectators where they do not exist, if they were to read the provisions of the bill in regard to distilled spirits, where, in section after section, line after line, we have thrown guards and restrictions all around these things, so that it seems to me next to impossible for whisky to be moved a mile or an inch without some security being given that the tax shall be paid. And if finally Congress shall decide that the tax must be paid at the still, and we have no necessity for anything except storekeepers at the distillery, then so be it; but still we must have a provision for storekeepers there. So far you will obviate the necessity of nearly all of this section, so far as distilled spirits are concerned, but you must still have the provision apply if you mean to have anybody in charge of this matter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JUDD. I think the chairman of the committee will do me the justice to say that I have not made any such proposition, nor do I intend to in any portion of this bill. I desire to see a perfect revenue system. If some of us happen to be less informed on this subject than the chairman of the committee, who has been engaged in perfecting the details of this bill for four, five, six, or seven months, he certainly ought to give us the information that we seek. The gentleman talks about captious objections. I do not regard this as such. He speaks of the guards and checks and oaths with which they have in subsequent sections surrounded these officers. Why, Mr. Chairman, a storekeeper's oath, according to the stories we heard here at the beginning of the session, is not as valuable as a dicer's oath. What does an oath amount to or a bond with such men? The gentleman tries to break the force of these objections by belittling the thing and asking my colleague and myself to stand at the end of the still-worm and measure the whisky out by the gallon. Why, that is not necessary. We can do it with a larger measure than a gallon. We can have a vator we can in some form get at the capacity. We may not reach the entire amount, but I tell you that it is safer, in my opinion, to be defrauded on the question of capacity than to take the risks of this bonded warehouse system and the business of transportation. It is safer to the Government and you will get more money.

Now, it will not do for the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to say to us, "Do not make these objections" when we are in the pursuit of information. I believe that a system can be adopted. I have not studied the subject so as to mature one by which the largest proportion of a proper tax can be collected, especially if we can get a good class of officials.

Why, sir, in other countries they not only tax capacity but they require notice to be given of when they intend to run a distillery. It is run during the day time. Measurement is made of its capacity. It is run upon notice to the Government officials. And they do collect in other countries the largest proportion of the revenue that they are entitled to from distilled spirits. Why cannot we do it?

Mr. MULFINS. They have not got Yankees over there.

Mr. JUDD. The gentleman from Tennessee says they have got no Yankees there. The inventive genius of our people I recognize as fully as anybody else, and I tell you, as I repeat what I said before, that it is not possible for this or any other Congress by oaths, by bonds, by paper writing to prevent the genius of these men who can make a dollar and a half per gallon on whisky, cheating the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MYERS. I renew it. I had not expected to say anything at this time upon the subject of this whisky tax, nor is there time in the few moments allowed to do so properly. But as my friend from Illinois [Mr. Judd] has touched upon the point, I desire to say this much, that this whole discussion shows, and all the facts that have come to the knowledge of the committee and the country in relation to frauds in this particular of the whisky tax show, that we have not got the right system.

Now, a committee was appointed by the last Congress, of which I had the honor to be a member, in reference to the frauds in relation to this article, and they made a report. I have spoken of this before in this House. After a close examination of witnesses and of the mode of manufacturing whisky in several forms, they made a report to the effect that the proper mode to collect the tax upon whisky was upon the fermenting capacity of the distillery. It is as plain and simple as the rule of three. It does away with a vast number of officers required under the existing law and proposed to be required under this bill. It does away with the bonded warehouse system. It assesses the tax—and it clearly gets at the proper assessment—not at the still, but upon the mash-tubs, or upon what is properly called the fermenting capacity of the distillery. When an assessor assesses the value of real estate he has largely to guess at it, and yet I take it in most of the cities and places in this country real estate is assessed by the assessor chiefly upon that guess, and people acquiesce in it and the tax is collected. But the proper way is to ascertain by persons skilled in the business from other countries and in this country how much the distillery will produce in a certain number of days, giving the best time for the Government that is known.

Seventy-two hours is generally regarded as best in regard to grain distilleries. And some other estimate can be made in reference to molasses; it is the easiest thing in the world. If possible I will present a substitute when that section is reached, which I think will commend itself to the best judgment of the House. At all events if I cannot do so, I trust to hear something from others who are better skilled in this matter than I am.

This system has been adopted in Prussia and in Austria. And there is no reason, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] says, why the inventive genius of this country cannot improve upon that system. Let us try it and see if we cannot collect this tax. I deny that there is not enough of ability here to contend with these frauds. Reduce the amount of tax, and then assess it upon the capacity of the distillery, and we will be enabled to collect at least three fourths of it, for there will be much less incentive to fraud.

The Committee of the Whole rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

An act (S. No. 188) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of the inhabitants of cities and towns upon the public lands," approved March 2, 1867; and

An act (S. No. 190) to further provide for giving effect to the various grants of public lands to the State of Nevada.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

The committee resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, the eighth section being under consideration.

Mr. SCHENCK. I recognize fully the propriety of giving information when I am called upon to do so; and I expect to give it when I have it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Judd] has not met my practical question. I say that even if, when we hereafter come to that portion of the bill, we should require all the taxes on distilled spirits to be paid at the place of production, we will still want some officers to take charge of the distillery and look out for everything there. If the gentleman had read the bill he would have found much that he asks for in this respect. Section two hundred and four of the bill provides:

"That every distiller shall provide at his own expense a warehouse to be situated on and to constitute a part of his distillery premises, to be used only for the storage of distilled spirits, of his own manufacture, but no dwelling-house shall be used for such purpose, and no door, window, or other opening shall be made or permitted in the walls of such warehouse leading into the distillery or into any other room or building; and such warehouse, when approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on report of the collector, is hereby declared to be a bonded warehouse of the United States, to be known as a distillery warehouse, and shall be under the direction and control of the collector of the district, and in charge of an internal revenue storekeeper assigned thereto by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and the tax on the spirits stored in such warehouse shall be paid before removal from such warehouse, unless removed in pursuance of law."

Section two hundred and five provides for the whisky being drawn off into coked cisterns when it comes from the still. And we must have some one to take charge of it there, let the tax be paid where it may.

As to the other warehouses I will not speak of them now because they are not referred to here.

My object is to show that we want storekeepers at any rate. They are to keep an account of all that goes into the warehouses, all that goes out of the warehouses, and a great many other things, which the gentleman could find out if he would take the trouble to read the bill with any care.

The gentleman makes the criticism that in other countries notice is required to be given when it is proposed to commence running a still; all that is provided for in this bill, and more, too.

Mr. JUDD. At the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SCHENCK,] I will withdraw my motion, with the understanding that if it is necessary, after we have acted on the other portions of the bill, we can return to this section and act upon my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, the committee, in pursuance of the order of the House, will now take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

At half past seven o'clock the House reassembled in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The pending question was upon the eighth section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know that I need to add to what I have already said in opposition to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Judd,] to strike out the provision for storekeepers, especially not after the indication he has given of his willingness to withdraw the amendment—indeed, I believe he has withdrawn it—upon the assurance that if the provisions of the bill should be so changed as to provide that the direct tax upon whisky shall be all paid at the still, I shall be willing that the committee may go back and make any change that may be necessary in this section to adapt it to that condition of things.

Mr. JUDD. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this section will be reserved for further consideration hereafter.

Mr. SCHENCK. My understanding was that the section should be reserved for such amendments only as might relate to distilled spirits. This is all that was asked.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to propose an amendment which I believe to be necessary in view of the action which the Committee of the Whole has already taken, to insert in the second line of this section, instead of the words "Commissioner of Internal Revenue," the words "Secretary of the Treasury." If the section is not to be reserved for general amendment I move this amendment now.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not see that this amendment becomes necessary at all, by reason of our action on the sixth section.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair has misunderstood the arrangement between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUDD] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] in regard to reserving this section, he would be glad to have the matter restated.

Mr. JUDD. My objection to the section related to that portion with regard to distilled spirits, and my motion applying to the entire section was made rather pro forma, in order to have the matter explained by the chairman of the committee. I am willing that my motion to strike out shall be passed over until the other sections of the bill shall have been considered.

Mr. DAWES. Before this section has passed beyond our control, I think that the committee should act upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] It seems to me that such an amendment is necessary; because, if the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is not the head of a department, he cannot make the appointments here contemplated. I know that by our action on the first section this officer is made the head of a department; but our action subsequently upon the sixth section seemed to me a determination in a full House that this officer shall not be the head of a department.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] object to reserving this whole section for amendment generally?

Mr. SCHENCK. I object, because I understood the reservation was intended to apply to a particular question. If, however, gentlemen propose to open again the question with regard to appointments—whether they shall be confined to the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, I shall, perhaps, be compelled, as there is no quorum here, to consent that this whole section be passed over.

Mr. GARFIELD. I certainly would not do anything to embarrass the committee on this bill, there being now no quorum here; but I desire to say to my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] that I understood the vote to-day upon the sixth section as indicative that the Committee of the Whole had decided not to erect the Internal Revenue Bureau into a separate department. My amendment simply proposes to carry out what I understand to be the sense of the House. If my colleague prefers that this question shall not be acted on now, and is willing that the section shall be reserved, and that this amendment shall be offered hereafter, I will cheerfully assent to that arrangement, as I am unwilling that business should be stopped for the want of a quorum.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think I understand this whole matter. The Secretary of the Treasury has now the appointment of about nine thousand officers in this and other branches of the public service. To take the appointment of four thousand of them away from him and give it to another officer is considered revolutionary, because it tends too much toward building up the power of one man! Hence, it is argued, we had better leave the appointment of the whole nine thousand with the Secretary of the Treasury! I suppose, however, if we get into an argument upon this subject, we shall open up again the whole question; and rather than do that, I would prefer that the whole section should be reserved. I withdraw my objection to that arrangement. I do not know but we would get along better by commencing at the other end of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair only wishes to know what the agreement is.

Mr. SCHENCK. I agree that the eighth section shall be reserved for the purpose of the amendments of the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Ohio, now pending.

Mr. BEAMAN. I object, unless the whole section is reserved.

Mr. SCHENCK. I agree to that. There is no quorum present, and I cannot control the matter.

The Clerk read the next section as follows:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in every collection district where the same may be necessary, one or more internal revenue gaugers, who shall each take an oath faithfully to perform his duties, and shall give his bond, with one or more sureties, satisfactory to said Commissioner, for the faithful discharge of the duties assigned to him by law or regulations; and the penal sum of said bond shall not be less than $5,000, and said bond shall be renewed or strengthened as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may require. The duties of every such gauger shall be performed under the supervision and direction of the collector of the district to which he may be assigned, or of the collector in charge of exports at any port of entry to which he may be assigned. Fees for gauging and inspecting shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be paid to the collector by the owner or producer of the articles to be gauged and inspected; and said collector shall retain all amounts so received as such fees until the last day of each month, when the aggregate amount of fees so paid that month shall, under regulation to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, be paid to the gauger assigned to said district, or, if there be more than one, shall be equally divided by said collector among all the internal revenue gaugers assigned to the district. All necessary labor and expense attending the gauging of any article shall be furnished and borne by the owner or producer of such articles. Every gauger shall, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, make a daily return in duplicate; one copy of such return to be delivered to the assessor, and the other to the collector of his district, giving a true account in detail of all articles gauged and proved or inspected by him, and for whom, and the number and kind of stamps used by him. Any gauger who shall make any false or fraudulent inspection, gauging, or proof, shall pay a penalty of $1,000, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than three months nor more than three years.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move on page 11, line twenty-two, to strike out from the word "assigned" to the word "district," in line twenty-five, as follows:

To said district, or, if there be more than one, shall be equally divided by said collector among all the internal revenue gaugers assigned to the district.

And insert in lieu thereof the words:

Performing the duty; and in any city or part of a city within a district where there may be two or more gaugers on duty, the said fees shall be equally divided by the collector among them. In no case, however, shall the aggregate monthly fees of any gauger exceed at the rate of $3,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out in the twenty-ninth and thirtieth lines the words "copy of said return." It is a mere verbal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to strike out these words, "shall pay a penalty of $1,000, and." I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means how it happens this is made to read in this way:

Any gauger who shall make any false or fraudulent inspection, gauging, or proof, shall pay a penalty of $1,000, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than three months nor more than three years.

It seems that two penalties are inserted, or else there is tautology. Is it to be understood this penalty of $1,000 is to be paid before conviction? How can he be made to pay a penalty before trial?

Mr. SCHENCK. Very easily by action of debt; all through the law we have resorted to the same practice.

Mr. HIGBY. It does not change the law?

Mr. SCHENCK. It does not.

Mr. HIGBY. It is not paid under a criminal prosecution?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is a double remedy which prevails all through the bill.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out the words "Commissioner of Internal Revenue," and insert "Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the attention of the chairman of the committee has been necessarily drawn to the fact that these gaugers, under the existing law, are the principal parties who assist the distillers in defrauding the revenue. I hope that the provisions of this bill are sufficient to prevent it.

I will relate to the committee the modus operandi by which the gauger is made one of the chief instruments in assisting the distiller, as I understand the operation of the law now, at any rate the practice. A distiller makes application to the collector of the district that he desires to have gauged and to pay the tax upon a given quantity of whisky. He goes to the collector to have an order issued to the gauger to go to the distillery and gauge that quantity.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am compelled to raise the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment, but to the general necessity of gauging.

Mr. WOOD. I am speaking to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. I hope the gentleman desires to make this bill as perfect as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk reported the amendment to strike out "Commissioner of Internal Revenue" and insert "Secretary of the Treasury;" so that it will read as follows:

That there shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury in every collection district where the same may be necessary, one or more internal revenue gaugers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, upon the ground that the only amendment proposed is to change "Commissioner of Internal Revenue" to "Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. WOOD. I am in favor of that. I yield to the ruling of the Chair, which no doubt is strictly and technically correct. I want to make the bill perfect if I can.

The CHAIRMAN. There will still be opportunity for amendment when this is disposed of.

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD, the Chairman announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for a division. The action of the committee to-day makes that amendment necessary. If it may be reserved I will not ask for a division. The settlement of one question will settle all of them.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to reserving it if the committee think proper.

By unanimous consent the amendment was reserved.

Mr. WOOD. I move to strike out "Commissioner of Internal Revenue." I do it for the purpose of calling the attention of the chairman of the committee, who I am bound to suppose is desirous of making this bill perfect so far as the security of the Treasury is concerned, to the fact that, in my judgment, there is no improvement in this section upon the existing law. Precisely the same form is proposed here as is now required by law. Indeed, I do not know but that this section is taken bodily from the existing law.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, this is not taken from the existing law. The only prescription in the existing law in regard to gaugers is that inspectors shall gauge. It will be found in the act of 1866, section thirty. There is no provision in the existing law for the appointment of a gauger.

Mr. WOOD. It is immaterial whether the inspector shall gauge or whether there is a gauger appointed. As I understand it, every district now has a gauger. The Secretary of the Treasury, at the recommendation of the collector of the district and by the consent of the assessor, recommends some person to gauge in that district. That I know to be the fact. Now they propose to name an officer to be called a gauger. It is immaterial whether he is an inspector or gauger. The point to which I desire to draw the attention of the committee is this: that this gauger is the only real security that the Government has. It is in his power to return the measurement more or less just as in his judgment or to his interest he may deem wise or politic.

Now, I would throw around that department some security. I would interpose some more stringent regulations, so that it will be placed beyond the power of this officer, whether he is an inspector or gauger, to return falsely the quantity he does gauge, and to give a certificate that he has gauged but half the quantity that he has actually gauged.

Then, again, the gauger has it in his power to brand, and does brand and mark barrels of whisky as having been gauged, and which pass as having been gauged, but which have not been gauged at all and on which no tax has been paid at all. That is the object of my amendment. I do not know that I shall press it. I have offered it mainly for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the fact that one of the chief modes by which this fraud is practiced is by the gauger acting in collusion with the distiller himself.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I assure the gentleman from New York that where he has now spent minutes upon this subject the committee have spent almost weeks in informing themselves in regard to these matters; and he might not only have said that in the case of gaugers, but in the case of almost every officer, there have been, in various forms, frauds committed on the Government by reason of the want of penalties, restrictions, and guards thrown around them. And as we go through the bill he will find that gaugers, like other officers, are put under severe penalties of fine and imprisonment in the penitentiary for omitting to do or for doing any one of the several things prescribed.

As to its being precisely the same as the present law, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. Under the present law, there are general inspectors of spirits, and an inspector is sent to the distillery, paid by the distiller, and it is made his duty to gauge, and that same inspector has the gauging done in other cases. The consequence of this has been that swarms of gaugers have been employed, and they have divided between the gaugers and the inspector the immense amount of fees that have accumulated, so that in one case we find, independently of any frauds committed, that one inspector of oil, acting as gauger, hiring some nine boys and men under him, and paying them four dollars a day, himself pocketed at the rate of $56,000 a year. All this we have attempted to correct by providing a specific officer who shall be known as a gauger, who shall be put under bonds and have certain duties prescribed for him, and who shall be sent to the penitentiary if he does not perform his duties, or commit any frauds in performing them; so that it is an entirely different condition of things.

And I am glad to be able to assure the gentleman from New York and any other gentlemen who take an interest in this matter that if they will look through this bill section by section they will find all the provisions to which the gentleman has alluded as necessary taken care of with a view to prevent just such frauds as he speaks of. And in order to prevent this accumulation of fees we have provided that in cities where there are two or more gaugers in a district, in order to prevent favoritism, one doing all the business and the other nothing, and that they shall have an interest in watching each other, the fees shall be divided; and then we provide that neither in cities nor elsewhere shall the fees received by the gauger amount to a sum which will make his compensation exceed $3,000.

These are, in brief, some of the provisions made in regard to this officer, and we think we have guarded very well the duties we have imposed upon him.

Mr. WOOD. I withdraw the amendment.

No further amendments being offered to the ninth section, the Clerk read the tenth section, as follows:

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of assessing, levying, and collecting the taxes hereinafter prescribed by this act the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized to divide, respectively, the States into convenient collection districts, or he may continue, modify, or alter, as he may deem best, the districts heretofore constituted, and he shall appoint an assessor and a collector for each such district, who shall be residents within the same, and shall keep their respective offices at a place therein to be designated by the said Commissioner: Provided, That any of said States may, if the Commissioner shall deem it proper, be erected into and included in one district; but the number of districts in any State shall not exceed the number of Representatives in Congress to which such States shall be entitled.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to amend this section by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof that which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That for the purpose of assessing, levying, and collecting the taxes hereinafter prescribed by this act, each State and Territory in the United States shall form but one collection district, except in those States or Territories having cities with a population of one hundred thousand or upward. Such States or Territories having such cities as aforesaid shall have one additional district for each of such cities as aforesaid. Such additional district or districts to consist of the county or counties in which such cities are situated.

Mr. HUNTER. We have reduced the sources of revenue to such an extent that in my judgment it is no longer necessary for us to have the number of assessors and collectors we now have. In my own State the office of collector of a district will no longer pay a competent man for all his time, considering the amount of services he has to perform.

Now, as we are trying to become economical, and as I believe that under the law as it now stands a collector or assessor occupying a district embracing an entire State will not have more duties to perform than a collector or an assessor had to perform in a district before we made this reduction, I think this Congress should endeavor to save as much as possible by reducing the number of officers and thereby saving their salaries.

This section leaves to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the right to make districts just as he sees fit. Now, I think that is a duty belonging to the Government of the United States. We should fix the districts ourselves, and then have the collectors and assessors appointed for the districts that we make.

Now, I admit that in States where there are large cities, one of one hundred thousand inhabitants, for example, that city should have a collector and assessor to itself. I therefore propose by my amendment that cities of one hundred thousand inhabitants and upward shall constitute districts by themselves. We must have deputy assessors and deputy collectors in the respective counties, and they can report to the principal assessor or the principal collector when there is one in a State just as well as when there is one in a district like those now established.

By doing this we shall save in the item of collectors and assessors alone over two million dollars a year; a saving which I think Congress should be ready to make.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I clearly understand the amendment proposed. If I do understand it, it is that each State shall constitute a collection district, except where there is a city containing one hundred thousand inhabitants or upward; in which case such city shall constitute a separate district by itself. Now, that would make the State of Illinois all one district with the exception of the city of Chicago, which city would constitute another district. I doubt the convenience of people going from Cairo up to Ottawa, or from Ottawa down to Cairo. I think the gentleman will find a great deal of practical inconvenience resulting from that mode of collecting taxes.

Mr. HUNTER. Is it not the duty of the assistant assessor to perform that duty?

Mr. SCHENCK. Under the amendment of the gentleman the State of Indiana and the State of Michigan would each constitute a single district. In Ohio there would be two districts; one constituted of the city of Cincinnati, and the rest of the State embraced in another district.

Mr. MAYNARD. The bill allows that to be done now, if the Commissioner thinks it can be done.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentlemen says, if I do not misunderstand him, that his amendment would save about two million dollars in the item of collectors and assessors.

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir. And let me ask the gentleman if the deputy collector and deputy assessor in each county cannot transmit their reports to the principal collector and assessor at the capital of the State, or in any other part of the State, just as well as they now transmit their reports to any part of the district? There are districts in my State comprising eight or ten counties each, and the deputies in each county have to transmit their reports by mail to the principal assessors.

The amendment of Mr. HUNTER was not agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That each assessor shall divide his district into divisions, which may be changed as often as he may deem necessary, subject to such regulations and limitations as may be imposed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, within each of which divisions there shall be one or more assistant assessors, who shall reside within the district; and in case of a vacancy occurring in the office of assessor, the assistant assessor senior in office in the district shall discharge the duties and receive the compensation of assessor until an appointment filling the vacancy shall be made.

Mr. SCHENCK. On behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means I offer the following amendment:

Add at the end of section thirteen the following:

And such assistant shall discharge the duties of the assessor in case of the sickness or the temporary disability of the assessor.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered,

The next section was read, as follows:

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whenever he shall deem it expedient, may authorize the assessor of any district to designate one or more of the assistant assessors to make assessments in any part of such district of all taxes upon any specified objects of taxation, and in such case it shall be the duty of the other assistant assessors of such district to report to the assistant assessor thus specially designated all matters which may come to their knowledge relative to any assessments to be made by him; and whenever two or more districts or parts of districts are embraced within one county, it may be lawful for such assistant assessor or assessors to make assessments anywhere within such county upon such specified objects of taxation, which assessments shall be returned to the assessor of the district in which such taxes are payable.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read as follows:

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That if any assessor shall demand of, or receive directly or indirectly from any assistant assessor, as a condition of his recommendation for appointment to or continuance in his said office of assistant assessor, any portion of the compensation herein allowed such assistant assessor, or any other consideration, such assessor so offending shall be summarily dismissed from office by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to reserve the right to offer hereafter an amendment in the last line of this section, involving the same question which has arisen on other sections.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the reservation will be made.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think this involves the question about which my colleague is so tenacious. The legislative department can, if it thinks proper, give to the Commissioner the power to remove these officers. The question is simply whether when some petty subordinate commits fraud or in any way behaves badly, it is impossible for us to provide that the head of the bureau shall exercise a proper supervision over him without running to the Secretary of the Treasury to find out whether it shall be done.

Mr. GARFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. These officers are appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. SCHENCK. O, no; they are not.

Mr. GARFIELD. The language of the section is:

Such assessor so offending shall be summarily dismissed from office by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Now, these assessors are all under the present law appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Of course, if the general change indicated in the vote to-day be made, we could not put it in the power of the Commissioner to dismiss persons appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I thought my colleague was referring to another section relating to the duties of assistant assessors.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire that the reservation shall be made with respect to all officers whom it would clearly be beyond the power of the Commissioner to appoint, if he be not made the head of a department.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the reservation in regard to this section will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. I also ask that by unanimous consent the same reservation be made with regard to the tenth section, which involves precisely the same question. I inadvertently allowed that section to be passed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to going back.

The Clerk read the fourteenth section, as follows:

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That every assessor or assistant assessor who shall enter upon and perform the duties of his office without having taken the oath or affirmation prescribed by law, or shall willfully neglect to perform any of the duties prescribed by this act at the time and in the manner required, or shall make any false or fraudulent list or valuation or assessment, or shall negligently or designedly permit any violation of the law by any other person, or shall demand or receive any compensation, fee, or reward other than is provided for the performance of any duty, or shall be guilty of extortion or willful oppression in office, shall, upon complaint and proof thereof to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, be dismissed from office, and shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500, and imprisoned not less than three months nor more than three years. And one half of the fine so imposed shall be for the use of the United States, and the other half for the use of the informer, who shall be ascertained by the judgment of the court; and the said court shall also render judgment against the said assessor or assistant assessor for the amount of damages sustained in favor of the party injured, to be collected by execution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move to strike out that section, and I will explain the reason why. On acting on the different parts of the bill and dovetailing them it was discovered that the whole of section fourteen is but a repetition of the matter contained in section sixty-two with the exception of some two lines. We propose to strike out section fourteen, and when we come to section sixty-two to insert a few lines.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That every assistant assessor shall render his account for pay and charges allowed by law monthly, specifying each item and the date of each day of service, and transmit the same, verified by his oath or affirmation, to the assessor of the district, who shall examine the same, and, if it appear just and in accordance with law, indorse his approval thereon. Such account when so approved may be presented for payment by the assistant assessor to the collector of the district acting as disbursing agent of the Treasury, who shall pay the same when receipted by the assistant assessor. When any account, so transmitted to the assessor, shall be objected to, in whole or in part, the assistant assessor may appeal to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose decision on the case shall be final. And should it appear at any time that any assessor has knowingly or negligently approved any account, as aforesaid, allowing any assistant assessor a sum larger than was due according to law, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, upon proper proof thereof, to deduct the sum so allowed from any pay which may be due to such assessor, or the Commissioner, as aforesaid, may direct a suit to be brought in any court of competent jurisdiction against the assessor or assistant assessor for the recovery of any amount knowingly or negligently allowed, as hereinbefore mentioned.

Mr. PETERS. I move to amend in line seven, after the word "thereon," by inserting these words:

And when sworn to before a justice of the peace the certificate of the official character of such justice shall be deemed sufficient evidence thereof.

Mr. Chairman, an assessor in my part of the State goes before a justice of the peace, and then has to go to the county court to get a certificate that the party is a justice of the peace.

Mr. SCHENCK. It strikes me that this is unnecessary, as we give the revenue officers power to administer oaths.

Mr. PETERS. Not to the assistant, but only to the assessor.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman will turn to section sixty-three he will find it provides as follows:

That the Commissioner, assistant commissioner, deputy commissioners, and supervisors of internal revenue, collectors and deputy collectors, and assessors and assistant assessors, are hereby authorized to administer oaths and take testimony touching any part of the administration of this act with which they are respectively charged, or where such oaths and testimony are by law authorized to be taken.

Mr. PETERS. That does not meet my objection. An assistant assessor who desires to make an oath to his account cannot make it before himself, but must go before a collector in another place.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish it were not so, but these revenue officers are scattered all over the country, and it cannot be conceived that it will be difficult to find one of them to administer the oath.

Mr. PETERS. There may be none other in the same town. I can see no possible objection to my amendment. It is intended to reach this case: that where an assistant collector has sworn to his returns before a justice of the peace and sends it to the collector, the latter may certify his knowledge of the notoriety of the fact that the justice of the peace is duly commissioned to act as such. I insist upon the amendment.
